the trial of issues in such manner as special juries have been, and are usually struck in such courts respectively upon trials at bar. In the 3 Geo. 2, c. 25, there is no mention of the fees to be paid to the special jury; but, from the recital in the Act of 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 2, it seems probable that the payments exceeded one guinea to each special juror at that time. Long before these Acts it was the practice to summon special juries for trials at bar (where all trials originally took place), and probably they were also summoned for trials at Nisi Prius: (see Philpot v. Feeler, Cro. Jac. 672.) And from the case of Rex v. Smith, 1 Stra. 265, in the reign of George I., it would seem that this was done by a rule for a good jury, and that the persons summoned were often gentlemen who were in the commission of the peace. There can be little doubt that the special juries were composed of the principal freeholders; and in the 7th edition of Trials per Pais, edited by Giles Duncombe in 1739, p. 90, it is stated that it was the practice of the courts to order "the prothonotary to choose forty-eight out of the sheriff's book of freeholders of the most substantial men of the county." It also appears from Salk. 405, pl. 1 and 2, that, in the 8 Will. 3, the practice of striking a special jury from the freeholder's book was very much the same as it is at present. What was the precise date and origin of the fees, either to special jurors or common jurors, it is difficult to ascertain. In Smith's Commonwealth, which was written in the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and which is referred to in the interesting work of Mr. Forsyth upon trial by jury, it is stated in chapter 18 that "The party with whom they have given their sentence giveth the enquest their dinner that day most commonly; and this is all they have for labour, notwithstanding that they come, some twenty, some thirty, or forty miles, or more, to the place where they give their verdict; all the rest is at their own charge." In The Duke of Richmond v. Wise, 1 Vent. 124, 23 Car. 2, which was tried at Bar, and where a motion was made to set aside the verdict on account of the jury having been entertained by the successful party, it is said by the court to have "been usual at the assizes for the jury to receive the collation after verdict given, from him for whom they find, and that it would not avoid the verdict, but that such practice ought not to be." It appears, however, from Powell's Attorney's Academy, published in 1623, that at that time the ordinary and usual fee to each common jurymen was 8*d.*, and to each talesman 4*d.* At p. 141, under the heading of "Fees at Nisi Prius at Guildhall," are the following entries:—"To the jury per piece being of the number in hab. corp. 8*d.*" "To the rest that come in by the tales per piece, 4*d.*" And at p. 142, it is stated "to be the same upon a Nisi Prius in the country." But there is no trace of what the fees were to special jurors. It is clear, also, that in 1658 and in 1682, the practice was to pay the special jury upon a trial at bar: (See Hunt v. Hollis, 2 Sid. 77, where the jury came from Dorsetshire, and Caldicot v. Earl Pembroke, 2 Show. 248, where they were summoned from Wiltshire; and in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Hermitage, Carth. 239), it appears at p. 242 of the report that the prosecutors paid 65*l.* to the jury, who came up from Dorsetshire in very bad weather. In the 5th edition of Trial per Pais, published in 1718, after speaking of certain jurors being fined for taking money after their verdict, it is stated that "the practice is otherwise at this day; if it were not, the Middlesex juries would not so court the bailiffs to return them especially to trials at bar, where 5*l.* a man is a frequent gratuity, sometimes more." It is not improbable that, after the passing of the Act of 3 Geo. 2, c. 25, a similar practice as to the fees began to prevail with the special juries at Nisi Prius, and that this may have led to the enactment in the 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, limiting the payment to one guinea, which is repeated in the later Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 50. In the 1st edition of Bacon's Abridgment, published in 1736, and in the subsequent editions, title "Juries" (L.), "When and by Whom to be Paid," it is said: "Jurors in all civil causes are to be paid for their trouble and attendance, and the quantum is to be proportioned according to the distance of place, badness of the weather, &c.; but if they take any money or other reward for giving a verdict, they are not only punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, but to a decies tantum given by the statute of 38 Edwd. 3, c. 12, i.e., a forfeiture of ten times as much as he hath taken. But, if some of the jurors appear, and the trial goes off pro defectu juratorum, those who appeared are not to be paid; for nobody has received any benefit from their attendance, and consequently not obliged to make them any recompense. But where a cause was appointed for trial at the bar of B. R., by a jury of Wilts, and a venire returned, and the jury summoned, but before the day the parties agreed, and, the summons not being countermanded, several of the jury appeared; it was ordered, on motion, that the attorneys on both sides should pay them. So if the jury find a special verdict, the charges of the jury shall be equally borne by both parties." And in the margin there is the following note: "In strictness, on a trial at Nisi Prius in the same county, they are only entitled to 8*d.*, and to 5*l.* on a trial at bar, where they come out of a foreign county;" citing Trials per Pais, 62, 216. And in Impey's Practice of the Common Pleas, 4th edit., published in 1794, at p. 398, there is the following passage: "I understand the talesmen are now paid the same as the special jury, and so they are in the King's Bench. Lord Mansfield said they served for a special purpose, therefore they ought to be paid the same as the special jurors; formerly it was otherwise." So far back as living memory extends, the fee to a special jurymen has been a guinea; and that fee appears to have been recognised by Acts of Parliament and sanctioned by the courts. It is true that it seems to depend upon usage, but many similar payments, and most important rights and privileges, have no other foundation than the usage and practice of the courts; and, the payment in question being only a just and reasonable remuneration to the jury for their labour and services, we are of opinion that it may and ought to be sanctioned as it has hitherto been. No authority has been produced to the contrary; and we are of opinion that the fees in this case were properly paid, and that the amount of them and also the other costs of the jury were properly allowed. The rule was moved as an experiment, and must be discharged with costs.

Rule discharged.

LIDGETT v. SECRETAN.

Marine insurance—Policy on ship—Conclusion of risk —Moored at anchor in good safety.

In a Lloyd's policy on ship, the risk was described "at and from London to Calcutta and for thirty days after arrival," and "upon the said ship, &c. until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety."

The ship after sustaining damage at sea to such an extent as to require incessant pumping to keep her afloat, arrived in the harbour of Calcutta, and was anchored on the 28th Oct. 1866. The captain gave the pilot the usual certificate that she was properly moored, and left in safety. Her passengers and cargo were discharged by the 8th Nov.

LIDGETT v. SECRETAN.

On the 12th Nov. she was taken into a dry dock in order that her injuries might be repaired. On the 5th Dec. in the course of her repairs, she was wholly destroyed by fire.

Held, that the words "moored at anchor in good safety" referred to the safety of the ship and not the moorings, but that they did not mean that the vessel was to arrive without any danger or injury from the effects of the voyage, nor on the other hand would they be satisfied by the vessel arriving and being moored in a sinking state, or as a mere wreck, or by a mere temporary mooring; that the underwriters were not responsible on a policy in these terms after the expiration of thirty days from the arrival and mooring of the vessel, and her having remained as a vessel and in possession or control of her owners, though not sound, for twenty-four hours; and that in the present case the vessel, though considerably damaged and leaky, and with one compartment full of water, existed as a ship at the time of her arrival, and was so safely moored that the underwriter's risk was concluded before the fire took place.

This was an action brought upon two policies of insurance upon the ship Charlemagne to recover certain losses as hereinafter more fully stated. Besides counts upon the policies the declaration contained a money count for the recovery of the premiums paid under the policies. The defendant to the money count pleaded never indebted, and to the residue of the declaration, payment into court of the sum of 100*l.* in full satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claims, and to this plea the plaintiffs replied that the sum so paid in was not sufficient to satisfy their claims.

The cause came on for trial at the Guildhall in the City of London, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term 1868, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, when it was ordered by the court with the consent of the parties, that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed in the declaration subject to the opinion of the court upon a special case.

The following statements appeared in the case:

The plaintiffs are shipowners in London carrying on business under the style and firm of John Lidgett and Sons, and the defendant is an underwriter at Lloyd's.

In July 1866 the plaintiffs were the owners of an iron sailing ship built at Glasgow in the year 1865, called the Charlemagne, of the burden of 1125 tons.

The plaintiffs being about to send the said vessel on a voyage to Calcutta and home to the United Kingdom, effected policies of insurance for 17,000*l.* upon the vessel valued at 20,000*l.*, and the policy was expressed to be "at and from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival," and was further expressed to be "upon the said ship until she had moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The Lloyd's policy was underwritten by the defendant for 150*l.* The plaintiffs also effected another policy on the Charlemagne "at and from Calcutta to London," on the usual Lloyd's form. The defendant underwrote this policy for the sum of 100*l.* The whole amount for which this policy was underwritten was 10,100*l.*

On the 22nd July 1866 the Charlemagne sailed from London on her voyage to Calcutta with cargo. She called at Plymouth, and there took in about 400 troops. She proceeded on her voyage with, for the most part, fair weather and light variable winds, until they reached the Bay of Bengal; she was not very heavily laden, and drew about 18ft. 6in. of water.

On 24th Oct., about 1 p.m., the ship struck the ground heavily upon a reef or bank, called the Mutlah Bank, and continued doing so for about one hour, but only at intervals, there being always not less than four fathoms of water; the captain then let go the port bow anchor, for the purpose of canting the head of the vessel to the eastward, and used every effort to get her clear of the bank by stress of sail; but after 110 fathoms of the chain cable had been paid out, the chain parted, and the ship's head fell off to the south-west again. She was then on the outer edge of a bank known as the Mutlah Bank. The captain then deemed it best for the safety of the vessel, passengers and cargo, to force her over the bank, and for this purpose to throw over a portion of the cargo and stores in order to lighten her. Accordingly the crew and passengers jettisoned a large quantity of the cargo and stores and all sails were set, and the vessel thus lightened gradually worked her way over the bank at 2 p.m.

They then proceeded on their voyage to Calcutta under easy sail, and at 5 p.m. they sighted the Mutlah light ship, and were in the mouth of the River Hooghley: they then found the after compartment of the vessel full of water.

This compartment was water-tight, as hereinafter mentioned, and contained stores, principally wine. It was about 24ft. broad, 16ft. long, and 13ft. deep, the bulkhead separating it from the main hold was of iron, from the keel up to the between decks a height of 13ft., up to which height the compartment was water-tight. The bulkhead from the between decks to the flooring of the main deck was of wood.

There was no pump in this compartment, and the means of letting any water that might accumulate in it get to the ship's pumps was by a sluice at the bottom of the iron bulkhead, which was usually kept closed, but could be opened when required by means of a rod attached to the slide of the valve which communicated with the deck. Upon the leakage being discovered attempts were made to lift the sluice, but the rod broke and the sluice could not be opened. The cargo in the mainhold next to the sluice consisted of iron bars. If the sluice could have been opened the compartments would have been kept free of water by means of the ship's pumps.

Besides the leakage before mentioned it was also discovered that from the injuries the vessel had sustained whilst striking on the bank, the steering apparatus was damaged, and so deranged that it was impossible to put the helm more than about a quarter over to port.

The sluice above described not being available, a fire engine or force pump, which was ordinarily used for washing the decks, was employed to pump the water out of the compartment. The pump was worked by the troops, and the water was carried on deck in buckets and thrown overboard. About ten men were employed at the pump at a time, and eighteen in passing the buckets on deck; a hole was also cut in the bulkhead above the between decks so as to allow any water rising above the level of the iron bulkhead to escape over the between decks into the hold, and so come within reach of the main pumps of the vessel. The efforts of the troops, however, sufficed to keep the water below the level of the between decks and within the water-tight compartment.

The troops continued in the manner above-mentioned night and day to pump and bale the water until their arrival at Calcutta, when they were relieved by the Lascars, as hereinafter stated, and in this way the water was kept down, though the compartment was not emptied of water.

After sighting the light ship, the vessel was kept in sight of it, and under easy sail all that night.

On the next day, the 25th Oct., at half-past five a.m. they steered towards the pilot brig, which was then at anchor inside the light vessel, and got a pilot, when they set all sail, and sailed up the channel till seven p.m., when they came to anchor in Sangor Road, where they remained all night.

LIDGETT v. SECRETAN.

On the 26th Oct. they had fine weather throughout, and at one p.m. they engaged the steamship Electric to tow them up to Calcutta. The pilot who knew that the ship had been aground, and saw the pumping going on, would not get her under weigh as the tide did not suit.

On the following morning, the 27th Oct., at seven a.m., they were taken in tow by the steam tug Electric, which had been engaged as before mentioned, and they proceeded till seven p.m., when they came to anchor again below Garden Reach, and on the following morning the ship was again taken in tow, and at eight a.m. came to anchor in the river opposite Calcutta, and was there properly and securely moored in the usual way, and in accordance with the regulations of the port. The place where she was moored is within the Harbour of Calcutta, and is a place where vessels commonly discharge their cargo. A certificate was then given by the captain to the pilot, in which he stated that the ship "had been properly moored in a clear berth with thirty fathoms cable beyond the hawse each way, and Mr. J. H. Baldwin (the pilot) leaves her in safety." The certificate was dated the 28th Oct. 1866.

As they were proceeding up the channel to the above-mentioned anchorage, owing to the defective state of the steering apparatus, they ran foul of a buoy at a sharp turning of the river, and carried off the basket.

When the vessel was moored the troops were immediately disembarked. A fire engine was got from the shore, and twelve Lascars were hired to assist in pumping the water out of the after compartment. The Lascars came on board on the 28th Oct., and with their assistance for the first three days sixteen of the crew worked the engine, and the leak was got under control. The discharge of the cargo was proceeded with quickly, and was safely completed by the 8th Nov. As the cargo was discharged and the vessel lightened, the leak became less, and the compartment was kept nearly free of water. In the course of the discharge, the sluice before mentioned was opened. From that time the water was completely under command of the ship's pumps, and the Lascars, who up to this time had been continuously employed, were discharged. After this period the vessel did not make more than half an inch of water each hour.

All the vessels lying in the Hooghly are exposed to several sources of danger, for example, at the time of the year in question, there are powerful currents in the Hooghly running in opposite directions, a superficial one of several feet in depth running downwards to the sea, and a deeper one running up to the country. These currents are sometimes strong enough to tear a ship from her moorings. Hence, all vessels so lying are in some peril, and a vessel whose steering apparatus is injured, is in greater peril than one whose steering apparatus is in good order. The same effect is also to be produced by what is called the Bore. This consists of a rapid and powerful influx of water from the sea at a height of several feet above the river level.

The discharge of the vessel was completed with the exception of 200 tons of iron which were left in for ballast, and she was ready to go into dock on the 8th Nov., and there were docks able and ready to have taken her. On the 12th Nov. the vessel being in the state above described, was taken to the Union Dry Dock at Howrah, for survey and repairs. The vessel dredged up the river to the dock in the usual way without steam-tug or any other assistance, and was steered with the assistance of a sail attached to the stern. This mode of assisting the steering is not uncommon in the Hooghly with vessels whose steering apparatus is in disorder.

Before going into dock the after compartment was allowed to fill with water, the object being to see when she was in the dry dock where the water could penetrate. The water did in fact leak in at the butts and rivets throughout the damaged parts. She was then carefully examined and a report was made by the surveyors on the 4th Nov. as follows:—

We, the undersigned surveyors of shipping, have, at the request of Messrs. Samuel Smith, Son, and Company this day surveyed the ship Charlemagne, Capt. Luckie, now lying in the Upper Union Dock of Howrah, where she has been placed, in consequence of her having struck on a sand bank outside the Hooghly, and after careful examination we report as follows:—

The ship Charlemagne was lying fair on the blocks, the docks being dry, and we found the following damage to have been sustained:

That the keel aft had been knocked over to starboard to the extent of 4.70in. in the space of 20ft. from aft, taking the original line of the keel as being straight, and it also deviates the same quantity, 4.70in. from a vertical line drawn down the stern post in a space of 19ft. measured up from the keel, and in consequence on the port or convex side, the butts in seven strakes or plates are badly strained to the extent of about 1.7in., and in this space the rivets are loosened.

The first scarp of the keel from aft between the plates has opened, and is leaking, although not so much strained on the starboard or concave side; three butts are weeping and some rivets strained, but nothing to compare with the opposite side.

The lower rudder brace is loose and the fly of the rudder is bent.

We therefore recommend that the rudder be unshipped and straightened, and that the plates in the defective part of the ship be removed in sufficient number to enable the workmen to bring the keel and sternpost to their regular position.

It may be necessary for straightening the rudder to remove two plates.

We recommend the whole of the bottom to be scraped and scaled, and the rivets and butts carefully examined below the water line.

When the plating is off we will hold another survey.

In addition to the damage stated by this survey, it was found after the plates had been removed that a few more rivets were broken than was at first supposed. Owing to these injuries the rudder would not go over to port more than about one quarter of the necessary distance.

Leakage through the joints, butts and rivets of an iron ship when at rest, is indicative of much more serious damage and of much greater risk and danger to a ship when the ship is afloat and liable to be exposed to weather, than the same leakage would indicate in a wooden ship.

To repair these various injuries the captain gave instructions to take down a certain number of plates in the way of the damage, and then to apply fire to the stern-post and keel to straighten them. By the 1st and 2nd Dec. all the plates which the captain wished removed had been removed, and fires were then placed under the keel by the captain's orders to straighten it. This was done, and fires were then applied to the stern-post for the same purpose. The stern-post had been partially straightened, and a fire was again applied to it on the afternoon of the 5th Dec. to complete the work. About dusk of that day the fire was drawn, and the carpenters began to set the small curve which remained in the stern-post, when it was discovered that the ship had taken fire inside, and notwithstanding all efforts to extinguish the fire it gained on them and totally destroyed the vessel.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled under the above circumstances to recover against the defendant for a total loss under the outward policy. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are so entitled, it is then according to the terms of the said order to be left to the arbitrator to determine what

LIDGETT v. SECRETAN.

sum of money the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon that basis, in addition to the sum of money paid into court, and judgment is then to be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum and costs. But if the court should be of a contrary opinion, it is then to be left to the arbitrator to determine whether the said sum of 100*l.* is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claims for the general and particular average under the outward policy and the total loss under the homeward policy, and, if not, what further sum the plaintiffs are entitled to, and if the arbitrator should find the said sum not sufficient judgment is then to be entered for the plaintiffs for such further sum in addition to the said sums so paid into court with costs, and if the arbitrator should find the said sum is sufficient the judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs.

The material words of the two policies were as follows:—Policy for outward voyage upon ship valued at 20,000*l.*, "lost or not lost, at and from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival, with leave to embark troops at Portsmouth. . . . And further until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever, shall be arrived at Calcutta, upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed."

Policy for return voyage on ship valued at 20,000*l.*, "lost or not lost, at and from Calcutta to London, with leave to disembark troops at a port in the Channel," with a clause as to arrival at London exactly the same as the clause in the other policy concerning arrival at Calcutta.

Sir G. Honyman, Q.C. (with whom were Watkin Williams and Cohen) argued for the plaintiffs that, in order to give effect to all the words in the policy, the defendant's risk must extend for thirty days after the ship had been moored at anchor for twenty-four hours without accident or danger of accident. That the thirty days are to be reckoned after the expiration of the twenty-four hours was decided by The Mercantile Marine Insurance Company, Limited, v. Titherington, 5 B. & S. 765. As to the meaning of the words "moored at anchor in good safety," it was held in Shaw v. Felton, 2 East, 109, that it was not sufficient that a ship had arrived at safe moorings, but she must be in a state of security also. [BRETT, J.—Arnould says, 3rd edit. p. 395, she must be "in such a state of physical safety that she can keep afloat while her cargo is being unloaded."] That definition is not borne out by the cases cited, all of which go further; the test according to the cases seems to be whether the ship was in such a state that a homeward policy could attach.

J. C. Mathew (with whom was Mellish, Q. C.) for the defendants contended that the words "in good safety" related only to perils which might arise during the first twenty-four hours after arrival, and that the destruction of the ship took place seven, if not eight, days after the conclusion of the defendant's risk. He cited

Sir G. Honyman, in reply.—The contention of the defendant gives no effect whatever to the words "in good safety."

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 7.—BOVILL, C. J. delivered the judgment of himself, Willes and Brett, J.J.—The policy in this case, which was upon the ordinary printed form of a Lloyd's policy, was effected by the plaintiffs on their iron sailing ship Charlemagne. The risk was described in writing to be "at and from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival ;" and by the other terms of the policy was to continue until the said ship, &c., should be moored at Calcutta. Then followed the usual printed words, "upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The ship left London for Calcutta, and, after sustaining damage at sea, arrived in the river Hooghly in the month of October 1866. She was then taken in tow by a steam-tug, and brought to moorings at an usual place of discharge within the harbour of Calcutta, where she came to anchor and was moored on the 28th Oct. The captain gave the pilot the usual certificate that she was then properly moored and left in safety. She had brought troops from England, who then disembarked, and her cargo was unloaded and completely and safely discharged by the 8th Nov., with the exception of 200 tons of iron, which were left in her for ballast. On the 12th Nov., she was taken from the moorings to a dry dock for survey and repairs ; and, in the course of her repairs in the dock, the vessel accidentally caught fire and was wholly destroyed on the 5th Dec. It was found in the case that the vessel had sustained considerable damage from striking on a reef or bank before she reached Calcutta, whereby she became much strained, and injured and leaky. Considerable repairs were necessary ; and she required extraordinary pumping, at first by the troops on board, and afterwards by an engine and Lascars from the shore, to get her clear of the water which was in one of her compartments. She was also injured in her rudder or steering apparatus, so as materially to affect her steering ; and she was in danger of breaking from her moorings from the current and bore of the river Hooghly ; and, if she had broken away, the defect in her steerage would have further endangered her. But, notwithstanding these matters, she remained at her moorings for more than twenty-four hours as a ship, though damaged, and safely discharged her cargo. Under these circumstances, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that he was entitled to recover as for a total loss by fire ; and on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff was only entitled to claim in respect of the partial loss by sea damage before the arrival of the ship at her moorings, and that he was not entitled to claim anything in respect of the loss by fire, because that was incurred after the termination of the risk under the policy. If the thirty days covered by the policy are to be reckoned from the time of the ship's arrival at Calcutta, either in the sense of arrival in the port, or arrival at, and being finally moored at an ordinary place of mooring and discharge within the port, then, as the fire and loss of the vessel did not occur until the thirty-eighth day after she was to be moored at Calcutta, viz., the 5th Dec., the loss would not come within the policy ; but, if the risk was extended, and continued beyond such thirty days, by reason of the printed words "until she hath moored at anchor in good safety," and of the vessel having been moored in a damaged state as described, then the ship was covered by this policy at the time of the fire on the 5th Dec., and the defendant would be liable for the total loss by fire. Whether the thirty days were in this case to be reckoned from the arrival only of the vessel at Calcutta, or from her having been moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, it is not necessary to determine, because we are all of opinion that, even in the latter view, the defendant is entitled to judgment. Assuming, then, that the thirty days are to be reckoned from the time of the ship being moored for twenty-four hours in good safety, the question arises, what is the meaning of those words in such a policy? We are of opinion that the meaning is not, as has been contended, that the moorings are safe, but that the words refer to the ship being in safety. The words cannot mean that the vessel is to arrive without any damage or injury whatever from the effects of the voyage; otherwise, the loss of a mast, or even a spar, a sail, or a rope, though the vessel was perfectly fit to keep not only the river but the sea, would, contrary to all the ordinary meaning of language, prevent her from being considered as in safety. So, on the other hand, the words would not, in our opinion, be satisfied by the vessel arriving and being moored in a sinking state, or as a mere wreck, or by a mere temporary mooring. We think also that the mere liability to damage, whether partial or total, during the twenty-four hours, by the occurrence of some or all of the perils insured against, cannot prevent the running of the twenty-four hours, because the extension of the period of risk for twenty-four hours after having moored in good safety, clearly implies that, notwithstanding the safety intended, the ship is liable to partial or total loss by the occurrence of a peril insured against. The American decision upon that point of Bill v. Mason was on the ground that, although the ship was during twenty-four hours after being moored liable to damage or total loss, she was not in fact either lost or in that case even damaged. Where, on the other hand, a ship arrived in port in a sinking state, and, on being moored, was obliged to be lashed to a hulk in order to keep her afloat until the people on board were landed, and where she sank on being moved towards the shore, it was held that she was not moored in safety, because the court considered that she in fact arrived as wreck, and not as a ship: (Shaw v. Felton). So where a vessel arriving in a hostile port with simulated papers, had her papers immediately taken, and her hatches sealed down by the officers of Government, although she was not formally condemned until afterwards, it was held that she had not been moored in safety for twenty-four hours, because she was in effect within the twenty-four hours taken from her owners by a foreign Government: (Horney v. Lushington.) Nor was a vessel which had been for a short period moored to a wharf, but within twenty-four hours was ordered into quarantine, and, whilst there, but more than twenty-four hours after the original temporary mooring, was lost by a peril insured against, considered to have moored in good safety, because, as it would seem, she had not, before the loss in respect of which the claim was made, been finally moored at the ordinary place of mooring: (Waples v. Eames.) Where a vessel, after being moored, remained in actual safety as a ship for twenty-four hours, and so that during the twenty-four hours her owners had complete and undisturbed possession of her, but afterwards she was seized in consequence of the master having smuggled before her arrival, it was held that the terms of the policy were satisfied, and that the loss by the seizure was a loss after the termination of the risk: (Lockyer v. Offley.) In that case, Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "There must be some certain and reasonable limitation in point of time laid down by the court when the insurer shall be released from his engagement. If he be liable for a month, he may be for a year, and so on. And we all think that the law on insurances would be left unsettled and in much confusion if any other time were suggested than that prescribed by the policy, viz., the continuance of the voyage, and the ship's being moored twenty-four hours in safety." In the present case, the vessel, though considerably damaged and leaky, and with one compartment full of water, existed as a ship at the time of her arrival, and she was able to keep afloat, and did keep afloat as a ship for more than twenty-four hours after being moored, by exerting the means within the power of the captain. She arrived and moored at the ordinary place for unloading, and was so moored as a ship in the possession or control of her owners for more than twenty-four hours; and she remained as a ship, and in possession of her owners for more than thirty days after the lapse of the twenty-four hours before described, and until the time of the fire by which she was totally lost. If the underwriters are liable beyond thirty days from her being so moored for twenty-four hours, it is difficult under such circumstances to see where the liability is to end. We think the only safe rule in this case is to hold that, after the expiration of thirty days from the arrival and mooring of the vessel, and her having remained as a vessel, and in possession or control of her owners, though not sound, for twenty-four hours, the underwriters were not responsible. We are, therefore, of opinion that there was not a total loss within the period of risk covered by this policy, and that our judgment should be for the defendant.

THE THETIS.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law

THE THETIS.

Salvage—Deviation—Master's authority.

The steamer T. fell in with the steamer S., which was in a disabled state, and the master of the T. undertook to tow the S. into port for a certain sum. He had never received instructions of any sort from his owners as to salvage services, and the policy of insurance and bills of lading of the T. provided that she might assist and tow vessels in all situations. The T., in attempting to take the S. in tow, came into collision with and sunk her, the T. being solely to blame.

Held, the master of the T. was acting within the scope of his general authority, and the owners therefore were liable.

Semble, this would be the case even had there been no such provisions in the policy and bills of lading.

This was a cause of damage. The facts were as follows:—

The Sardis was a screw steamer of 1634 net, and 1800 gross tonnage. She had a crew of forty-one hands, and was bound from Smyrna to London. In the prosecution of her voyage she left Gibraltar on the 29th Dec. When she had passed the Gut, and was about seventy miles north-west of Cape Trafalgar, an accident happened to her engines, which prevented them from working, and she began to drift, and she was hove to. Between eleven and twelve the next morning the Thetis was descried, and signalled to take the Sardis in tow. The Thetis was a screw steamer of 548 tons, with engines of ninety-horse power, carrying merchandise and passengers from Marseilles to London. She was navigated by a crew of twenty-one hands. She came up with the Sardis, and her captain came on board, and it was arranged, after some negotiations, that the Thetis should tow the Sardis back to Gibraltar for 400l.

While the Thetis was endeavouring to commence to tow the Sardis a collision occurred between the two vessels by which the Sardis was so much damaged that she soon afterwards sunk.

It appeared that the policy of insurance on the Thetis contained a clause giving her leave to tow and assist vessels in all situations, and the bills of lading provided that she "might assist and tow vessels in all situations." The owners of the Thetis had neither authorised nor forbidden the master to render salvage services.

The Court, assisted by Trinity Masters, was of opinion that the collision was caused by the unskilful and unseamanlike manœuvring of the Thetis, and pronounced her solely to blame.

Milward, Q. C. and Clarkson for the owners of the Thetis, then contended that the master of the Thetis was not acting within the scope of his authority as agent for the owners, and that they were therefore not liable for the damage, and referred to

The Julia, Lush. 224.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It has been contended that I ought not to condemn the owners of the Thetis, or render them liable for the damages of this collision, because the master of the Thetis was not acting within the scope of his authority as their agent, or in the course of his employment as their servant in attempting to assist the Sardis, which attempt led to the collision in question. In support of this contention a number of cases were cited to the Court from reports of the decisions at common law. The last case upon this subject of responsibility of the principal for the act of his agent is that of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank. Mr. Justice Willes delivered the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in this case, and observed as follows:—"The general rule is that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent, as is committed in the cause of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved. That principle is acted upon every day in running-down cases; it has been applied also to direct trespass to goods, as in the case of holding the owners of the ships liable for the act of masters abroad improperly selling the cargo. It has been held applicable to actions of false imprisonment in cases where officers of railway companies, intrusted with the execution of bye-laws relating to imprisonment, and intending to act in the course of their duty, improperly imprison persons who are supposed to come within the terms of the bye-laws. It has been acted upon where persons employed by the owners of boats to navigate them and to take fares, have committed an infringement of a ferry, or such like wrong. In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master has not authorised the act. It is true he has not authorised the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in. It has been argued that upon the principle of these cases the owner of The Thetis was not responsible for the wrongful act of the master, inasmuch as the latter had no authority, express or implied, to perform a salvage service. I was referred to the case of The Rising Sun, decided in the district court of Maine (Ware, 378). I have perused the judgment in that case, but have not been able to extract from it any assistance for the decision of the point of law before me. According to the evidence of the master in the case before me, he had received no instructions from his owners with respect to performing salvage service, and the owner deposed, "I have never authorised nor forbidden my ships to render salvage service—it has never come before me." Now it is to be remembered, in the first place, that the master of a ship is not an ordinary agent, but one of a special kind sui generis; secondly, that the rendering of salvage services is an obligation required by the dictates of humanity, by the principles of public policy, and by the general interests of society, and has been recognised as such by the practice and jurisprudence of every civilised state. "It is the duty," Lord Howell says, in the case of The Waterloo, 2 Dodson's Ad. Rep., p. 437, of all ships to give succour; others in distress; none but a freebooter would withhold it." It has been urged upon me that the act of the master in this case could not have been within the scope of his commission, and was not for the benefit of the owners, because a deviation for the purpose of rendering salvage service to property would, upon general principles, avoid a policy of insurance, but that is an undecided and very doubtful proposition of English law, and certainly one to which I cannot give my assent. It was, at all events, pronounced by the Privy Council in 1866 to be an undecided point of law: (The True Blue, L. Rep. 1 P. C. C. 254-5; see also Maclachlan on Shipping, 363.) I am aware that the American courts appear to have made a distinction between a deviation for the purpose of saving life and for that of saving property; it is, perhaps, not quite so certain, however, as generally supposed, that such distinction has been finally established: (2 Parson's Mar. Law, Bk. 2, c. 8, p. 298; 3 Kent's Com. 313-14, and note.) If it be necessary that I should express my opinion whether upon general principles of law the owner of the Thetis was responsible for the act of the master in causing this collision, I should express it in the affirmative. I think, having regard to the principles of law respecting salvage service, the master, though not directly authorised to do the particular act, was, to borrow the expression of Willes, J., "the agent in his place to do that class of acts," and that by the negligent performance of an act of this class the damage which is the subject of this suit was caused; and, therefore, that the owner "must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in." But, in truth, when I find in the policy of insurance appertaining to this ship, a clause giving her leave to tow and assist vessels in all situations, and that it is provided in the bills of lading that she may "assist and tow vessels in all situations," I entertain little doubt that it is not competent to the owner to deny that the attempt to save the Thetis was within the scope of the authority, and in the course of the employment of the master. There is one further argument which I must not omit to notice, namely, that the master of the Sardis took upon himself the risk of employing the Thetis, and thereby exempted the owner from responsibility for the act of his agent, and for this proposition the case of Fletcher v. Rylands, in the Exchequer Chamber, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 265, was cited as an authority, but I do not think that the circumstances of this case support the proposition of fact to which this law is to be applied. The Thetis must have known her own power, and she adopted her own measures for the performance of the service which, as the evidence shows, she voluntarily and deliberately undertook; she was perfectly aware of the size, character, and condition of the vessel which she agreed to tow. No concealment or deception was practised. The damage was by no means in the category of a necessary or inevitable accident, but was caused, as I have already stated, by the negligence and unskilfulness with which the Thetis was navigated. I therefore pronounce the Thetis alone to blame for this collision.

STAFFORD ASSIZES.

[STAFFORD ASSIZES.]

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—CROWN COURT.

Tuesday, March 15.

(Before LUSH, J.)

REG. v. WILLIAM TURNER.

Embezzlement—"Clerk or servant"—Commission.

The prisoner agreed with the prosecutor, a manufacturer of earthenware, to act as his traveller, and "diligently employ himself in going from town to town in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and soliciting orders for the printed and decorated earthenware manufactured by" the prosecutor, and that he would not, without the consent in writing of the prosecutor, "take or execute any order for vending or disposing of any goods of the nature or kind aforesaid, for or on account of himself or any other person." It was further agreed that the prisoner should be paid by commission, and should render weekly accounts.

The prosecutor subsequently gave the prisoner written permission to take orders for two other manufacturers. The prisoner being indicted for embezzlement under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68.

Held, that he was a "clerk or servant" of the prosecutor within the meaning of that statute. Reg. v. Bowers, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 1, C. C. R. 41; and Reg. v. Marshall, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 796, cited and distinguished.

The prisoner was indicted for embezzlement.

The indictment charged that he on the 23rd April 1869, being then a servant to Richard Edwards, did by virtue of his employment, and while he was so employed as aforesaid, receive and take into his possession certain money, to wit, the sum of 34*l.* for the said Richard Edwards his master, and then fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle the same.

Two other counts followed of a similar form but relating to different sums.

Motteram and Brindley for the prosecution.

Young for the prisoner.

The prosecutor, a manufacturer of earthenware at Burslem, had employed the prisoner as his traveller under a written agreement, the material parts of which ran thus:

The said Charles William Turner, for the considerations hereinafter mentioned (viz., a commission), for himself, his executors and administrators, hereby agrees to and with the said Richard Edwards, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he the said Charles William Turner, from the day of the date hereof, shall and will act as the traveller of the said Richard Edwards, and diligently employ himself in going from town to town in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and soliciting orders for the printed and decorated earthenware manufactured by the said Richard Edwards, at such prices and on such terms as shall be from time to time set forth in a schedule of prices to be delivered to him by and under the hand of the said Richard Edwards, and further that he the said Charles William Turner shall and will use his best endeavours and means to sell and dispose of the same goods at such prices and terms, and in all cases when he shall not receive any express direction relative thereto, will so act therein as will, to the best of his judgment, be most beneficial to the said Richard Edwards. And also, that he the said Charles William Turner shall and will pay and defray out of his own proper moneys all his travelling and hotel and other expenses. And shall not nor will without the consent in writing of the said Richard Edwards, at any time during the continuance of the agreement, take or execute any order for vending or disposing of any goods of the nature or kind aforesaid for or on account of himself or any other person or persons except the said Richard Edwards.

In other clauses it was further agreed that the prisoner should be paid by a commission payable quarterly, and that he should forthwith account for and "pay over unto the said Richard Edwards . . . all sums of money, bills, notes, and securities," which should have been received by or come to his hands for or on account of the said Richard Edwards. A supplemental agreement was afterwards entered into by the parties, by which it was arranged that the prisoner should cease to take orders in London, and another supplemental agreement provided that the prisoner should render his accounts weekly.

The agreements were put in and read. Evidence was given of acts of embezzlement.

From the cross-examination of the prosecutors' manager, it appeared that Mr. Richard Edwards had given the prisoner permission in writing to sell china for Mr. Baguley, of Hanley, another manufacturer, and also to sell for Messrs. Edwards of Longton; and the witness admitted that he knew that the prisoner had collected accounts for Messrs. Minton and Co. since he had been in the employ of the prosecutor.

These facts having been elicited,

Young submitted that the prisoner was not a "clerk or servant" within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68, and that there was nothing on the face of the agreement to show that he was bound to employ his whole time for the benefit of the prosecutor; on the contrary, the prosecutor had given him permission to take orders for other manufacturers. A variation had been made with reference to the time of rendering the account. In Reg. v. Bowers, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 41, it was held that "a person who is employed to get orders for goods, and to receive payment for them, but who is at liberty to get the orders and receive the money where and when he thinks proper, being paid by a commission on the goods sold, is not a clerk or servant within the meaning of this Act. In the present case the prisoner was paid by commission only.

LUSH, J.—In Reg. v. Bowers (sup.) there had been a material alteration in the position of the parties; the prisoner having been originally a traveller had set up business on his own account.

Young.—It cannot be said that the prisoner's whole time was at the disposal of the prosecutor in this case. In Reg. v. Marshall, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S.

Ex parte ATKINSON; Re BROOKSBANK.

[BANK.

796, a traveller was paid by commission, received no salary, and was at liberty to go where he pleased for orders; and it was held that he was not a "clerk or servant" within the statute relating to embezzlement.

LUSH, J.—I was party to that decision, and I think it is very much against you. Here the prisoner was bound by the terms of the agreement "diligently to employ himself in going from town to town in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and soliciting orders;" surely he was obliged to devote his whole time to the service of the prosecutor.

When summing up to the jury the learned Judge, after distinguishing larceny from embezzlement, and commenting on the facts of the case, said: Now was the prisoner a "clerk or servant" within the meaning of the statute? That depends on the terms of his employment. If a person says to another carrying on an independent trade, "If you get any orders for me I will pay you a commission," and that person receives money and applies it to his own use, he is not guilty of embezzlement, for he is not a "clerk or servant;" but if a man says, "I employ you and will pay you, not by salary, but by commission," then the person employed is a servant. And the reason for such distinction is this—viz., that the person employing has no control over the person employed in the first case, but where, as in the second instance I have put, one employs another and binds him to use his time and services about his (the employer's) business, then the person employed is subject to control. Here Turner agrees with Mr. Edwards that he shall and will from the date of the agreement "act as the traveller of the said Richard Edwards, and diligently employ himself in going from town to town . . . and soliciting orders." It is, therefore, clear that he was employed as "clerk or servant" by Mr. Edwards, who had full control over his time and services.

Verdict guilty; sentence, eight months' imprisonment.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 194—Deed registered under—Provisions of sect. 197 applicable to—Examination of parties under.

It is competent to the court, at the instance of the trustees, to inquire into matters connected with a deed of assignment duly registered under the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and this jurisdiction of the court is expressly reserved and protected by the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act 1869.

The provisions of the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, are equally applicable to deeds registered under the 194th section as to those registered under the 192nd.

The decision of Lord Westbury, L.C., in Ex parte Morgan, 1 De G. J. & S., respecting the application of the 197th section to deeds registered under the 194th section dissented from.

This was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the County Court at Bradford.

On the 18th Aug. 1869, W. Brooksbank, the debtor, executed a conveyance of all his real, leasehold, and personal property and effects, to trustees for the benefit of his creditors with full powers of sale and administration as if they were assignees under a bankruptcy. The deed was duly registered on the 10th Sept. 1869, under the provisions of the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. The trustees, being desirous of inquiring into the position of the debtor, and as to his property and effects, obtained a summons for that purpose from the registrar of the County Court at Bradford for the attendance of a Mrs. Atkinson to be examined on the 24th Feb. 1870. This summons was duly served, and Mrs. Atkinson attended on the day appointed, but refused to be sworn until she had received her expenses. These having been paid, she, under the advice of her solicitor, still refused to be sworn and examined. The matter having been adjourned into court, was argued at length upon the 25th Feb., and upon the 8th March the learned judge delivered judgment, requiring the witness to submit to the examination. Mrs. Atkinson still refusing to give evidence, was thereupon adjudged guilty of a contempt, and a warrant, was signed for her committal to York Castle, there to be detained until the court, or the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy, should make order to the contrary.

This warrant was allowed to stand over to enable the witness to take the opinion of the Chief Judge upon the question by way of appeal. Notice of appeal was accordingly entered on the 10th March, and the following were therein stated as the reasons for such appeal:—

1. That the court had no jurisdiction to issue the summons under the deed.
2. That Mrs. Atkinson was not bound to submit to be sworn or examined.
3. That the summons was informal in not showing that the deed was registered, or the purpose for which the witness was to be examined.
4. That no proper day had been fixed by the order of the court, or, if so fixed, it was not the day upon which the summons was returnable.
5. That the affidavit upon which the summons was granted was not filed.
6. That the deed was not registered under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861.
7. That Mrs. Atkinson was not a creditor assenting to or bound by the deed.
8. That the only evidence produced was that the deed had been executed by the persons whose signatures were attested by Mr. Hutchinson, the solicitor to the trustees.

Green (solicitor) appeared for the appellant.—He contended that as the deed was not registered under the 192nd section of the Act of 1861, the court had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the provisions of the 197th section applied only to deeds registered under the 192nd section, and not to deeds registered under the 194th. These latter deeds were binding only upon the executing parties, and were registered for no other purpose than to be made available in evidence against them. Such deeds did not affect the rights of dissenting or non-executing parties who took no interest under them. Any such creditors seeking to upset a deed registered under the 194th section might proceed by action at common law, and that was their remedy. Moreover, the court had no jurisdiction to grant a summons for the examination of witnesses under a deed like that before the court, inasmuch as all the authority which the court might have had under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 was taken away by sect. 20, the repeal clause of the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act 1869, and the reservation in that section as to the past operation of the enactments repealed did not affect the repeal or diminish its

In Symons and Strong v. George, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 424, the only question decided was, that a deed registered under the 194th section was valid at common law. In that case the observations of Bramwell, B. were merely obiter dicta, and that learned judge afterwards decided the contrary way in Pearson v. Pearson, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 596. The only point decided in Pfander v. Richardson, 1 W. N. 335, was, that a deed might be good at common law, even though the conditions of the 192nd section were not complied with.

Bagley for the respondents, the trustees under the deed, contended that all the creditors, as well as the trustees, were entitled to examine into the deed, and to investigate any circumstances which they might have reason to believe were indicative of fraud upon the part of the debtor, and that, whether the deed was registered under the 192nd or the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 was immaterial. He also referred to sects. 120 and 267 of the Consolidation Act 1849, and sect. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861.

March 23.—The CHIEF JUDGE delivered the following judgment:—This case comes before the court by way of appeal from an order of the learned judge of the County Court held at Bradford. A deed for the arrangement of the affairs of a debtor named William Brooksbank was executed in August last, and duly registered under the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. By that deed the debtor conveyed and assigned all his real and personal estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, to be distributed according to the law in bankruptcy, and in consideration of such assignment the creditors, parties to the deed, released the debtor from all claims which they had against him. The trustees being desirous of examining certain persons in respect of the estate and affairs of the debtor, applied in the usual form to the court at Bradford for summonses to compel the attendance at the court of those persons for the purpose of such examination. Amongst others a summons was issued and duly served upon Mary Atkinson, one of such persons. In obedience to the summons she appeared before the court, but objected to be sworn until her expenses of attending were first paid to her. This objection was removed by the payment to and the acceptance by her of the sum she required; she then, through her solicitor, raised further objections, which were argued at considerable length, and the learned judge having taken time to consider the matter, delivered a very careful judgment, in which he dealt with the several points of objection which had been urged, and being of opinion that they could not be sustained, he overruled them. The witness summoned, acting under the advice of her solicitor, still refused to be sworn, and the learned judge thereupon made an order for her committal, by reason of the contempt of court in which she so persisted; but inasmuch as it was stated that she intended to appeal against the order, his Honour thought fit to suspend the execution of the order he had made for a period sufficient to enable her to bring on her appeal. That appeal is now made by, and in the name of, Mary Atkinson, by George Atkinson, her husband and next friend. The case has been fully argued before me, and the first objection taken is that the court has no jurisdiction in the matter, all such authority as may at any previous time have existed, being, it is said, extinguished by the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869, whereby the several statutes previously in force were repealed. It would obviously be a subject of great regret if by any omission or inaccuracy in the Act of 1869, such a mischievous consequence should follow. The object and purport of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, is to substitute a new law, and new modes of procedure in the place of those which had previously prevailed. It was no less its object and purport to continue, subject to the provisions of the new statutes, all such matters as had been commenced under the old law, and to provide for their being carried into full completion, by all such means as might be requisite for that purpose. Under the old law the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 gave to the court in bankruptcy full jurisdiction over the subject of trust-deeds which had been duly registered; and if that Act had remained unrepealed it is not open to doubt that the court of the Leeds district in which the debtor resided would have been the court in which all requisite proceedings must have been taken. By the effect of the 130th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and the General Orders made thereon, the jurisdiction of the Leeds court is transferred to the County Court whose order is the subject of this appeal. And by the 316th General Order all the jurisdiction and authority which the district bankruptcy courts had respecting trust-deeds, whether registered or in course of registration, on the 31st Dec. 1869, is vested in the County Courts to which the general jurisdiction in bankruptcy is now transferred. An attempt has been made to show that by a certain mode of construing the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869, this, the plain intention of the Legislature, has failed of effect, inasmuch as notwithstanding the repeal of the former statutes it is expressly enacted that such repeal shall not affect the validity of anything done or suffered before the commencement of that Act, or affect the course of any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy or otherwise under any such enactment; but that, subject to the provisions of the new statutes, such proceedings shall be prosecuted as if the new Act had not passed. I am of opinion that the attempt to impeach the order upon this ground wholly fails, and that the County Court of Bradford, being satisfied of the validity of the deed which had been registered, not only might, but ought to exercise jurisdiction over the subject; and that, whether as a "pending proceeding" or not, it was incumbent upon the court to exercise all such powers as it possessed to give full effect to the law applicable to a deed, the validity of which was in the most express terms saved and protected by the repealing Act. Another objection which has been raised is, that the deed, having been registered under the 194th section of the Act of 1861 only, does not fall within the provisions of the 197th section; and that the powers conferred upon the court by the latter section can only be exercised with respect to deeds registered under the 192nd and 193rd sections; and consequently that the court at Bradford has exceeded its authority by ordering the examination of a person who, it is admitted, would be compellable to answer if the 197th section were applicable; and it is said that this contention is warranted and supported by the authority of cases referred to in the argument. Considering the great number of deeds registered under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and the variety and magnitude of the interests which they may involve, it would be very inconvenient that any doubt should remain upon this subject; and it may, for this reason, be worth while to examine the cases which have been decided upon the point, and to consider what is the actual state of the law upon this subject. One of the principal features of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 was that division of it which related to trust deeds. It is headed, "As to trust-deeds for the benefit of creditors, composition and insolvency deeds executed by a debtor," and consists of nine sections, which together comprise the whole of the law in bankruptcy, to be administered upon this particular subject. The policy of the law seems to have been to facilitate arrangements between insolvent debtors and their creditors, and for this purpose to afford means other than the ordinary course of proceedings in bankruptcy, by which, under the circumstances prescribed, with the assent of a certain majority of the creditors, the several claims of the whole body of the creditors might be disposed of. This policy had been recognised by previous statutes, in which less perfect machinery was adopted, and which was laid aside in favour of the new regulations. To accomplish these objects with justice and safety to the general interests of creditors, and due regard to the established principles of law, a variety of provisions were indispensably necessary, and such of these as the Legislature thought it right to introduce are to be found in the division of the statute to which I have referred. There are, however, two leading principles which mainly govern the whole of these enactments; one is that, in the case where absent or non-assenting creditors are to be bound, sufficient publicity shall be given to the proposed arrangement by publication in the London Gazette, and that in every case all the creditors shall have convenient and accessible means of becoming acquainted with the details of the contract made between the parties, and the transaction by which their rights and interests are bound in some instances and affected in all. Thus, all such deeds as the clauses I have mentioned relate to must be registered at the same place by the same public officer, and within the same limited period of twenty-eight days, unless the court should otherwise order; the difference between them being that as to one class of deeds the assent of the prescribed number and amount of creditors is required previous to registration, whilst in the other no such assent is necessary. The reason of this difference is obvious: in the first case the provisions of the deed become binding upon all the creditors, assenting and non-assenting; whilst in the other, only those creditors are bound who have executed or assented to the deed. It is to me perfectly clear that the very reason and cause of the registration which is thus imperatively required, is that the subject matter of the deeds, in all its relations, and for its consequences, shall be by the very fact of the registration brought within the competence of the Court of Bankruptcy. After the best consideration I can bestow upon the subject, I have been unable to suggest any other reason for the requirements of the statute that the deeds should be registered in the manner prescribed, or for the provision which is made applicable to every such deed without distinction or exception than this, that, unless the requisitions are complied with, the deed as to which any such failure shall happen shall not be receivable in evidence; that is, that it shall fail wholly to accomplish the purpose for which it has been made. Keeping these considerations in mind, and reading the division of the statute I have mentioned as a whole, which I conceive to be the only proper mode of construing this or any other statute, the 197th section is perfectly well adapted to its purpose, and is free from any question or ambiguity. For that section submits to the judicial determination of the court in bankruptcy every question that can arise under the deeds referred to whatever may be their form or object; and, by introducing the rules of law, and the practice and procedure in bankruptcy, and applying them to the cases which may arise under deeds, it protects every right which the debtor or a creditor may possess, and enforces such right without any needless delay or expense. By the argument which has been urged on behalf of the appellant it is not disputed that if the deed in question had been registered under the 192nd section there would be no doubt that it would fall within the provisions of the 197th section, but it is also insisted that inasmuch as the deed has been registered only under the 194th section none of the powers conferred upon the court by the 197th section can be exercised. I confess myself wholly unable to come to such a conclusion, or even to follow the train of reasoning by which it is arrived at. Suppose a case in which every creditor had in the most formal manner assented to a deed. There would be no necessity for proving the requisite proportions in order to bind non-assenting creditors. Suppose such a deed duly registered under the 194th section. Is that to be treated as a nullity? Are the creditors who have executed in reliance upon the good faith of the debtor who may have forborne claims which they might have enforced, and who afterwards discover that their debtor had fraudulently possessed himself of, and made away with, the assets which were by the deed devoted to the satisfaction of their debts, to be told that this statute, which requires the registration of the deed in order to give it validity, affords them no protection? That its provisions, careful and elaborate as they are, do not extend so far as to do them justice? That instead of putting in operation the swift and simple machinery supplied by the 197th section, they must resort to the slow and expensive process of a suit in Chancery, or such other course of legal proceeding as they may be advised. To expound the statute in any such manner would, in my opinion, be at once to misunderstand its plain meaning, and to deprive it of its usefulness as a general law. But then it is said to have been decided that deeds, though registered under the 194th section, are not contemplated by or included in the provisions of the 197th section; and in support of this proposition the cases of Ex parte Morgan (sup.), and Pearson v. Pearson (sup.), are relied upon. It is needless to say to say that the decisions which have been come to by the Superior Courts are entitled to the utmost respect, not only because of the just eminence and learning of the judges by whom they have been pronounced, but because they form the rules by which all other courts are to be guided, and are in fact binding in all cases to which the principle of such decisions applies. But these considerations only make it the more necessary upon all occasions to consider, with the utmost care, the exact principle which has been decided, and not by the ingenious selection, and more or less artful criticism, of the terms in which learned judges have expressed themselves, to draw conclusions which are not only foreign to the case in which those terms were employed, but which serve to mislead and render uncertain the rules of law which the judges have laid down. It has been asserted that in Ex parte Morgan, Lord Westbury, whose great learning and ability are entitled to the utmost deference at all times, and who, in expounding the Bankruptcy Act 1861, spoke with a most intimate knowledge of the statute of which he was himself the author, decided that deeds registered under the 194th section did not fall within the provisions of the 197th section. After the fullest consideration of that case, with which I am not now for the first time acquainted, I can come to no such conclusion. The question in that case was whether or not a debtor who had executed a deed of arrangement with his creditors, but who, not having obtained the assents of creditors which were necessary for its registration under the 192nd section, had registered it under the 194th section, had thereby deprived his non-assenting creditors of their ordinary rights, one of which is to make bankrupt a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy. The bankrupt insisted that having so registered his deed he was entitled to all the protection given by the 197th and 198th sections in the same manner and to the same extent as if the deed had been registered under the 192nd section, and that his creditors assenting and non-assenting were bound by the deed. The commissioner in the country adopted this view, and dismissed a petition for adjudication which had been presented by a dissenting creditor. From that decision the appeal was brought before the Lord Chancellor, who, in an elaborate judgment, decided that the protection which the bankrupt claimed was not extended to him by the deed so registered. That the protection so claimed by the bankrupt was the main subject for consideration is apparent from the terms of the judgment, as reported. The Lord Chancellor, after having pointed out the manner and effect of the registration required by the 192nd section, says, "It is plain, therefore, that the protection intended to be given to a deed under the 194th section was a protection extending only to such deeds as should be duly registered in the manner and form required by that section." He then adverts to the other form of registration under the 194th section, which, he says, gives the power and imposes the obligation of registering any deed of composition or deed for the benefit of creditors which has not been registered under the 192nd section, and such deed, he observes, "is to be registered simply in the Court of Bankruptcy." He comments upon the penalty which ensues upon the neglect to observe the requirements of the statute, and upon the circumstance that the forms of registration in the two cases are different, whereby "the consequences of the one do not attach to the other," and says, "The consequence of an observance in every respect of the terms of the 192nd section is that the deed is binding on the minority of the creditors who do not execute or assent to it. No such consequence is attached to the registration under the 194th section." And again, adverting to the registration being in fact and in terms made under the 194th section, he says, "It is impossible, therefore, that that deed can now be set up as having been duly registered under the 192nd section, and if it be not duly registered under that section it is not binding upon the creditors who are not parties to or do not assent to it." And the conclusion of the judgment deals with and covers the only point which was in question, viz., whether a creditor, not bound by a deed so registered, could make use of the deed itself as evidence of an act of bankruptcy? The terms of this part of the judgment are remarkable and precise. The Lord Chancellor says:—"The point which I decide for the purposes of the present motion are these, that this deed was not registered under the 192nd and 193rd sections; that it was intentionally and by submission of the parties registered under the 194th section; that validity as against the use now attempted to be made of the deed, is not given by the 194th section; that the present petitioning creditors, therefore, are not bound by that deed, but may treat it as an act of bankruptcy, to which I think it amounts." I find, therefore, in this judgment a plain decision, upon precise grounds, of the only question which was raised and was essential for the decision of the appeal. If it be said that it goes further, and decides that none of the other provisions of this division of the statute apply to deeds registered under the 194th section, I can only say that I am unable to discover any such meaning in it, and am tempted to ask for what conceivable reason the Legislature should require a deed to be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy if that court was to lose all power and control over the proceedings which might ensue after the registration. The protection of the debtor, which might have been acquired by a different mode of registration, was undoubtedly not acquired; but the right of the creditors to invoke the aid of that court in which the deed had been registered, and to whose jurisdiction the debtor had submitted himself, for the purpose of enforcing its provisions, and of giving it full effect by such means as are within the administration of the court are in my judgment abundantly clear. It would surely be an unsatisfactory argument which should maintain that, because all the powers given to the court by the 197th section with respect to deeds registered under the 192nd need not and cannot be exercised with respect to deeds registered under the 194th section, therefore, whatever reason may exist for their exercise, such of the same powers as may be justly and usefully put in force for the benefit of debtors or creditors are to be neutralised and made inoperative. Not referring only to the case of Ex parte Lawrence, 1 De G. J. & S., but to the well-established principles and practice of the administration in bankruptcy with which no one was more intimately conversant than Lord Westbury, I am satisfied that he would be greatly surprised if he should learn that the construction which has been suggested could be put upon his judgment in Re Morgan (sup.) The case of Pearson v. Pearson (sup.), has also been cited in support of this appeal, and it cannot be denied that there are expressions attributed in the report to the learned baron by whom that case was decided which, if they were taken literally, and without reference to the subject to which they were applied, would be in favour of the proposition contended for, namely, that a deed registered under sect. 194, is not within or affected by the provisions of sect. 197. But let us see what the case was in which the judgment was pronounced. An action was brought by a solicitor as plaintiff to recover the money in which he declared that the defendant was indebted to him. The defendant pleaded, not that he was never indebted, but that the plaintiff had conveyed all his estate and effects to trustees, and that he had therefore deprived himself of the right to sue. The plaintiff replied in effect that his deed had been registered under the 194th section, not under the 192nd, and it was therefore argued on his behalf that the cause of action upon which he declared, and which is technically called a chose in action, had not passed to the trustees by the deed, such chose in action not being assignable at common law; and the single question for the court to decide was, whether by the effect of the 197th section the debt in question was vested in the trustees as if the debtor had become bankrupt, or whether the legal right to sue for it remained in the plaintiff. The justice of the case was apparent. The defence, if it might be called a defence, was utterly frivolous. It was clear that the assignment, whatever might be its consequences at law, was a good assignment in equity, and gave the trustee an equitable right to use the plaintiff's name for recovering the debt, although they could not b reason of a mere technicality assert that right to which they were unquestionably entitled in their own names. No doubt such a case presented the strongest temptation to the court to decide against so flimsy and unreasonable an attempt on the part of the debtor to delay, for he could only delay, the compliance with a just claim. And accordingly their Lordships adopted various ways of reading the statute. It was suggested that sect. 194 is parenthetical, that words might be interpolated in sect. 197, and that the registration prescribed by the previous sections is only such as is mentioned in sects. 192 and 193: And all this for the purpose of deciding that by a deed registered under sect. 194 a debtor's chose in action not thereby assignable at common law, were not by virtue of sect. 197 so vested in the trustees as to make them the only persons competent to sue at common law for their recovery. I do not, however, understand their Lordships to have said, and still less to have meant to say, that being parenthetical it was to be disregarded and treated as if it had been omitted, or that the legal and equitable rights which the deed purported to confer were extinguished, or that the trusts declared by it were not enforceable, or not within the powers of the Court of Bankruptcy, in which the deed is by the statute imperatively required to be registered. With the utmost deference, therefore, to the learned judges by whom that case was decided, and not presuming to question their decision upon the subject to which it applies, I must say that it seems to me to be no authority for the proposition that because a deed of assignment registered under sect. 194 does not enable the assignee to sue in his own name for a chose in action, which was the property of the assignor before the deed, therefore the 197th section has no application to such a deed, and that all the power and jurisdiction which, by the 197th section, is given to the Court of Bankruptcy over "every such deed" after registration is wholly ousted. It would, in my judgment, be utterly unreasonable and unjust so to read the decision in Pearson v. Pearson. But even if it were possible to do so there would arise the utter impossibility of reconciling that decision with others pronounced in the same Court of Exchequer, and by some, if not all, of the same learned judges. For in Hodgson v. Wightman, 1 H. & C. 810, in an action to recover the amount of certain bills of exchange, the defendant pleaded a composition-deed executed by the plaintiff and other creditors, which deed had not been registered; and the plaintiff insisted at the trial that the deed was not receivable in evidence by reason of the prohibition contained in the 194th section. The objection being allowed at the trial, and verdict being entered for the plaintiff, the court was moved to enter the verdict for the defendant. The judgment of the whole court was delivered by Wilde, B., who says, p. 818: "We construe sect. 194 of the new Bankruptcy Act to apply to all deeds whatever, which are or profess to be, or are obviously on the face of them intended to be, deeds of arrangement or agreement between the debtor and the whole body of his creditors. It was clearly, in our opinion, intended to include not only deeds complying with, and framed under the provisions of sect. 192, but all other deeds whereby a man may compound or arrange with the whole body of his creditors. We cannot read the several sections of the Act relating to deeds of arrangement and avoid the conclusion that the scope of the new Act was to subject all such arrangements to the operation, to some extent at least, of the bankrupt laws, leaving it, however, open to the parties, by express provision in the deed, to qualify or restrain the application of such laws." Symons v. George, 3 H. & C. 68, is another case decided in the same court, and by the same judges. The plaintiff's right depended upon a deed of composition registered under the 194th section, although the requisites of the 192nd section had not been complied with. The court decided, in effect, that the deed was within the 194th section, and that sect. 197 subject all such deeds, when registered, to the jurisdiction of the court in bankruptcy, and, not to quote the judgment of the other barons, these expressions of Bramwell B. go directly to the point:—"From the language of the 194th and 197th sections it does seem that, although this deed is not binding upon non-assenting creditors, its trusts may be administered under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, and with the assistance of the Court of Bankruptcy." Now, I have gone at greater length than I should otherwise have thought it necessary to do into the subject of this appeal, as well because I wished to express my entire concurrence with the learned judge whose order is objected to and who has exercised in pronouncing his decision the knowledge, discrimination, and patience, for which all who are acquainted with him know that he is eminent, as because the questions which have been raised may have a bearing upon other cases probably much more important than the present; and also because the law respecting deeds of arrangement and their consequences, depending partly upon the law as it existed before the commencement of the present year, and partly upon the statutes now in operation, ought to be known and understood, and preserved as free from doubt as possible. The conclusion I have come to is that the original contention on the part of the appellant and the present appeal are wholly unsustainable. Some merely technical or formal objections are stated in the notice of motion, but as they have not been argued it is unnecessary that I should observe upon them, further than to say they are not entitled to serious consideration. The order made in the County Court remains in its full force. The only order, therefore, which it is proper to make upon this appeal is, that this motion be dismissed with costs, to be paid by George Atkinson, the husband and next friend of the appellant, Mary Atkinson, to Isaac Rushbrook and Mr. Joseph Smith, the respondents, and that the sum of 20*l.*, which has been deposited with the registrar, be handed over to the said Isaac Rushbrook and Joseph Smith, and be received by them in part satisfaction of the costs hereby ordered to be paid.

Where, under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, a petition has been presented and a resolution passed at a meeting of creditors, such resolution cannot be registered unless all the creditors have received notice of the meeting.

Bagley applied, ex parte, on behalf of the debtor for the direction of the court under the following circumstances: The debtor having filed his petition under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, called a meeting of his creditors to take place on the 24th March at Bangor. creditors were present whose debts amounted to upwards of 3000*l.*, and it was resolved to accept a composition of 10*s.* in the pound, but Mr. Keene, the registrar of the office for Registration of Arrangement proceedings in London, refused to register the resolution, it having come to his knowledge that twenty creditors, whose debts amounted to about 164*l.*, had not been served with notice of the meeting. An affidavit was read setting forth that the debtor, who was the proprietor of certain slate quarries in Anglesea and Carnarvon, did not himself attend to the business at either of those places, but intrusted the conduct of the same to the management and control of his son and a foreman, whilst he himself lived at Fulham-road, in Middlesex, and knew little or nothing about his creditors in Wales; that the creditors to whom notice of the meeting had not been sent, were omitted inadvertently; and it was further stated that the mistake originated in the fact that the debtor was required to furnish a list of his creditors to the registrar, whose duty it was to send the notices of the meeting to the several creditors.

The CHIEF JUDGE said he was quite willing to believe that the omission had arisen from inadvertence, but it was clear that there had been an irregularity which could only be remedied by giving fresh notices to all the creditors, and holding another meeting.

Re THE NATIONAL PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Building Society—No borrowing powers—Borrowing in order to make advances to members—Winding-up petition by the lender—Invalidity of debt—Petition dismissed.

The principle of Re The German Mining Company, 4 De G. M. & G. 19, that where a company has no power of borrowing, a person lending money to it which has been applied in paying debts recoverable by law against it, may yet in equity stand in the place of the creditors whose debts have been thereout paid, is not to be extended one iota.

And where a building society had no power of borrowing, but yet procured loans for the purposes of its legitimate business, which was to make advances to its members, which without such loans it had no funds to make, such loans were held not to be a legal or equitable debt from the society, and a winding-up order made upon the petition of the person making the loans was discharged, although upwards of two years had elapsed since the order was made, and the objection to the petitioner's debt was not taken at the hearing of the petition.

This was an appeal by Mr. Williamson and other contributors of the National Permanent Benefit Building Society to discharge an order for a call which had been made by the Master of the Rolls in order to provide funds for the payment of a debt due to the official liquidator of the National Savings Bank Association, who was appointed official liquidator in the winding-up of the building society also. The contention of the appellants was that the debt in question was not a debt from the latter society at all; and as it appeared that this was its only debt, and that it was upon this that the winding-up order against the society was made and depended, leave was given to the appellants to move the Court of Appeal to discharge the winding-up order as well as the order for the call, and the two motions were brought on together.

The circumstances were as follows:

The society was established under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and its rules were certified by the registrar, and as certified provided that the shares should be ultimately of the value of 100*l.*, a subscription of 10*s.* monthly on each share being payable for twelve years and a half. There was power to make advances to the members, which were to be repaid by instalments; but the rules contained no power whatever to the society to borrow money.

The society appeared to have been in close connection with the National Savings Bank Association, and its prospectus stated that it was the intention to borrow money of the association in order to make advances to its own members.

The association was ordered to be wound-up in 1866, and it had at that time advanced to the society upwards of 1300*l.* The society being unable to pay the debt, the official liquidator of the association, as a creditor in respect of it, presented a petition to have the society wound-up by the court, and an order was made according to the prayer of that petition on the 13th July 1867, and the petitioner became official liquidator of the society. He carried in his claim in respect of the above advances, and it was admitted as a debt in Jan. 1868; it was, in fact, the only debt proved, and in order to satisfy it, the Master of the Rolls made the order for a call on the 27th July 1869.

The evidence established the fact that loans were made by the association to the society to the amount mentioned, and the money was traced to various members of the latter as advances from the society to them. It was shown that several of the appellants, though not all of them, were officers of both the association and the society, and were thus parties to the whole transaction.

Roxburgh, Q.C., and Cottrell supported the appeal, contending that a building society had no power of borrowing for any purpose, unless it was expressly authorised to do so by its rules, and here there was no such power. There was, therefore, no debt to support the petition, and the winding-up order and all that was consequent upon it ought to be discharged.

Sir Richard Bagallay, Q.C., and Higgins argued that the advances were clearly for the use of the society, which had had the benefit of them, and was therefore bound to repay them. But the objection ought to have been made at the hearing of the petition, and it came too late now.

Re THE NATIONAL PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.

fairly before him, and was never fairly argued before him. Therefore the matter is very much like an original case before me. The case, when it is examined, really is a perfectly simple one. Before I go into it, I will dispose of what Sir Richard Baggalay said as to the parties who are making this application; and as to the delay. I quite agree that in many cases the delay may be of very great importance indeed, especially if it has been shown that there have been such things as sales of property and matters of that sort; and I believe that, where bankruptcies have been superseded, under which property has been actually sold, there has been a sort of confirmation of actual sales. I do not find in this case that anything of that description has taken place.

Then as regards parties: the nature of the objection in this case is such that I do not consider these parties personally disabled from bringing forward the case, more especially as they are not the only contributories on the list, they being about nine out of a number of thirty-six. But then I have no hesitation in saying that their conduct is such that they cannot be entitled to one sixpence of costs of any one of these proceedings. Although I think they are right in this application, and although I think the winding-up order ought not to be made, I certainly shall give them no costs on the order I am about to pronounce.

The matter itself is a very simple one. This company is what is called a benefit building society. Until the recent decision of the court in Laing v. Reed, 21 L. T. Rep. N.S. 773, it was actually doubted whether, if you even put a limited borrowing power, as it was in that particular case, among the rules of a society of this sort, that particular rule would be lawful. However, what we have here is a limited benefit building society without any power to borrow, and the rules and very nature of that society show that it would be contrary to the constitution of the society to borrow money so as to bind the company, or to make the individual members of the company, as members, liable for borrowing money, because the whole substance of the society is that the members are to make certain monthly payments, and in consideration of those certain monthly payments and fines, and matters of that sort, they are to receive certain loans. That is what a benefit building society is, neither more nor less. After these rules had been certified and published, and the nature of the company had been fixed, a prospectus was issued, and by that prospectus the directors chose to say that they "have made arrangements to borrow sums to be advanced to such members as desire to receive an advance before their turn for it regularly arrives, such members, of course, paying interest on the sum lent until their turn does arrive." If that does mean anything, if we look at the form and substance of the company, it can only amount to this—that the directors have chosen to pledge their personal liability. It is not a statement that the company were liable, or that any person who was a member of the company was at all bound, or was at all personally made liable in respect of any debt of the company.

That being so, let us just see what this winding-up order was made upon. It was made upon the petition of a creditor, and, in order to support that petition, that person must have made out that he was a creditor, either legal or equitable; one or other would be enough. I have already said that this benefit building society could not incur a debt by borrowing money upon loan. That is plain, and the contrary has hardly been argued. It could not do so any more than a mining company or any other of the companies which have not authority or power to bind their members by borrowing money.

If there is no legal debt, the next thing to inquire is, whether there is an equitable debt. A class of cases has been referred to on that subject, the principal of which is the German Mining Company's case, and another the Cork and Youghal Railway Company's case, which was before the Lord Chancellor and myself a short time ago. I have no hesitation in saying that those cases have gone too far, and that I am not disposed to extend them one iota. They were decided upon this principle, depending upon old cases, beginning with a case in the time of Peere Williams (Marlow v. Pitfield, 1 P. Wms. 558), where there was a loan to an infant, and the money went in paying for necessities; and I believe in another case of a more modern date, where there was money actually lent to a lunatic, and it went in paying expenses which were necessary for the lunatic. In those cases it has been held that, although the party lending the money could maintain no action at all, inasmuch as his money had gone to pay debts which would be recoverable at law, that party could come into a court of equity, and stand in the place of those creditors whose debts had been so paid. That is the principle of those cases. It is a very clear and definite principle, and a principle which ought not to be departed from.

Then it is said that circumstances have been clearly proved which bring this case within that principle. I really do not think it necessary to go through the paragraphs of the affidavit which have been relied upon for that purpose, or to go through the balance-sheet which is appended to that affidavit. The paragraphs which have been relied on are the 5th and 9th paragraphs, and one of the balance-sheets appended to Mr Barrow's affidavit. Suffice it to say that there is no proof whatever that one sixpence of this money went in payment of any debt which was recoverable against this company. In truth, all this money went for the purpose of loans to members of this company. It is not for me to say whether the banking company that lent the money have or have not any rights either as against the property of this company, which was pledged to them, or as against the persons to whom this money was lent. If they have any such rights, they can only be asserted by filing a bill, and taking a very different description of proceeding to that which has been taken here.

That being so, it follows, as I have already said, that there is no legal debt, and it follows that there was no equitable debt. The winding-up petition is in the nature of an execution. I take it, whether the parties may or may not themselves be personally liable, or however much I may disapprove of their conduct, that they are not to be precluded from saying that the title of these creditors to sustain a winding-up petition wholly and totally fails. In this case it fails wholly and totally. As I have said, there is no debt, either legal or equitable. The consequence is, that the winding-up must fail, and the order must be discharged. But, as I said before, I do not give a sixpence of costs to these parties, because their conduct has not entitled them to any costs in any shape or form.

Bankruptcy — Composition-deed — Inequality—Assignment of all debtor's property absolutely to one creditor who guarantees the payment of the composition—B.A. 1861, ss. 192, 199.

A debtor, with three of his creditors as sureties, executed a deed by which he covenanted to pay his creditors a composition of 4s. in the pound, and in consideration of the three creditors incurring this liability, he assigned to them all his property absolutely. The deed contained also a release of the debtor by the creditors.

Held, that this was a good deed within sect. 192 of the B.A. 1861.

Bissell v. Jones, L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 49; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 262, approved.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr Registrar Brougham on the 21st Jan. 1870, dismissing an application made under sect. 199 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, for the stay of proceedings under a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against John Nicholson, and for a dismissal of the petition.

John Nicholson was a contractor, and, being embarrassed in his affairs, he on the 20th Dec. 1869 executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors. This deed was made between John Nicholson of the first part, John Doulton, Henry Doulton, and James Duncan Doulton of the second part, and the several persons, companies, and partnership firms (including the said parties thereto of the second part) who were creditors of the said debtor, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication of bankruptcy against him (had such an adjudication been made on the day of the date of the deed) of the third part. The deed contained a recital that Nicholson was unable to meet his engagements in full, and that he had proposed to his creditors to pay them a composition of 4s. in the pound in full discharge of their respective debts in the instalments therein mentioned, the payment of the said composition to the other creditors to be guaranteed by the said John Doulton, Henry Doulton, and James Duncan Doulton, afterwards called the "guarantors." Then followed a recital that it was part of the proposal that certain plant, stock-in-trade, and chattels of the debtor should be absolutely assured to the guarantors, and that certain contracts into which the debtor had entered should also be assured to the guarantors, or dealt with as they should direct, and a recital that a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors whose respective debts amounted to 10% or upwards, had agreed to accept the said composition.

The deed witnessed that in pursuance of the said proposal, and agreement and in consideration of the release by the creditors (other than the guarantors) hereinafter contained, the debtor and the guarantors did thereby for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant with the creditors respectively (other than the guarantors) and their respective executors and administrators, that they the debtor and the guarantors, or one of them, their or one of their heirs, executors, or administrators, would, upon demand by the creditors respectively (other than as aforesaid), at any time after the registration of the deed, deliver to the creditors respectively (other than the guarantors) the joint and several promissory notes of the debtor and the guarantors for the payment to the creditors respectively (other than as aforesaid) of the several instalments of the composition at the expiration of the respective periods of one calendar month and four calendar months after such registration as aforesaid. Then followed a covenant by the debtor with the guarantors to deliver to them upon demand at any time after the registration of the deed his promissory notes for the instalments of the composition. Then came a release by the creditors, in consideration of the premises, of the debtor from the debts due to the creditors respectively, and a proviso making void the release, in case default should be made in meeting any of the promissory notes at maturity, or in case the debtor should be adjudicated bankrupt before the composition should be fully paid, and a further proviso that the deed should not prejudice the interests of the creditors against any sureties for their debts, or any security which the creditors might hold for their debts; but nevertheless that if the creditor according to the law of bankruptcy would be bound to realise his security, or to deduct the value of it before proving his debt in a bankruptcy, he should only be entitled to receive the composition upon the balance of his debt after realising his security or giving credit for the value of it. The deed then witnessed that in consideration of the liability thereby undertaken by the guarantors for payment of the composition, the debtor did thereby assign unto the guarantors, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all the plant, stock, and materials, horses and carts, belonging to the debtor and specified in an inventory thereof, to hold to the guarantors, their executors, administrators and assigns absolutely, provided that if the deed should not be registered the assignment should be void and of none effect. Then followed a covenant by the debtor with the guarantors to assign to them, or any two or one of them, at any time after the registration of the deed, at their request, the contracts thereinbefore covenanted, or any of them, and in the mean time to deal with the same in such manner as the guarantors, or any two of them, should direct. Lastly, it was agreed and declared that the deed was intended to be and operate as a composition-deed for the benefit of all the creditors of the debtor within the meaning of the provisions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 in that behalf. This deed was duly assented to by the requisite statutory majority of the creditors, and was registered on the 4th Jan. 1870, in pursuance of an order made by the court extending the time for registration until the 7th Jan.

The debt due to the Messrs. Doulton was by far the largest debt due by Nicholson. On the 31st Dec. 1869, a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against Nicholson was presented by a dissentient creditor. The deed having been registered, notice was given by Nicholson of an application to the court that all proceedings under the petition might be stayed, and that the petition might be dismissed pursuant to the 199th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. This application was heard by Mr Registrar Brougham (to whom the matter had been delegated by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869), and the Registrar made this order: "It appearing to me that the said deed is not a deed within the meaning of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, not being for the equal benefit of creditors, I hereby dismiss the said application."

From this order Nicholson appealed.

De Gex, Q.C. and Doria, for the appellant, contended that the deed in this case was not to be distinguished from the deed which was held good by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Bissell v. Jones, L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 49; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 292. According to Re Cowen, 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 469; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 563, the creditors were the judges of the propriety of the bargain, unless the majority were actuated by dishonest motives. There was no reason for inferring anything of that kind in the present case, inasmuch as the guarantors might lose greatly by the guarantee into which they entered. They cited also

Sargood, Serjt. and Bagley for the petitioning creditor.—The deed is bad, because it is unequal in its provisions. In Dewhurst v. Jones, the surety was not one of the creditors. In Bissell v. Jones, though the surety was a creditor, the assignment to him was on trust for the creditors. [Lord Justice GIFFARD: Was it not on trust to pay himself 20s. in the pound?] But in the present case the Doultons are made sure of their 4s. in the pound by the tangible property assigned to them, while the other creditors get nothing but promissory notes. That is inequality. Moreover, if the assignment were upon trust, the other creditors would be safe against a bankruptcy of the Doultons. They cited also Thompson v. Knight, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 42; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 285.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that, if he had dissented from the decision in Bissell v. Jones, he should have taken time to consider, as a unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was entitled to very great weight. But he concurred in that judgment. In the present case he could not infer that there was not a fair bargain between the debtor and his creditors, and he thought that the Messrs. Doulton were not precluded by their instrument from voting. If the property had been realised, his Lordship thought that the creditors would not have got more than they would get under the deed. This was his Lordship's view, looking only at what appeared on the face of the deed. But if anything was shown to impeach the transaction, the case would be entirely different: it would be monstrously unfair that a person whose security was impeached should vote upon the deed. As it was, however, the case could not be distinguished from that of Bissell v. Jones, and, therefore, the Registrar's order must be discharged, with the expression of the opinion of the court that, in the absence of anything but what appeared on the face of the deed, it was a good deed under the Act.

Bankruptcy — Practice — Appeal—Order made by a registrar—Pending suit in district court transferred to registrar—Solicitor to assignee—Costs—Taxation—Time—The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—B. A. 1861, ss. 13, 14, 15—B. A. 1869, s. 130—General Rules in Bankruptcy, Jan. 1, 1870, No. 143.

Notwithstanding the rule laid down by the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ex parte Barnett, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 406, that an appeal from an order made by a registrar from a district court of bankruptcy, when not acting as deputy for the commissioner, would not be entertained, an order made by a registrar acting in a matter referred to him by an order of the Lord Chancellor made in pursuance of the 130th section of the B. A. 1869, may be appealed from directly to the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

The Attorney and Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), has no application to the taxation by a registrar in bankruptcy, under the provisions of sects. 13 and 14 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, of the bill of costs of the solicitor acting in the matter of a bankrupt for the creditors' assignee. The limit of twelve months after delivery of the bill, within which an order to tax may be applied for as of course, fixed by that Act has, therefore, no relation to such bill of costs.

In Oct. 1867 an adjudication of bankruptcy was made in the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy against one James O'Neil Mackle. The creditors on the 14th Nov. 1867 passed a resolution under sect. 110 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 that the proceedings in the bankruptcy should be suspended, and this resolution was duly confirmed at a subsequent meeting of the creditors. On the 28th Nov. Mr. Blair was appointed creditors' assignee. On the 17th Dec. 1867 an order of discharge was granted to the bankrupt. Mr. Joseph Best, a solicitor, was employed by Blair as his solicitor in the matter of the bankruptcy, and he on the 18th Jan. 1868 delivered a bill of costs to Blair for business done in the matter of the bankruptcy. This bill amounted to 100l. 18s. 11d. It not having been paid, an action was commenced in Feb. 1870 for its recovery. On the 30th Dec. 1869 the Lord Chancellor, under the powers conferred by sect. 130 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 made an order "that such part of the business pending in the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, as is mentioned in the schedule of this order, shall be transferred to the courts, the names of which are set opposite to the respective matters in the said schedule, and, as to the residue of the said business, such part thereof as can be disposed of by the registrar of the Liverpool Court of Bankruptcy, under the powers and authorities, rights and duties now possessed by him by virtue of any statute, rule or otherwise, shall be disposed of by him, and all such part of the residue of the business of the said Liverpool District Court as cannot be disposed of by him, shall be and the same is hereby transferred to the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Liverpool." Mr. Mackle's bankruptcy was not included in the schedule to the order. On the 8th March 1870, an application was made by Blair to Mr. Yate Lee, the registrar of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, to tax the above mentioned bill of costs. At this time Best had also been adjudicated a bankrupt, and Mr. Macfar, his creditors' assignee, opposed the application to tax the bill. The application was refused by the registrar, who gave, as the reason for the refusal, that the time had elapsed during which the bill ought to have been taxed without a special order in that behalf. From this decision Blair appealed to the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

W. Willis (of the Common Law Bar) on behalf of the appellant, opened the appeal.

C. W. Bardswell, on behalf of the respondent, objected that it was laid down in Ex parte Barnett, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 406; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 352, that the Court of Appeal in Chancery would not hear an appeal from an order made by a registrar in bankruptcy, unless he had made the order, not of his own authority, but as deputy for the commissioner. In the present case the Lord Chancellor's order gave the registrar power to dispose of such part only of the pending business as he could have disposed of as registrar if the Bankruptcy Act 1861 had not been repealed. The registrar was not acting in any sense as deputy for a commissioner, and therefore the court would not hear an appeal from his decision.

PHILLIPS v. FURBER.

[ROLLS.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he could see no difficulty in the way of the appeal. The present case and Ex parte Barnett stood in very different positions. In Ex parte Barnett, though there was a commissioner sitting in the same court, an attempt was made to take the opinion of the Court of Appeal on an order made by a registrar without first going to the commissioner himself. This the Court of Appeal refused to allow. But the present case was in a very different position. By the 14th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, bills of costs in matters in bankruptcy were to be taxed and settled by the registrar, subject to appeal to the court of which he was registrar. Then sect. 130 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, provided that such part of the business pending in any country district court as the Lord Chancellor should think fit, should be disposed of by the registrar of that court. By that enactment it was meant that the business which was to be disposed of by the registrar should be entirely disposed of by him. The section, in fact, placed the registrar in the same position as a commissioner with respect to the business of which he was to dispose. No intermediate right of appeal was given, and therefore his Lordship should treat the decision of the registrar just as if it had been the decision of a commissioner.

W. Willis then proceeded with his argument on the merits of the appeal, and he contended that this was not a case to which the Attorneys and Solicitors Act had any application. The Court of Bankruptcy had always had a power to tax the bill of costs of the solicitor to the assignee of a bankrupt estate, for the court was administering the estate, and was bound to protect it in the interest of the creditors. This jurisdiction was recognised by the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and was given to the registrar by sects. 13, 14, and 15 of that Act. He cited

Ex parte Woolston, 3 M. D. & De G. 702;
Ex parte Pemberton, 2 De G. M. & G. 960;
Ex parte Heyden, 2 Gl. & J. 52;
 Griffith's Bankruptcy, p. 1073;
 Macrae and Doria's Practice.

C. W. Bardswell, for the respondent, contended that there was nothing pending in this bankruptcy after the resolution of the creditors to suspend the proceedings. After such a resolution the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy remained only for a very limited purpose, as was shown by Ex parte Webster, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 556. At any rate the power of the Court of Bankruptcy to tax must be exercised subject to the same restrictions as the power to tax in any other court, and moreover sect. 13 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, expressly spoke of "taxable" bills. The limit of twelve months after delivery must apply as in an ordinary case of taxation between solicitor and client.

W. Willis in reply.

Lord Justice GIFFARD was of opinion that the Attorneys and Solicitors Act had no application to the case, which must stand simply upon the fact that the bill of costs was in a measure in bankruptcy. His Lordship thought that in all cases an assignee in bankruptcy should be able to protect himself against any demand which the creditors under the bankruptcy might make on him with regard to his solicitor's bill of costs. Costs of this kind were very like costs in a suit in Chancery in which an order had been made for taxation; and surely in that case it could not be said that if the taxation were not asked for for more than twelve months after the order to tax was made, the client had lost his right to taxation against his solicitor, unless a special order could be made. In bankruptcy there was a general enactment in the Bankruptcy Act 1861 that the bill of costs of the assignee, who was dealing with the money of other people, should be taxed and settled by the registrar, and it was very right that such a bill should not be paid until its correctness had been certified by the registrar. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the bill be referred to the registrar for taxation. The appellant and the respondent respectively would have their costs out of the estates which they represented.

PHILLIPS v. FURBER.

Deed of inspectorship—Bill of sale—Bankruptcy—Assent of creditors—Evidence—Jurisdiction.

By a deed of inspectorship a debtor covenanted with the inspectors to convey and assign to them all his estate and effects if they should by writing so require. The inspectors signed a notice requiring the debtor to make the conveyance and assignment to them, but took no further steps in the matter. A few days afterwards the debtor executed a bill of sale of his furniture to a creditor; the bill of sale contained the usual power of sale under which the creditor sold part of the furniture, and after satisfying his own debt out of the proceeds of sale, retained the balance thereof and also the rest of the furniture. The debtor afterwards became bankrupt.

On a bill by the inspectors praying for a declaration that they were entitled to the balance of the proceeds of sale and to the rest of the furniture;

Held, that the inspectors, not having shown any desire to perform their functions until proceedings with regard to the estate had commenced in the Court of Bankruptcy, this was not a case in which the Court of Chancery would exercise its discretionary concurrent jurisdiction, but that it would leave the matter to the Court of Bankruptcy:

Held, also, that the covenant by the debtor in the inspectorship-deed to assign his property on demand did not vest any property in the inspectors, and that the demand for an assignment made by the inspectors did not render them the equitable owners of the property.

The affidavit made on the registration of an inspectorship-deed is not sufficient evidence of the assent of the creditors.

Stone v. Thomas, L. Rep. 5 Ch. App., examined.

By an indenture dated the 31st July 1868, and expressed to be made between John Bingham of the first part, certain persons therein called the inspectors of the second part, and the several persons, companies, and co-partnership firms who at the date thereof were respectively creditors of John Bingham, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication of bankruptcy against him founded on a petition filed on the day of the date of this indenture, of the third part, John Bingham covenanted to furnish the inspectors with a full and true account of his assets and liabilities, and that his books and papers should be during the continuance of the inspectorship open to their inspection, and that he would not, by proceedings in bankruptcy or otherwise, attempt to withdraw himself nor his estate or effects, &c., from the engagements contained in the deed of inspectorship. And the deed contained provisions that the estate should be administered in accordance with the principles, rules, and practice of the then English bankrupt law, or as near thereto as circumstances would permit, having regard to the terms of the deed, and that at any time before the whole of the said estate should have been fully administered under the deed the debtor should (if the said inspectors or inspector should by writing under their or his hand so require) effectually convey, assure, and assign all his said estate and effects remaining outstanding or not divided, to the said inspectors or inspector, or to such person or persons as they or he might direct, in trust to be forthwith realised, and administered, and divided, according to the law of bankruptcy, among the creditors of the said debtor, according to the amount of their respective debts which should remain unpaid.

The deed was duly executed by the debtor and inspectors, and was duly executed or assented to by a sufficient majority in number and value of the creditors so as to be a valid and binding deed under the provisions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and on the 28th Aug. 1866, it was duly registered under the provisions of that Act.

On the 23rd Feb. 1867, the inspectors signed and attempted to serve on John Bingham a notice requiring him to execute to them forthwith a conveyance and assignment of all his outstanding estate and effects, in accordance with the provisions of the deed of inspectorship. In consequence of John Bingham refusing to receive any communication from the inspectors, the notice was not actually served until the 8th March 1867, when it was left with a servant at his house. At the date of the service of the notice, Bingham was residing at No. 64, Lancaster-gate, and no part of his furniture, &c., had been removed from the house, but he had, on the 23rd July 1866, by an indenture of that date, assigned all his household goods, furniture, and effects then or thereafter in and about the said house and premises, No. 64, Lancaster-gate, to William Philip Strong Bingham and Leonora Frances Bingham, to secure a sum of 3000*l.*, and interest.

By an indenture dated the 11th March 1867, to which William Philip Strong Bingham and Leonora Frances Bingham, were parties, John Bingham assigned the said furniture and effects to one Charles Furber, to secure a sum of 750*l.* alleged to have been advanced to him by Furber, and the indenture was registered as a bill of sale. On the 6th June 1867 Furber took possession of the furniture, and on that and the following days sold a large quantity of it under his power of sale, and received sums amounting to nearly 3000*l.* as the proceeds of the sale, of which he retained possession.

On the 7th June the inspectors gave notice to the auctioneers not to part with any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the furniture to any person other than the inspectors, but they took no further steps towards enforcing their title to the proceeds of sale of the furniture; and on the 18th and 20th March 1868, William P. Phillips and George Phillips, the plaintiffs in the present suit, were, by indentures of those respective dates, appointed inspectors in place of the original inspectors.

On the 6th Nov. 1867 John Bingham was adjudicated bankrupt, and Theodore Richard Schweitzer, a defendant to the present suit, was appointed creditors' assignee in the bankruptcy.

Furber had a balance in his hands after satisfying his own claim, and in June 1867 Bingham filed a bill against him praying for an account, and an injunction against selling or parting with, or disposing of any of the articles comprised in the bill of sale, which injunction was granted.

The present bill was filed by the new inspectors against Furber, Schweitzer, and a Mr. T. H. Smith, who made a small claim under a prior bill of sale.

The bill prayed for a declaration that, by virtue of the covenant contained in the deed of inspectorship, the plaintiffs were entitled to such furniture and other effects in Furber's possession, and to the proceeds of sale of such of the furniture as he had sold subject to Furber's security; for an account of what was due to Furber under the security of the 11th March 1867, and that directions might be given in relation to the dismissal of the suit of Bingham v. Furber, upon such terms as to costs, &c., as the court should think expedient.

The case made by the defendants was that the validity of the inspectorship-deed was not proved, the affidavit made on the registration of the deed not proving that the necessary assents had been given to the deed; that this was rather a case for the property to be administered by the Court of Bankruptcy than by the Court of Chancery, and was not a case in which the Court of Chancery would use its discretionary concurrent jurisdiction; and that the plaintiffs showed no title to the property, it not being proved that the debtor ever received notice of the demand on which the covenant to assign was conditional.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. and J. Napier Higgins, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the court had jurisdiction to administer estates under deeds of inspectorship; that the goods were not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt; and that, the registrar having signed the deed, it was not necessary for them to prove the actual assent of the creditors. L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 579;

W. W. Cooper, for the defendant T. H. Smith, submitted that this was a case for the Court of Bankruptcy, and that the Court of Chancery would not entertain it without some special reason, which did not exist here. He cited,

Martin v. Powning, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133;

Swanston, Q.C. and Cracknall, for the assignee in bankruptcy, supported the same contention. They cited, Hobson v. Jones, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 143.

Jessel, Q.C. and Graham Hastings, for Furber, were not called upon.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., was heard in reply.

Feb. 11. Lord ROMILLY.—In this case I am of opinion that the plaintiff fails on various grounds, but principally upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in these matters is a discretionary jurisdiction, and that it is not in this case made out to my satisfaction that it would be a wise exercise of the discretion of the court to allow the property in question to be administered in this court. It was observed by Sir Richard Baggallay, in his very able reply yesterday, with great truth, that this was not a suit for the administration of an estate, but that it was a separate and distinct suit which could not properly be joined with a suit for the administration of the estate. It is a suit by trustees or quasi trustees to acquire property for the purpose of having that property in their possession, and then it would be subject to the duties which they have to perform upon it. But unless they are to administer under the jurisdiction of the court, it is obvious that it would be perfectly idle to give them the property over which they have no control whatever. It is, therefore, intimately connected with the question of the discretion of the court, whether the court shall think that this estate ought to be administered in this court, because if it does not it would be impossible to make any decree in a case of this description, which is merely ancillary for that purpose. This is also a remarkable circumstance that it is difficult to find a case—I do not remember ever to have seen a case myself—introduced with less attention to proving the things which were necessary to establish the case, which has certainly been a great advantage to the defendants. In the first place I am of opinion that it is quite settled by the case of Ex parte Rawlings (sup.), that when the fact of the assent of the creditors is contested it is necessary for them to give more proof of it than the mere fact of proving that the usual affidavit was made when the document was registered. The cases upon the subject are, in my opinion, quite conclusive. The case of Waddington v. Roberts (sup.), does not prove anything more than this, that the fact of registration is prima facie evidence that the officer has done his duty, and has required and obtained the proper and usual affidavit; but as to the contents of that affidavit being established thereby there is nothing in my opinion in that case to establish that that was the view of the court; and it appears to me to be directly contradicted by the case of Ex parte Rawlings (sup.). In Ex parte Rawlings, which undoubtedly was not a cause or a suit the court seems to have been disposed to say that it would have given leave to add that proof at the time of the hearing, and although considerable inconvenience arises from that course, I think I should have adopted it on the present occasion, as I stated to Sir Richard Baggallay, if in other respects I thought it was a proper case in which to exercise the jurisdiction of this court. But I am of opinion, as I stated before, that it is not a fit case in which to exercise the jurisdiction of this court. I will state some additional reasons for that opinion. In the first place, the whole of the essence of this case depends upon this foundation, that the ownership of these chattels is in the plaintiffs. I do not think that is established. Certainly I have heard no case to make that out at all. These are the facts which lead me to say that I cannot come to that conclusion. A common deed of inspectorship was executed by Mr. John Bingham on the 31st July 1866. As was very correctly observed in the course of the argument, I had to consider very fully the nature and character of these inspectorship-deeds in the case I had before me the other day of Hobson v. Jones, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 143; and certainly my disposition there was rather in favour of making the inspectors answerable for the misconduct of the receiver if I could have done so. But when I came to look into it carefully, and to examine it fully, I found that was not possible, but that the inspectors' functions and duties were quite separate from those of any trustees. In both cases there was a covenant on the part of the debtor to assign the property to the inspectors if he should be required so to do, and in that case no such demand had been made at all. The question is, had a demand been made in this case? What constitutes a demand? I take it to be this—it is when notice is served upon the debtor to make the assignment which he has covenanted to make in the deed. The inspectorship-deed, it will be remembered, contains a covenant by the debtor to assign the property in case he shall be called upon so to do. I think all the cases establish that that of itself does not convey any property at all; there is no assignment at all, and no vesting of any property whatever. Indeed, it was not put so high as that either by Sir Richard Baggallay or by Mr. Higgins, but they contended that as soon as the demand was made then the contract became absolute, and the inspectors became owners in equity. I cannot find that the demand has been made. All that took place is this—a notice requiring him to make the assignment, after various attempts to effect personal service which failed, was given by leaving it with the servant at the door, but there is no evidence that the servant ever gave it to him, and it is perfectly consistent with that that he never knew of it. Surely the burden of proof lies on the plaintiffs to establish a fact of that description. Unquestionably he has broken no covenant, and been guilty of no laches at all. I think they should have proved that fact. That alone is not the thing which presses upon me most strongly. I do not think they have shown that this property vested in the plaintiffs, and certainly they have brought no case whatever that I have been able to find, which shows that such was the fact. In truth all the cases they alluded to, and all the cases they brought forward, begun with the assumption that the ownership of the property was in the plaintiffs, which the plaintiffs in this case have failed to prove. Then I was much struck with this circumstance. The inspectorship-deed was executed in July 1866. They see the necessity, and attempt to serve the debtor with notice to assign in Feb. 1867, about six or seven months afterwards, and they actually leave the notice at his door on the 8th March. On the 11th March he makes a bill of sale of all his property to Furber, and that is registered. It is a bill of sale to secure 750*l.* with interest. Were they not aware of that fact? How came they not to take some steps on that occasion? It was duly registered. It was the duty of the inspectors to know what was taking place on that subject; nothing was more easy than to know it, and there is no evidence that they did not know it. They took no step whatever, though they thought that the bill of sale was one by which the whole of the property became irredeemably vested in Furber by the 11th June following. During the whole of that time they took no step to obtain the assignment of the property, or to perform the functions which they say they desire now to undertake to perform. It is true that they are not the actual plaintiffs, because it is their predecessors who were the actual inspectors, but as was observed in argument, and I think justly admitted by the other side, they are bound by all the acts of their predecessors, and can only be in the same situation as the former inspectors. Then what takes place afterwards? The landlord issues an execution or distress for rent in the month of May; the broker is actually in possession, and they must have known that. They knew where he lived, because they had endeavoured to find him and to serve him, but they take no step on that occasion. The broker sells a considerable quantity of furniture to Mr. Furber for, I think, 240*l.*, or something like that, which they say is afterwards sold for nearly 600*l.* I do not go into that question for the very good reason that I stopped Mr. Jessel by saying I thought I should dispose of the case without going into the question affecting Mr. Furber, and if I did go into it I should unquestionably have heard him even though the other part of the case had been disposed of. But they must have known of this, and they took no step at all. The property is actually taken away; the whole of the very property which they want to have assigned to them is removed from the house, I do not know exactly at what time, but it must have been either in the last two weeks of May, or in the first week of June, and on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of June the whole of the property is put up for sale by auction, and it is not until then that they take any step in the matter. The step they take then is very slight, for all that they do is to give notice to Mr. Furber that the property was claimed on behalf of the creditors of Bingham. They take no step after that. The first sale produced according to their statement sufficient to pay Mr. Furber everything due to him, and they take no step whatever. In the month of November following, that is five months afterwards, Bingham became bankrupt, and an assignee was appointed. Then in the following month it is thought fit to change the inspectors, and the present plaintiffs are appointed in the place of Mr. Cooper and Mr. Wintle. The present plaintiffs filed this bill in May following. Now is this a case in which they are entitled to come here and say that they have performed their functions diligently; for in inspectorship-deeds, especially when they involve property of this description, it is very necessary to act with diligence? Of course the duty of the inspectors is to realise the property for equal distribution among all the creditors, and if they allow one creditor to sweep off so much of the property as will be sufficient to pay his debt in full without taking any step whatever, I am of opinion that this is not a case in which they can come here afterwards and say that they will resume their functions, and perform that which they thought of performing in February or March 1867, but which they omitted to do, in fact, till May 1868—they cannot come here and say this when there is a proper tribunal which will fully and accurately administer the whole of the estate and the funds, and will dispose of all those questions which the Court of Bankruptcy is perfectly competent and fit to do. I am of opinion that in that state of the case the real question for the court to consider is, whether it shall exercise its discretion, considering the nature of these inspectorship-deeds and the conduct of the inspectors, to administer the funds here instead of in the Court of Bankruptcy. The case of Stone v. Thomas (sup.), to which I was referred by Mr. Cooper, is very conclusive and decisive on the subject, and the Lord Chancellor's judgment really reconciles the whole of the cases on the subject. He says that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is not ousted at all by the statutes in bankruptcy. There is one case in which the judge stated that the Court of Bankruptcy was the proper tribunal, and another case in which the judge said that the Court of Chancery was the proper tribunal to enforce the administration. But they are by no means inconsistent. The fact is, that the exercise of the jurisdiction in Chancery is discretionary, and in one case it has been thought better to administer the estate in Chancery, and in another case in the Court of Bankruptcy. Unquestionably the Court of Chancery has this power, that it can perform the functions if it thinks fit, whatever may have taken place in the Court of Bankruptcy. The Lord Chancellor exercised his discretion in that case (Stone v. Thomas) and did not think that it was a proper case for the Court of Chancery, and dismissed the bill with costs. I do not think that this was a proper case for the Court of Chancery, and I must dismiss this bill with costs; and above all for this reason, because the inspectors have from the beginning not shown any desire to carry out their office, until the whole of the matter has become vested in the Court of Bankruptcy, who will do it infinitely better than any other tribunal. There are no doubt some very serious questions to be determined between the bankrupt's estate and Mr. Furber, but the Court of Bankruptcy is perfectly competent to determine those questions; and I must say that there is no person in whose judgment I should have greater confidence, in matters relating to the subject, than the present Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, considering his great knowledge both in bankruptcy and equity. I am of opinion that the case of the plaintiffs wholly fails, and accordingly I shall make no order except to dismiss the bill with costs.

Re THE ACCIDENTAL AND MARINE INSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED.)

Company—Winding-up—Application of contributions of past members—Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 38, 133.

In the winding-up of a company the contributions received from past shareholders are distributable amongst the creditors generally, and not merely amongst those creditors whose debts were contracted before the respective times when such shareholders ceased to be members.

This was an adjourned summons on behalf of certain creditors of the above corporation (which was in the course of being wound-up), that the liquidators might be directed to divide the contributions received from past shareholders, amongst such of the creditors only whose debts were contracted before the respective times when such shareholders ceased to be members. The facts were as follows:—

The corporation was ordered to be wound-up, under the supervision of the court, on the 24th Oct. 1866. In the course of the winding-up, it having been found that the existing members were unable to satisfy the contributions required of them, certain past shareholders (Class B)—liable to contribute within sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1862, i.e., those who had ceased to be members within one year before the winding-up—had been duly settled on the list, and had paid the contributions required of them.

The question was whether the contributions of these past shareholders were distributable generally amongst the whole body of the creditors of the corporation, or only amongst those creditors represented by the applicants, whose debts were contracted before the time when such past shareholders ceased to be members.

Before the commencement of the present proceedings a compromise had been entered into, with the concurrence of the creditors generally, between the liquidators and the past shareholders, to the effect that such shareholders were only to pay 10s. in the pound on the amount which the liquidators alleged they were liable for. This compromise was subsequently, by the order of the court, directed to be carried into effect. ●

Greene, Q. C., and Holl (of the Common Law Bar) in support of the summons, submitted that the case came within the provisions of the Companies Act 1862. By the 38th section of that Act, no past member was liable to contribute in respect of any debt contracted after he had ceased to be a member, and it therefore followed that as only past creditors could enforce contributions from past members, they alone ought to reap the entire benefit of those contributions. Moreover, the past creditors might be said to have contracted with the company on the credit of the past members.

GRIMSTON v. TURNER.

Hardy, Q. C. and Napier Higgins, for the liquidator, submitted that that question was not one between the contributories inter se, but between the company and its creditors. The 38th section of the Companies Act 1862 in no way affected the rights of creditors, it merely defined the liability of shareholders to contribute on the winding-up of the company. That liability had already been ascertained, and the contributions had been received from both classes of contributories. The 133rd section of the Act, however, provided that the property of the company was to be applied pari passu, and there was no provision that contributions of past shareholders were to be divided amongst any particular class of creditors.

Greene, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is not a question as to what amount is to be contributed, but as to how contributions which have been received are to be applied. It has been contended on behalf of the creditors who support this summons that the contributions received from the contributories on the B list (the past members of the company) ought to be divided amongst those creditors only, whose debts were contracted before the respective times when such contributories ceased to be members. The 38th section of the Companies Act 1862, which has been referred to in support of the claim, gives no rights to creditors; it merely limits and defines the extent of the liabilities of past members, and it shows that no such shareholder shall be liable for debts incurred after the time when he ceased to be a member of the company. The creditors in question are not merely the creditors of past members, but of the company, and by the Act the contributions of past members are distributable amongst the whole body of creditors. There must, therefore, be an order to that effect. If, however, there was any doubt on the question, it would be removed by the fact that a compromise has been made, which in effect unites both classes of contributories. That compromise, no doubt, could have had no effect without the sanction of the court, but as that has been given, it is binding on all parties. Under these circumstances, the summons must be dismissed with costs.

GRIMSTON v. TURNER.

Jurisdiction—Motion for receiver—Impending litigation.

Where litigation is impending in the Court of Probate, the Court of Chancery, if the interests of all parties require it, will appoint a receiver.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff in the above suit for a receiver of the real and personal estate of the late Mr. John Hutley, pending some contemplated litigation as to them in the Court of Probate. The facts were shortly these:—

In 1861 Mr. Hutley made a will bequeathing the residue of his property to his sister. She died prior to 1865. In Nov. 1865 the testator was induced to marry a young lady named Wilkins, and shortly afterwards he made another will by which he bequeathed one half of his residuary estate to his wife, and the other half to other persons. Mr. Hutley died at the age of sixty-one, on the 7th

Aug. 1866, and in October following his widow married a Dr. Timms.

Shortly afterwards a suit was instituted in the court of Malins, V. C., for the administration of Mr. Hutley's estate, and a decree was made and accounts taken under it. Subsequently, however, the plaintiff succeeded in upsetting the will of 1865 in the Court of Probate, on the ground that Mr. Hutley was at the time of its execution, and for some years previously, of weak mind. By this decision of the Probate Court, everything that had been done in the Chancery suit was rendered null and void, and there was no one now in existence who was entitled to the legal possession of Mr. Hutley's property, which was very considerable. Mrs. Timms was desirous of applying to the Probate Court for letters of administration to Mr. Hutley's estate, and a caveat had been entered against the probate of the will of 1861.

The question was whether the Court of Chancery, under the above circumstances, had power to appoint a receiver.

Karslake, Q. C. and Hanson, in support of the motion, submitted that the case was an urgent one. The property was wholly unprotected. It was said that Mrs. Timms was about to apply to the Probate Court for letters of administration; but as her former husband was found to be of weak intellect in 1865 her marriage with him must necessarily be ineffectual, and she would not be allowed to administer. The caveat entered in the Probate Court constituted pending litigation; but if it did not, the peculiar circumstances of the case fully justified the interference of this court.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Fitzroy Kelly, for Mrs. Timms, contended that the court had no jurisdiction. There was no pending litigation. The suit in Malins, V. C.'s court no longer existed, and the mere entry of a caveat in the Probate Court did not constitute litigation. At all events this suit ought to be transferred to the court of Malins, V. C.

Greene, Q. C. and Crossley, for the executors named in both wills, said the case stood thus: The will of 1865 was gone, and if the marriage was valid the will of 1861 was revoked by it. If the marriage was not valid, then that will would be good; but the executors could not proceed to prove it till some decision had been arrived at as to the marriage. Indeed the executors were anxious to have the opinion of the court as to what they ought to do.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is an application for the appointment of a receiver of the real and personal estate of the late Mr. John Hutley. The property has formed the subject of much recent litigation, and it is said that as there is at present no legal personal representative, a receiver is necessary for its protection. On the other side it has been contended that the court has no jurisdiction to accede to the application, and that even if it has it ought not to exercise it, because the widow of Mr. Hutley is about to apply to the Court of Probate for letters of administration. The jurisdiction of the court in cases of this kind is well settled, and there is no doubt that whether proceedings are pending or impending in the Court of Probate, this court, where the interests of all parties require it, has power to appoint a receiver. In the present case there is impending litigation. Something must be done with a view to having a decision as to who is to be the legal personal representative, and in fact a caveat has been entered in the Probate Court against the probate of the will of 1861. When the matter is again heard the question of testacy or intestacy must mainly depend upon the fact of the validity of the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Hutley. Looking at what has already taken place, the lady, who was Mr. Hutley's wife, and who is now one of the defendants in this suit, is probably not very anxious to embark upon another litigation in the Probate Court. However that may be, there is, in my opinion, quite sufficient in the evidence in support of this application to justify the court in appointing a receiver. There will, therefore, be a reference to chambers for the appointment of a fit and proper person as a receiver, and an order for an injunction to restrain the persons now in possession of the property from further intermeddling with it until a legal personal representative be appointed by the Court of Probate.

Practice—Revivor—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

Where a suit had become abated by the deaths of certain parties, and subsequent proceedings proved defective in consequence of persons taking interests by substitution for those who had died, not having been brought before the court,

A supplemental order was made, directing that the suit should be carried on against the substituted parties, who were adults, and that they should be bound by the previous proceedings.

In this case there had been a decree for the administration of a testator's estate. After the decree was made some of the parties to the suit died, and consequently the suit became abated. Certain proceedings subsequently took place, but proved defective, inasmuch as the persons who had become interested in the estate by substitution for those who had died had not been brought before the court. Under these circumstances,

Dauney applied, under the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52, for a supplemental order that the suit might be carried on against the substituted parties, who were adults, and that they might be bound by the previous proceedings. He referred to

GIBSON v. THE MAYOR, &C. OF PRESTON.

Public Health Act 1848—Local board—Surveyors of highways—Repairs of highways—Non-liability for accidents.

No action for damages sustained by an individual in consequence of the want of repair of a highway will lie against a local board constituted under the Public Health Act 1848.

Where, therefore, the plaintiff sustained a personal injury in consequence of a road, which was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the defendants, who were a local board, being out of repair, whereupon he brought his action for the recovery of damages:

Held, that such action could not be sustained.

The declaration in this case stated that the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, were applied to the borough of Preston, and the defendants thereupon became the local board of health for the borough, and that there was within the borough and within the district for which the defendants are such local board, a public footway called Syke-road, which under the provisions of the statute and other statutes in that behalf, it was the duty of the defendants as such local board to level and repair, as and when occasion might require, and that the said footway was, for want of necessary levelling and repairing, ruinous and out of repair, and dangerous to persons lawfully using and passing along the same. And the defendants wrongfully permitted the same to be and remain so ruinous, out of repair and dangerous by reason whereof the plaintiff, whilst lawfully using and passing along such public footway, was thrown down and broke his leg, and sustained great injuries.

The defendants traversed the facts, and also demurred to the declaration. The case went down to trial upon the issues in fact, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with 400*l.* damages, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendants, or a nonsuit be entered on the ground that they were not liable to be sued. This rule came on for argument together with the demurrer.

By sect. 69 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (The Public Health Act 1848), it is enacted—

That all present and future streets, being or which at any time become highways within any district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof by any surveyor of highways, or by any person serving the office of surveyor of highways, shall vest in and be under the management and control of the said local board of health. And the said local board shall from time to time cause all such streets to be levelled, paved, flagged, channelled, altered and repaired as and when occasion may require. And they may from time to time cause the soil of any such street to be raised, lowered, or altered as they may think fit, and place and keep in repair fences and posts for the safety of foot passengers; and whosoever wilfully displaces, takes up, or injures the pavement, stones, materials, fences, or posts of any such street without the consent of the said local board, shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and a further sum not exceeding five shillings for every such square foot of the pavement, stones, or other materials so displaced, taken up, or injured.

By sect. 13 of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 42, it is enacted—

That the term "highway" in the sections of the Public Health Act 1848, numbered respectively 68 and 69 in the copies of the Act printed by the Queen's printers, shall mean any highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge), and E. Williams with him, appeared for the plaintiff.

The arguments and cases are so fully given and referred to in the following judgment that it is unnecessary to give them here.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—HANNEN, J.—This is an action against the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Preston, who are the local board of health within that borough, under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), for permitting a certain public footway in their district, which it was their duty to keep in repair, to be out of repair, whereby the plaintiff was injured. The defendants demurred to the declaration, and contend that it discloses no ground of action against them. By the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) s. 68, it is enacted that all streets being or which shall at any time become highways within any district, shall vest in and be under the management and control of the local board of health. By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 42, s. 13, it is enacted that the term "highway" in the above section, shall mean any highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. It was contended on the part of the defendants that it did not appear that the footway in question was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. We are of opinion, however, that the words repairable by the inhabitants at large are used in contradistinction to repairable by individuals ratione tenuræ, and that it must be taken on demurrer that the declaration, which alleges that it was the duty of the defendants to repair the footway, thereby sufficiently avers that it was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; as such duty could not otherwise exist. Secondly, it was argued that the defendants are not liable, otherwise than as a surveyor of highways would be; that against such officer no action can be maintained for an accident arising from his neglect to repair a highway. This argument was based upon sect. 117 of the Public Health Act, 1848; and the case of Young v. Davis, 7 H. & N. 760, 31 L. J. 250, Ex.; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 363, affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, 2 H. & C. 197; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 145. By the section referred to it is enacted that the local board of health within the limits of their district shall exclusively execute the office of surveyor of highways, and have all such powers, duties, and liabilities as any surveyor is now or may be hereafter invested with or liable to. In the case of Young v. Davis it was held that no action lies against a surveyor of highways appointed under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 for damage resulting from an accident caused by his neglect to repair the highway, upon the ground that although the Legislature imposed on the surveyor the duty of repairing the roads, yet that as this was only as the officer of the parish, and no action could be brought against the parish, it could not be supposed that it was the intention of the Legislature that such an action should be maintainable against the officer, and this view was adopted by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. Willes J., in delivering judgment, says: "This Act of Parliament appears not to have been passed for the purpose of creating a new liability either in the parish or any other persons, but simply in order to provide machinery whereby the existing duty of the parish may be conveniently fulfilled." The case of Parsons v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 56, was cited to show that the immunity from action which the surveyor enjoyed belonged also to a corporate body to whom the duties and liabilities of surveyor are transferred. It was there held that an action for non-repair of a highway would not lie against a vestry appointed under the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) on the ground that the liabilities of the parish were not transferred or taken away, although the right and liability of the surveyor (with additional powers) were transferred to the vestry (s. 96), and therefore it was held that as the surveyor had been previously exempt from action so the vestry continued. For the plaintiff it was admitted that if the duties of the local board were only those of the surveyor, the decision in Young v. Davis would be applicable, and the action could not be maintained; but it was contended that the local board was not merely in the place of the surveyor by virtue of sect. 117, but that it was also by virtue of sect. 68 in the place of the parish. It was further contended that the effect of sect. 68 was altogether to take away liability from the parish, and to transfer it to the local board, and that as the local board is a corporation, the technical difficulty which formerly stood in the way of surveying a parish or county (Russell v. Men of Devon, 2 T. R. 667), was removed, and an action might be maintained against the local board for the neglect of a statutable duty imposed upon it, as in the case of Hartnall v. The Ryde Commissioners, 4 B & S. 361; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574. In support of this argument the case of Henly v. The Mayor of Lyme, 5 Bing. 91, was cited. That case is, however, distinguished by Martin and Channell, BB., in Young v. Davis, and does not affect the question we have now to consider, namely, what was the intention of the Legislature in enacting sects. 68 and 117 of the Public Health Act 1848. On consideration of that statute, in connection with the previous state of the law with reference to which it was passed, we are of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. At common law no action could be maintained by one of the public in respect of an injury sustained through a highway being out of repair. It is true that in Russell v. Men of Devon the argument chiefly insisted on was that the action could not lie, because the inhabitants of a county are not a corporation, and therefore cannot be sued collectively; but the reason relied on by Lord Kenyon, C. J., and Ashurst, J., was not so much the technical one referred to as that which is expressed in Bro. Abr. tit. "Action on the Case," pl. 93. That passage is thus explained and paraphrased by Alderson, B., in McKinnon v. Penson, 8 Ex. 321, "That inasmuch as the highway ought to be repaired by the public, an injury arising from that neglect cannot be the subject of an action, but is only ground for the Crown interfering." But whatever the reason was the fact remains, that no action could be maintained for an injury arising from the non-repair of a highway by the parish, and the Legislature has not interfered by any general enactment to give a remedy by action to persons sustaining such a damage. It is therefore incumbent on the plaintiff who seeks to establish that such a right is exceptionally given to persons sustaining an injury in a particular district to show distinctly that the Legislature had such an intention in passing the enactment to which such an effect is attributed. The Court of Exchequer held in McKinnon v. Penson that such an intention could not be inferred from the very comprehensive language of the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59 s. 4, which enacts that the county may be sued in the name of their surveyor. This was held not to create a new liability, but only to afford a more convenient remedy in cases, if any, in which the county would be liable, and this construction, founded on the presumed intention of the Legislature, though with difficulty to be collected from its language, was upheld by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (McKinnon v. Penson, 9 Ex. 609; 23 L. J. 97, M. C.) Again, in Young v. Davis, the Court of Exchequer confirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber 2 H. & C. 197, held that an intention to give right of action for injury resulting from non-repair could not be inferred from the language of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. Again, in Parsons v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (ubi sup.), the Court of Common Pleas held that such an intention could not be inferred from the language of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; and again, in Wilson v. Marquis of Halifax, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 114, 119, Kelly, C.B., while deciding the case upon another point, says: "Should a case arise in which the question shall be whether the 68th section of the Public Health Act 1848 imposes upon the local authority the liability to be sued in a civil action for damages by reason of a failure to perform a duty assigned to them by the Act, we should pause before we could hold that, in addition to the well-established remedy by indictment, every individual among the public would have a right of action for any and every injury resulting from such breach of duty." In the case of Hartnell v. The Ryde Commissioners, however, this court did draw the inference that the Legislature, by the language of the particular local Act, intended to give a right of action against the defendants for an injury resulting from a breach of their duty to repair streets; but the enactment in that case was peculiar, inasmuch as it provided, by sect. 49, that the commissioners should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor for refusing or neglecting to repair any public highway within the limits of the special Act, and should be liable to be indicted for such misdemeanor in the same manner as the inhabitants thereof or of any parish were liable before the passing of the Act. It was held that these enactments took away the liability of the parish to do the repairs, and cast it upon the new body, with all the ordinary incidents, including liability to be sued resulting therefrom. There is no such provision in the Public Health Act 1848. The enactment that the streets shall "vest in" the local board, whatever meaning may be assigned to that expression, does not seem to us to enlarge the liability resulting from the following words, that they shall be "under the management and control of the local board"—language similar to that used in the statute under consideration in Rex v. St. George, Hanover-square, 3 Camp. 222, where it was held that the imposing of the duty of repairing on a person or body other than the parish did not by implication exempt the parish from liability to indictment; and while this liability remains, the cases above referred to, Young v. Davis and Parsons v. St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, establish that no right of action is created against those to whom the management and control of the roads is given. For these reasons we are of opinion that the Legislature did not intend, by the Public Health Act 1848, to give to a person in the position of the plaintiff a right of action which did not previously exist, and our judgment must therefore be for the defendants.

REG. v. THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF HEREFORD.

REG. v. THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF HEREFORD.

Sect. 25 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113 enacts "that in the cathedral church of York, so soon as a vacancy shall occur in the deanery, and in the cathedral churches of Chichester, Exeter, Hereford, Salisbury, and Wells respectively, so soon as every person who was a member of the respective chapters of such churches at the passing of this Act, shall cease to be such member, all the said canonries shall be in the direct patronage of the Lord Archbishop of York, and of the bishops of the said respective sees, as the case may be, who shall respectively, upon the vacancy of any canonry in such churches respectively, collate thereto a spiritual person, who shall thereupon be entitled to installation as a canon of the church to which he shall be so collated."

At the time of the passing of this Act the "general chapter" of the cathedral church of Hereford consisted of a dean, five residentiary canons, and twenty-two canons non-residentiary, the latter being appointed by the bishop. Of these, the dean and the five residentiary canons constituted what was called "the close chapter." One of the cathedral officers, called the prelector, having certain spiritual duties to perform, was appointed out of the non-residentiary canons by the "close chapter," and succeeded, by customary right, to any vacancy which occurred amongst the residentiary canons. On the death of the last of the members of the "close chapter," who existed at the time of the passing of the Act, and whilst seven of the then existing members of the "general chapter" still survived, a prelector, who had been appointed since the passing of the Act, claimed to succeed to the vacancy:

Held, that the prelector was not entitled to succeed; for that "chapter" in the above section meant the "close chapter," and therefore, on the death of the last member of that body, existing at the time of the passing of the Act, the bishop was entitled to appoint to the vacancy.

A mandamus having been directed to the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, commanding them to instal the Ven. and Rev. William Waring in the office of canon residentiary in that church, he having been collated to that office by the bishop of the diocese, the dean and chapter made a return, the allegations of which were traversed by a plea. Issue having been joined on the plea, a case was stated by consent of the parties, for the opinion of the court.

COCKBURN, C. J.—This is a special case, stated after a return made by the dean and chapter of the cathedral church of Hereford, to a mandamus, commanding them to instal the Ven. and Rev. Archdeacon Waring in the office of canon residentiary in that church, the said archdeacon having been collated to such office by the lord bishop of the diocese. The return of the dean and chapter

REG. v. THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF HEREFORD.

was to the effect that prior to the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the chapter of the cathedral church of Hereford consisted of the dean, the bishop's prebendary, four canons or prebends residentiary, certain dignitaries of the church, twenty-two canons or prebendaries non-residentiary; that of these the dean, the bishop's prebendary, and the four canons residentiary constituted the close chapter; that among the officers of the cathedral church was an officer termed the prælector, having certain spiritual duties attached to his office, which officer was by the constitution of the body appointed as of right by the close chapter out of the non-resident prebendaries, and that on a vacancy occurring among the canons residentiary other than in the case of the bishop's prebendary, who was always appointed by the bishop, the "prælector succeeded accustomably and of right" to the vacant residentiaryship. The return further proceeded to state, in order to show that the state of things had not arisen upon which by the 25th section of the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the right of appointing the canons residentiary was to be transferred to the bishop, that the Rev. Dr. Jebb, a non-residentiary prebend, had been appointed to the office of prælector before that all the persons forming the close chapter at the time of the passing of the Act had ceased to be members of it; and, secondly, that of the persons who at that time were members of the general chapter, seven still remained. The conclusion, therefore, was that the right of appointment had not passed to the bishop, and that the Rev. Dr. Jebb, who then claimed to be installed, was entitled to be so installed, while Archdeacon Waring was not. The statute in question, the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, by sect. 25, enacts that "In the cathedral church of York, so soon as a vacancy shall occur in the deanery, and in the cathedral churches of Chichester, Exeter, Hereford, Salisbury, and Wells respectively, so soon as every person who is a member of the respective chapters of such churches at the passing of the Act shall cease to be such member, all the said canonries shall be in the direct patronage of the Lord Archbishop of York and of the bishops of the said respective sees as the case may be, who shall respectively, upon the vacancy of any canonry in such churches respectively, collate thereto a spiritual person, who shall thereupon be entitled to installation as a canon of the church to which he shall be collated." The question for our decision is whether the event upon which, by effect of this enactment, the right of appointing a canon residentiary is to be transferred from the dean and chapter to the bishop of the diocese has arisen: and this, again, mainly turns on the construction which, with reference to the cathedral church of Hereford, is to be put on the word "chapter," as used in the foregoing section. It appears from the special case that, prior to the passing of the Act, the general chapter of the cathedral church of Hereford consisted of the dean and five prebends or canons residentiary, twenty-two prebends or canons non-residentiary, and the archdeacon, and an officer of the cathedral named the prælector. As distinguished from the general chapter, the dean and the five canons residentiary formed also for many purposes a distinct chapter, sometimes termed the "close chapter." The government of the body was regulated by certain cathedral statutes of the reign of Charles I., commonly called the Caroline Statutes, as also by certain customs and ordinances. The authority of the general chapter was exercised over certain matters affecting the general interests of the church. Thus, their consent was necessary to any alteration of the cathedral statutes, as also to the removal of the prælector. They met twice a year, at times appointed by the statutes. They were also convened for the receipt of the royal conge-d'elire, and the election of a bishop, in pursuance of it, as well as for the installation of the dean, prebendaries, and other dignitaries of the church, and the election of proctors in convocation. On the other hand, the residentiaries exclusively managed the capitular property, and divided its revenues; they alone granted ecclesiastical leases, and confirmed the bishops' concurrent leases of the ecclesiastical property; they exclusively presented to all livings in the gift of the dean and chapter; they alone appointed the prælector and all the other officers of the cathedral except the dean, who was appointed by the Crown; they alone had the custody of the corporate seal, which they affixed to all documents, including those which issued from the general body. Next, as to the appointment of the members of the capitular body. The appointment of the non-resident prebendaries was vested in the bishop, and from this body the five residentiary canons were exclusively selected. One of the five, commonly called the bishop's prebendary, was appointed by the bishop. When a vacancy occurred among the other four, by the established custom, the prælector, an officer appointed by the close chapter out of the non-resident prebendaries, succeeded as of right, or, at all events, as of course, to the vacant prebend; and a new prælector was appointed in his place by the close chapter. Thus the appointment of the residentiary canons with the exception of the bishop's prebend, was practically in the close chapter. At the time of the passing of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, one of the residentiary prebends was vacant, and was consequently, by the effect of sect. 14 of the Act, suppressed. Of the remaining four residentiary canons one only, Canon Huntingford, remained alive in the year 1863. In that year a vacancy having occurred in the office of prælector, the Rev. Dr. Jebb, a non-residentiary canon was appointed by the close chapter, to that office, which he still holds. In 1867 Canon Huntingford, the last of the canons residentiary holding office at the passing of the Act, died. Of the twenty-two non-resident prebendaries living at the passing of the Act, seven still survive. It follows that, according as the language of the Act, which provides for the transfer of the parsonage in respect of the residentiary prebends to the bishop, "so soon as every person who was a member of the chapter at the passing of the Act shall have ceased to be such member," was intended to refer in the case of the cathedral church of Hereford, to the general chapter, or to the close chapter, the event on which the transfer of the patronage is made to depend, will or will not have occurred. If the word "chapter" refers to the close chapter, viz., the dean and residentiary canons, none of the then existing body any longer remains. If it refers to the general chapter, several of that body are still alive, and retain their prebends. On the argument before us, it was insisted on the part of Archdeacon Waring, that all that was contemplated by the Legislature in thus preserving the rights of the "chapter" was to save the vested right of patronage to the existing members of the close chapter, to whom the right of appointment exclusively belonged; the right of eligibility, spread over so large an area, being, as it was said, too small to have received attention or to have been deemed of sufficient importance to stand in the way of a change thought to be desirable. On the other hand, on the part of Dr. Jebb, on whose behalf the return was made, it was urged that the purpose of the reservation was to preserve all vested rights, and that the right of eligibility to a valuable preferment in the members of a limited body, was an appreciable and valuable right, and one which Parliament might well be presumed to have intended to respect. The term "chapter" used in the Act, being thus open to a twofold construction, and its meaning appearing to us open to doubt, it occurred to us before the close of the argument that as by the same enactment, in the case of the cathedral church of York, the appointment of the canon residentiary was directed to be transferred to the archbishop on the first vacancy in the deanery, without any reference to the chapter, if the fact should be, as we had reason to think it was, that the patronage had previously been in the dean alone, but that he, like the dean and chapter of Hereford, had been limited in his selection, to the non-residentiary canons, the provision in respect of the church of York would afford a solution of the meaning of the Legislature in respect of the church of Hereford, as showing that it was the vested right of patronage alone which the Legislature intended to preserve. We accordingly remitted the matter to the learned gentleman by whom the case had been stated, requesting him to ascertain and inform us as to the state of things existing in the cathedral church of York at the time of the passing of the Act. We have since been furnished with a further statement from the learned arbitrator, from which it appears that from the passing of a cathedral statute of the 8 Geo. 3, the appointment of the residentiary canons was exclusively in the dean, and that his choice was limited to the non-residentiary canons. It is plain, therefore, that all that the Legislature intended in postponing the operation of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, to the next vacancy in the deanery was to preserve the existing right of patronage without any regard to the rights of the body out of which the selection was to be made we cannot suppose that there can have been any intention to make a distinction in this respect between the capitular body of Hereford and that of York, and with this indication of the intention of the Legislature before us, we are of opinion that on the death of the last of the canons residentiary living at the time of the Act passing, the enactment in sect. 25 took effect, and the canonries passed into the direct patronage of the bishop. It was, however, further contended that as by the terms of the statute the new right of patronage was only to be exercised on a "vacancy" occurring, there was in the present instance no occasion for its exercise, there being no vacancy, inasmuch as Dr. Jebb, having being elected to the office of prælector before the Act had come into operation, was entitled, as of right, to assume at once the office of residentiary canon. We should not have been sorry to give effect to this contention, had it been possible; for one cannot but feel the hardship to a reverend gentleman who, having filled for so many years an office which has always hitherto been as of right the stepping stone to a residentiary prebend, and who, if any other vacancy save that created by the death of Canon Huntingford had occurred, would of course have succeeded to the canonry, in being disappointed in his reasonable expectation. But we think the position thus taken by the defendant's counsel is untenable. The prælector was not a residentiary canon by virtue of his office; and, though he succeeded to the canonry as of right, still it was only on a vacancy occurring that by virtue of the custom he stepped into the vacant canonry, and was entitled to be admitted and installed. It is impossible, therefore, to say that there was not a vacancy created by the death of Canon Huntingford within the meaning of the statute. The result is, that a peremptory mandamus must go to the dean and chapter to admit Archdeacon Waring to the vacant residentiary prebend.

Judgment accordingly.

THOMAS v. THE RHYMNEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Negligence as carrier of passengers—Liability for negligence of another company over whose line it has running powers.

A railway company having given a ticket to a passenger for conveyance between two places, the latter part of the journey being performed over the line of another company over which it had running powers, and a collision causing injury to the passenger having occurred on this part of the journey owing to the negligence of the latter company, and without any negligence on the part of the company contracting with the passenger, it was Held, on the authority of the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94, and Buxton v. The North Eastern Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795, that the company from whom the passenger obtained the ticket was liable for the injuries occasioned to him by the negligence of the other company over whose line it had running powers.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff from a collision which took place on the defendants' railway whilst the plaintiff was being carried as a passenger for hire. The declaration alleged that the plaintiff became a passenger to be carried by the defendants with due care on their railway, and that they so negligently conducted themselves that the train in which he was came into collision with an engine and van on the railway, whereby he sustained injury.

The defendants pleaded (1) not guilty; and (2) that the plaintiff was not a passenger as alleged. On these pleas issue was joined.

The case was tried at the Glamorganshire Spring Assizes 1869, before Kelly, C. B., when the following facts were proved: The plaintiff took a ticket of the defendants to be carried as a passenger from Caerphilly to Cardiff. The defendants' line joins that of the Taff Vale Railway Company at Llandaff, which is situated between Caerphilly and Cardiff, and the defendants have only running powers, on the payment of certain tolls, over that part of the line which goes from Llandaff to Cardiff, the whole of the traffic arrangements being under the sole control of the Taff Vale Railway Company.

The collision, which occasioned the injury to the plaintiff, occurred on the part of the journey between Llandaff and Cardiff, and was caused by the train in which he was travelling running into an engine and van belonging to the Taff Vale Railway Company, which was advancing on the same line of rails, and in the same direction with the train.

The jury found that the collision was caused by the negligence of the servants of the Taff Vale Railway Company in allowing the defendants' train to proceed too soon after the other, and without any warning to the driver, and also in omitting to have a proper tail light attached to their own train. The jury found that the defendants' servants who were in charge of the defendants' train were not guilty of any negligence.

The Lord Chief Baron directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants, but gave the plaintiff leave to move to enter the verdict for him for 450*l.*, if the court should be of opinion that the defendants were liable.

A rule nisi to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for that sum having been obtained by Giffard, Q. C., who cited the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, 7 H. & N. 987; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94.

Field, Q. C. and H. G. Allen, now showed cause on behalf of the defendants.—They contended that the

[Q. B.]

Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (ubi sup.) was distinguishable from the present case; the two companies in that case having entered into an arrangement whereby they were to share the profits, whereas in the present case the defendants have only running powers over the line of the Taff Vale Railway Company; they have no control over the traffic arrangements or over the servants of the latter company; they are merely in the position of a coach owner running over a turnpike road, over which any person may run on payment of tolls, in which case the remedy in case of an accident like the present, is against the trustees of the road, and not against the carrier. The contract of the carrier is only that he will not be guilty of any negligence, and the jury have negatived the existence of any negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants. Byles, J. was the only judge in the case of the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, who expressly said that in his opinion the railway company would have been liable even if there had been no arrangement as to a division of profits between them and the other company. Mellor, J. declined to express an opinion on that subject, saying, "I do not say how it would be if the Great Western Railway Company had run over the line of the South Wales Company on payment of tolls. I do not dissent from what my brother Byles has said on that point; but I express no opinion upon it, as it is not necessary for the decision of this case." [LUSH, J.—The question comes to this, whether the Taff Vale Railway Company were your agents or servants. They were not so in fact, and the only point is whether they are not so in law.]

Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company, 20

Crofts v. Waterhouse, 3 Bing. 319; and

were also referred to.

G. B. Hughes in support of the rule. By giving the plaintiff a ticket from Caerphilly to Cardiff, the defendants contracted to carry him safely to Cardiff. The case of a railway company which has running powers over the line of another company entering into such a contract is not analogous to that of a coach proprietor carrying over a turnpike-road; the passenger in the former case knowing nothing, as a rule, of the private arrangements with other companies, which the company contracting with him may have made; and difficulties would be interposed in his way, if he were obliged to find out to which of perhaps several companies the carriage in which he is at the time of a collision, happens to belong. [LUSH, J.—Such a difficulty arose in the case of Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499.]—The point raised in this case is in fact concluded by authority. The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (ubi sup.); decided that where there is a division of profits, the one railway company is agent to the other, and there is no difference between the payment of agreed tolls and the division of profits. Cockburn, C.J., said, "It has been settled that where a railway company enters into a contract for the conveyance of goods to a distance extending not merely over their own line, but over the whole or some portion of any other line of railway with which it is connected, the company so contracting is liable not only for the loss of the goods upon their own line, but also in respect of the loss of the goods upon the line not their own. I think that position obtains in the case of passengers. If a railway company chooses to contract to carry passengers not only over their own line but also over the line of another company, either in whole or in part, the company so contracting incurs all the liability which would attach to them if they had contracted solely to carry over their own line," and Byles, J. says, "The express finding, that by arrangement between the two companies, the fares are apportioned between them, involves this proposition, that when the Great Western train comes upon the South Wales line, as the profits are divided between the Great Western and South Wales companies, for the purpose of this action the South Wales line became the Great Western line, and the Great Western Company were bound to take due care with respect to the machinery, that is, the engine, carriage, and line. It is sufficient to rest there; but if necessary I should go further and say that without the arrangement as to profits, the Great Western Company by their contract with the plaintiff below, were as much bound to take care of the machinery as if the whole line was their own." There is no special term whatever in the contract which the defendants entered into with the plaintiff, which limits their liability. Another case in favour of the plaintiff, and decisive of the point in question, is Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795, in which Blackburn, J. says, "I think the first question raised in this case is settled by the case of Blake v. The Great Western Railway Company. I understand that case to go to this extent, that where a passenger contracts with a railway company to carry him from one terminus to another, so as to run over the line of an intermediate railway, it is part of the contract that whatever liability the intermediate line would have incurred as to one of its own passengers shall be incurred by the other. According to that decision, which is an extremely convenient one, the North-Eastern Railway Company when they gave the ticket in the present case did in effect contract that they would be responsible for everything for which the Midland Company would be responsible to one of their own passengers, and undertook all those duties which that company undertook on its own line;" and Lush, J. was of the same opinion, saying, "The first point raised is, I think, determined by the case of Blake v. The Great Western Railway Company." [LUSH, J.—The present point was not at all argued in that case.] The inclination of judicial authority has in other cases been in the same direction: (See the observations of Rolfe, B. in Muschamp v. Lancaster, &c., Railway Company, 8 M. & W. 430; and the case of Birkett v. Whitehaven Railway Company, 4 H. & N. 730.) [He was here stopped by the court.]

MELLOR, J.—I think we are bound by the case of Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, which we are unable satisfactorily to distinguish from the present case. At the same time I feel bound to say that I do not concur in it. I mean that if I were called on to decide the question on the state of facts now appearing, my opinion would be that the defendants are not liable for the accident which has occurred, having no control over the line of the Taff Vale Railway Company, and that the defendants are liable only for the negligence of those persons over whom they have control. I think it was assumed in the case of Buxton v. The Great Northern Railway Company, that the facts of that case were the same as those in The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake. This, however, is only a conjecture, it having been admitted by counsel that it could not be distinguished; and expressions are attributed to some of the judges that the point in which they are distinguishable made no difference. Therefore, as at present advised, it seems to me that we should not be justified in overruling that case, and that if the railway company wish to question its authority, they must for that purpose go into a court of error. But for myself personally I will say that I consider the case of the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake to be distinguishable on the ground that there there was a mutual arrangement between the two companies as to sharing the profits; there was an agency on the part of each of them for the other; and it seems to me that the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber rested their decision on that. I certainly did not concur in the further observations made by my brother Byles, but reserved to myself the right of holding that circumstances like the present might alter the case, and that is my present impression. I cannot, however, distinguish the case of Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company from the present, and, therefore, if the defendants desire to call in question the authority of that case, they must go into error.

BECHER v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

LUSH, J.—The distinction which has been pointed out between the present case and that of The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, was not suggested in the argument of Buxton v. The North Eastern Railway Company; and certainly it was not present to my mind when I gave judgment in that case. However, when I look at that decision, fortified as it is to a certain extent by the general observations of the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Byles in Blake's case, I do not think we can now give a contrary decision. At the same time I cannot help saying that I hope the case will go into error in order that it may be determined whether there is or is not any substantial distinction between the two. The rule, therefore, must be made absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiff.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule absolute.

BECHER v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Negligence as carriers—Passengers' luggage—Master's property carried as servant's luggage.

The owner of a portmanteau who allows his servant to carry it by train as his own personal luggage, the servant taking and paying for his ticket, and the owner travelling by a later train, cannot maintain an action against the railway company for the loss of the portmanteau.

This was a special case, stated by consent of the parties for the opinion of the court, as follows:—

The action is brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for the recovery of 56*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, the value of wearing apparel and a portmanteau, in which it was contained, belonging to the plaintiff.

The defendants are a railway company, incorporated by 25 & 26 Vict. c. ccxxiii., and are common carriers for hire by railway of goods and passengers from Newmarket to London.

In July 1868 the plaintiff and some friends arranged to go from London to Newmarket for the purpose of attending the races there, and they took a man servant of one of the party to attend on them in common during their stay at Newmarket.

On the last day of the races, the servant being about to return by an early train on the defendants' line, and the plaintiff being desirous of returning later in the day, the plaintiff entrusted his portmanteau and its contents to the servant, with directions to take it up to London with him. The plaintiff gave the servant 1*l.* for his attention during his stay at Newmarket.

The servant accordingly proceeded to the defendants' station at Newmarket, and obtained from the defendants, and duly paid them for a ticket from Newmarket to London. The servant delivered over the portmanteau, with its contents, and his own luggage, as well as that of the other gentlemen, to the servants of the defendant at the Newmarket station as his ordinary luggage, and the same was received by the defendants as ordinary luggage for the purpose of being carried by the defendants as carriers as aforesaid, with the servant on his journey. The servant was carried by the defendants to London, but the portmanteau and its contents were lost during the journey by default of the defendants.

The plaintiff himself proceeded from Newmarket to London by a later train on the defendants' railway on the same day; and he also duly obtained and paid the defendants for his ticket for such journey, and took no luggage with him.

By sect. 228 of the Great Eastern Railway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. ccxxiii.), every passenger travelling upon the railways may take with him his ordinary luggage, not exceeding 120*lb.* in weight for first-class passengers, 100*lb.* in weight for second-class passengers, and 60*lb.* in weight for third-class passengers without any charge being made for the carriage thereof.

The luggage taken with the servant on the journey was delivered to the company as not exceeding the weight he was allowed to take as luggage under the above section, and was not weighed by the company.

The court is to be at liberty to draw from the above facts any conclusions or inferences which in their judgment ought to be drawn.

The question for the court is whether the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for the loss of the portmanteau and contents.

Philbrick, for the plaintiff.—The question is whether the master can sue the defendants upon the contract made with his servant under the circumstances of the case. In Comyn's Dig. tit. "Action on the case for negligence" B. (B. 1), it is laid down that "the master may have an action for goods lost at an inn where his servant was a guest." [LUSH, J.—Suppose an accident had happened to the servant, could the master, under the circumstances of this case, maintain an action against the railway company for the loss of service?] No; that has been decided in the case of Alton v. Midland Railway Company, 19 C. B., N. S., 213, because the matter arose wholly out of the contract of carriage which was made with the servant. If, however, the wrong arose independently of contract, the master could recover; and the present case being stated without pleadings, if there is a liability of any sort, whether arising from contract or tort, the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for the loss which he has sustained. The contract here was not a strictly personal one with the servant, in which the master could not intervene. [LUSH, J.—The servant could only take the portmanteau as his own luggage.] Suppose the servant had told the railway company that the luggage he was carrying belonged to his master, surely the master could recover. [LUSH, J.—There is no evidence whatever of any contract being made with the servant.] There is a duty cast upon the defendants as common carriers by the custom of the realm, independently of contract.

Marriott, for the defendants.—If there is any liability it arises ex contractu, and the contract was made only with the servant, who in the present case was the servant of several persons, to each of whom, if the plaintiff's contention were sound, the defendants would be liable. [He was here stopped.]

MELLOR, J.—I think we need not trouble you further. We are all satisfied that in this case no action will lie at the suit of the plaintiff against the defendants. It is clear on the facts as stated that the defendants received the portmanteau as the luggage of the servant. He takes the ticket, and says nothing to the company as to the position in which he stands in relation to these several masters, and the company takes and carries the luggage as his. It would be improper for us to say now what would be the result of the case if the servant, when he took his ticket, had said that the luggage was his master's, and the railway company had received it as the master's. That would have given rise to very different considerations, and would probably lead to a different result. But that is not the case here, where a person with whom the railway company had never any relation of contract whatever, brings an action against them for the loss of luggage carried by a servant as his own.

LUSH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think it would be most unjust to make railway companies liable for losses of this description. If the servant had told the company that the luggage was not his own, they probably would not have taken it. The person who allows his servant to take luggage as his own, must sue in the name of the servant. The matter is one resting entirely on contract, and the only person with whom a contract was made was the servant.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Ex parte SAMUEL LLOYD JONES (an Articled Clerk).

Articled clerk—Binding for a less period than five years—Void articles—Refusal of the court to permit service under, to be reckoned under fresh articles.

By sect. 3 of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, no person is to be capable of being admitted an attorney unless he shall have been bound by contract, in writing, to serve as clerk for and during the term of five years; and by sect. 5 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, certain of the judges may, by regulations, direct that the person having successfully passed any examination, now or hereafter to be established in any of the universities, and to be specified in such regulations, may be admitted after having been subsequently bound and served under articles for four years.

S. L. J. had successfully passed the middle-class examinations of Oxford and Cambridge, which, however, were not included in the regulations of the judges, and he was thereupon articled for a term of four years, which term he duly served:

Held, that the articles were bad; and the court refused to permit him upon entering into fresh articles to have the advantage of his four years previous service under such former articles.

This was an application on the part of a Mr. Samuel Lloyd Jones, an articled clerk, calling upon the Incorporated Law Society to register his articles of clerkship, and for leave for him to enter into fresh articles to serve for one year. The affidavit upon which the application was made was as follows:—

I, Samuel Lloyd Jones, of 29, Victoria-place, Bangor, in the county of Carmarthen, clerk to Henry Lloyd Jones, of the same place, attorney-at-law and solicitor in Chancery, make oath and say as follows:—

1. That I did, by articles of agreement dated the 13th Aug. 1864, now produced, and shown to me at the time of swearing this my affidavit, and marked (a), bind myself as clerk to my father, the said Henry Lloyd Jones, to serve him in the profession of an attorney-at-law and solicitor in Chancery, from the date of the said articles for the term of four years.

2. I had, previous to my entering into the said articles, passed the Cambridge Middle-Class Examination, held in the month of December 1862, as a junior candidate, and also passed the Oxford Middle-Class Examination, held in and for the year 1863, as a senior candidate, and obtained the usual certificate of associate of arts for the University of Oxford, and I was informed and then believed that this certificate or degree entitled me to the privilege of serving one year less under my articles, and the term was accordingly made for four years instead of five years.

3. The said articles were sent up within the usual period of six months, to be enrolled and registered, and I am informed and believe that they were so enrolled, but that after they had been presented for registration at the Law Institution, a question was raised there as to the term being for four years only, and the said articles were returned without, it would appear, such registration being perfected, for I was informed when I expressed a wish to pass my intermediate examination that an objection had been made at the Law Institution to my said articles being registered there, on account of the time being for four years, instead of five years, and I was not until then aware that there was anything wrong or irregular in reference to my said articles.

4. I am now, and have been for some time past, most desirous of having the registration of my said articles perfected, and of applying to pass my intermediate examination with as little further delay as possible; and that my past and present service should be taken into account without reference to the time of my passing the said intermediate examination, and that I should be at liberty to be articled to the said Henry Lloyd Jones for another year, to make up the full term of five years; and also that I should be allowed to go up for my final examination at the examination which will take place next after the first day of March, 1871, I having already served the full period of five years up to the 13th day of August last.

5. I was also for more than twelve months in the office of my father, the said Henry Lloyd Jones, previous to my entering into the said articles, and I am now in the said office and employed in his business.

By sect. 3 of the 6 & 8 Vict. c. 73, it is enacted—

That, except as hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, from and after the passing of this Act be capable of being admitted and enrolled as an attorney or solicitor, unless such person shall have been bound by contract in writing to serve as clerk for and during the term of five years to a practising attorney or solicitor in England or Wales, and shall have duly served under such contract for and during the said term of five years, &c.

By sect. 5 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127 ("An Act to Amend the Laws Relating to Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, and Certificated Conveyancers") it is enacted that—

The Lord Chief Justices of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, jointly with the Master of the Rolls, may, if they think fit, from time to time, by regulations to be made by them, direct that the person having successfully passed any examination now or hereafter to be established in any of the universities hereinbefore mentioned, and to be specified in such regulations, may be admitted and enrolled as an attorney or solicitor, after having been subsequently bound by, and having duly served under articles of clerkship to a practising attorney or solicitor for the term of four years, and been examined and sworn as aforesaid; and the said judges may from time to time revoke or alter such regulations as they think fit, but not so as to allow a less period of service than four years.

In pursuance of the above section the judges by a rule, dated the 26th July 1861, ordered—

That from and after the first day of Hilary Term 1862 every person who before entering into articles of clerkship shall produce to the registrar of attorneys a certificate that he has successfully passed the first public examination before moderators at Oxford, or the previous examination at Cambridge, or the examination in arts for the second year at Durham, or the matriculation examination at the Universities of Dublin or London, and has been placed in the first division on such matriculation examination shall be entitled to the benefit of the 5th section of the Attorneys' Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

M'Intyre now moved accordingly.—This gentleman has in fact served more than his full term of five years, and it was only by a misapprehension that he was entitled to deduct one year, that his articles were drawn up for four instead of five years. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Have we the power to comply with your application?] I submit that you have; all that the statute intended to enforce was the serving under articles for five years. He has already served for four years under his articles, and he now desires to serve under articles for another year.

BRUMFITT (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF LIVERPOOL (resps.)

[BLACKBURN, J.—The words of the statute are, “unless such person shall have been bound by contract in writing to serve as clerk for and during the term of five years.” Now he has not been so bound. COCKBURN, C. J.—Nor is he within the exceptions, and therefore he has not served under any good articles for five years.] The case may be put in this way. Let him enter into fresh articles for five years, and permit his previous service to be reckoned. His service need not be under one contract. [COCKBURN, C. J.—According to that a clerk may complete his service by five different bindings of one year each. Here the original contract was unlawful.] The court has heretofore extended the interpretation of the Act so as to prevent a hardship to the clerk. In Ex parte Smith, 1 Ell. & Ell. 928; 28 L. J. 263, Q. B., the clerk served under articles to an attorney and solicitor for four years six months and twenty-four days. He then with the consent of his master was absent for about three years, during part of that time serving as ensign in a militia regiment, and during the residue being employed as a surveyor of taxes in the Inland Revenue office. He then returned to his original master, and served him as a clerk, but not under articles for a period of five months and six days. It was held that the latter period of service as clerk could not be computed with the former period of such service so as to make the requisite period of five years’ service. But leave was granted to him to enter into fresh articles to be stamped with the same duty as was payable upon the original articles, and to serve under such fresh articles to complete the period of five years. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But in that case the original contract was good, although the service under it was insufficient.] Yet the words of the 3rd section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, are “shall have duly served under such contract for and during the said term of five years,” and the court has permitted a service of part of the time under other articles. [COCKBURN, C. J.—In those cases the service was under each contract of five years, and certainly we have gone very far in allowing any part of the service to be under a different contract. We must, however, go no further. The Act says the clerk must serve under a contract for five years. If I had power to remedy this difficulty I would use it.] I am only asking that this gentleman’s actual service of four years may not be wholly thrown away. [BLACKBURN, J.—The Legislature intended that there should be a binding contract for five years.] There was an error in supposing that passing the middle-class examinations would entitle the clerk to the benefit under the rules of one year’s remission.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We have not included in our rules any such examination. I wish I could help you, as I much sympathise with your client; but the language of the Act of Parliament is clear, and unless the case comes within the exceptions we cannot interfere. The statute requires that the binding shall be for five years, and although we have permitted two services under different articles, the articles themselves have been for the required period.

Application refused.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

Jan. 25 and Feb. 23.

BRUMFITT (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF LIVERPOOL
(resps.)

Notice of appeal—Qualification of a county voter—Pew in church.

A claimant whose name had been retained upon the list of county voters declined to support the barrister’s decision upon appeal, and no other person interested consented to do so; the barrister accordingly named the overseers of the parish as respondents, and indorsed upon the special case the names of four persons who were, as he was informed, the overseers for the time being. Subsequently it was discovered that only one of the four persons was then an overseer, the period of office of the other three having expired. Notice of appeal was served upon the overseers, as well as upon the four persons named as respondents; the respondents did not appear:

Held, that the requirements of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 64, were sufficiently fulfilled.

By a local Act, after reciting that the church of St. Mark’s, Liverpool, had been built by subscription and consecrated, certain of the subscribers were appointed commissioners and trustees, and empowered to let or sell, and transfer and convey, for the purpose only of attending divine service, all and every of certain pews or seats in the said church to the inhabitants of certain parishes; by a subsequent local Act it was enacted that the fee-simple and inheritance of and in the said pews or seats shall be vested in the said subscribers to the said church of St. Mark, or the proprietors for the time being of the pews and seats, their heirs and assigns for ever; and they are thereby authorised and empowered to sell, dispose of and convey all or any of the said seats or pews, together with the fee-simple and inheritance of the same respectively to any person or persons willing to become purchasers thereof.

*Two pews, the annual value of each being 5*l., were conveyed by the said commissioners and trustees to a person who claimed upon that qualification a vote for the county:

Held, that the Legislature had not given to the owners of these pews or seats any freehold interest in the land which was covered by such pews or seats, or in any profit arising out of such land; therefore the claimant had no right to be registered.

Hinde v. Chorlton, L. Rep. C. P. 104; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472 followed.

This was an appeal from the decision of one of the revising barristers for the south-western division of the county of Lancaster.

At a court held before one of the revising barristers appointed to revise the list of voters for the south-western division of the county of Lancaster, the appellant duly objected to the name of Matthew Redhead being retained in the list of voters for the south-western division of the said county.

The name of Matthew Redhead appeared on the list of claimants as follows: “Redhead, Matthew, 52, Great George-street, Liverpool, freehold pews, 72 and 72½, St. Mark’s Church, Upper Duke-street.”

The said Matthew Redhead produced a deed bearing date the 29th April, 1863, made between John Highfield of the one part, and the said Matthew Redhead of the other part. The deed, after reciting that the said Highfield was seised to him and his heirs of the said pews in the said church of St. Mark for an estate of inheritance in fee simple, witnessed that the said Highfield did thereby grant and convey unto the said Redhead and his heirs the said pews and the sole and exclusive right of using the same at all times when Divine service should be performed in the said church, and at all other reasonable times when the said church should be opened for the use of persons frequenting the same, together with all ways, privileges, and advantage of passage in and through the aisles of the said church, and all other advantages and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the said Highfield therein or thereto, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said Redhead, his heirs, and assigns for ever, under and subject to the payment of such yearly rents, and such levies, assessments, and other sums of money as should thereafter become due or be lawfully charged or imposed upon the said pews or the owners or occupiers thereof, by virtue of the Act of Parliament relating to the said church. By the said deeds Highfield covenanted that he was well and absolutely entitled to the said pews, and had good right, full power, and lawful and absolute authority to convey the same to the said Redhead and his heirs in manner aforesaid, and that the said Redhead and his heirs and assigns should have quiet possession of the said pews, free from incumbrance by the said Highfield or any person whomsoever, except in respect of the said rents and assessments.

It was alleged by the said Redhead, and admitted by the appellant, that the said Highfield derived his title to the said pews from a deed made shortly after the passing of the Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii., hereinafter mentioned, by which the persons mentioned in the 4th section of the said Act as "the said subscribers to the said church of St. Mark," granted and conveyed the said pews to the said Highfield, and that the said last-mentioned indenture was in its terms in all respects similar to the indenture previously referred to in this case.

Before the said conveyance to the said Highfield, the said subscribers had not, nor had the commissioners and trustees mentioned in the Act of 56 Geo. 3, c. lxx., hereinafter referred to, granted or conveyed any interest in the said pews to any other person.

The said church of St. Mark was established by an Act of Parliament passed in the fifty-sixth year of the reign of King George III. (c. lxx.), entitled, "An Act for establishing a new Church, called the Church of St. Mark, situate in the Town and Parish of Liverpool, in the County Palatine of Lancaster."

The provisions of the Act relating to this case are sufficiently referred to in the judgment of the court.

The schedules to the said Act are in form as follows:—

The free list or schedule, &c., containing an account of the several pews or seats set apart for the minister.
Seats on the ground floor.

Number.	Value.
and so on.

The second list or schedule, &c., containing an account of the pews and sittings set apart for the use of the poor for ever.

Number.	Situation.	No. of Sittings.	Value.
177 to 190	Six pews, each containing four sittings, on the ground floor behind the pulpit, and so on.	24	200l.

The third list or schedule, &c., containing an account of all the pews and seats in the said church, save the pews and seats contained or set down in the first and second schedule to this Act annexed.

Number.	Rent.
6 and 15 and so on.	1l. 19s. 11d.

The said pews in this case mentioned are pews contained in the third schedule to the said Act.

In the second and third years of the reign of Her present Majesty, an Act of Parliament was passed (cap. xxxiii.), which contains the following provision:—

Sect. 4:

And whereas doubts have arisen as to the estate and interest which the subscribers to and proprietors of the said church of Saint Mark took in the pews and seats set forth on the third list or schedule of the said recited Act: be it therefore enacted that from and after the passing of this Act, the fee simple and inheritance of and in the said pews or seats set forth in the third list or schedule to the said Act annexed, shall be vested in the said subscribers to the said church of Saint Mark, or the proprietors for the time being of the same pews and seats, their heirs and assigns for ever; and they are hereby authorised and empowered to sell, dispose of, and convey all or any of the same seats or pews, together with the fee simple and inheritance of the same respectively, to any person or persons willing to become purchasers thereof, anything in the said recited Act relating to the said church of St. Mark to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

The said pews in the second paragraph of this case mentioned, are each of the annual value of 5l., after deducting all charges upon the same. Since April 1863, the said Redhead has been in the habit of attending divine service at the said church of St. Mark, and occupying one of the said pews during the time of service. No other person has at any time been allowed to use such pew without the permission of the said Redhead. The other of the said pews has been since 1863 occupied in the same manner by persons to whom Redhead let the same, and who have regularly paid rent to him therefor.

The barrister was of opinion that the said Redhead had a freehold estate in the said pews or one of them, sufficient to entitle him to have his name retained on the list of voters, and he retained his name on the list of voters.

The said Redhead in open court declined to support the said decision, and as no person interested in the matter of the said appeal consented to support the decision appealed against, the barrister named the overseers of the parish of Liverpool to be the respondents in this appeal.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the said Redhead had a freehold estate sufficient to entitle him to have his name retained in the list of voters? Should the court be of opinion that Redhead had not such a freehold estate, his name was to be erased from the list of voters.

The appellant's points were as follows:—1. That the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and that the name of Matthew Redhead ought not to be retained on the list of voters for the south-west division of the county of Lancaster 2. That independently of the private Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii, Matthew Redhead had not acquired the freehold of either of the pews, but only the right to go into them for certain purposes, and that such right was an easement and not a tenement within the meaning of 8 Hen. 6 c. 7. 3. That the effect of the said private Act is only to alter the interest of the subscribers or proprietors in the subject-matter thereof, and does not in any way alter the nature of that subject matter 4. That the said Act cannot have the effect of altering an easement or mere personal right into a tenement or land right, sufficient to give a vote within the meaning of 8 Hen. 6, c 7. That the proprietors of the said pews are only at liberty to use them for the purpose of attending Divine service,

BRUMFITT (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF LIVERPOOL (resp.)

and are not at liberty to use them at any time they may like. 6. That the expression "pew or seat," mentioned in the said private Act, shows that the right was in the nature of an easement and not a tenement, within the meaning of 8 Hen 6, c. 7.

No one was instructed to support the barrister's decision.

Crompton appeared for the appellant, and produced affidavits to satisfy the requirements of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 64, which provides that "no appeal shall be heard by the said Court (of Common Pleas) in any case where the said respondent shall not appear, unless the said appellant shall prove that due notice of his intention to prosecute, such appeal was given or sent to the said respondent ten days at least, before the day appointed for the hearing of such appeal." In this case the revising barrister endorsed the names of four persons who were, as he was informed, overseers of the parish of Liverpool, on the special case. Subsequently it was discovered that only one of these four persons was then an overseer, the period of office of the other three having expired. Notice of appeal was served upon the overseers, as well as upon the persons named as respondents, but the revising barrister considered that he had no power, after the conclusion of his appointment, to amend his nomination of respondents.

The court held this was sufficient.

Crompton then argued that the decision of the barrister was contrary to the authority of

Hinde v. Chorlton, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 104; 15 L. T. Rep. 472;

Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 B. & Ald. 356;

and was not justified by the special provisions of these local Acts.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—The judgment of the court (Bovill, C.J., Willes and Brett, JJ.) was delivered by BOVILL, C.J.—In this case one Matthew Redhead claimed to be registered in the parish of Liverpool as a voter for the south-western division of the county of Lancaster, in respect of an alleged qualification thus described in his claim:—"Freehold pews, 72 and 72½, St. Mark's Church." In support of his claim Redhead produced a deed, bearing date the 29th April 1863, made between one John Highfield and the said Matthew Redhead, whereby, after reciting that Highfield was seised to him and his heirs of the said pews, &c., for an estate of inheritance in fee simple, it was witnessed that Highfield did thereby grant and convey unto the said Redhead and his heirs the said pews, and the sole and exclusive right of using the same at all times when Divine service should be performed in the said church, and at all other reasonable times when the said church should be opened for the use of persons frequenting the same. It was admitted that Highfield derived his title from a deed in the same terms, made shortly after the passing of stat. 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii., between Highfield and the persons mentioned in the 4th section, as "the said subscribers to the said church of St. Mark's." The church of St. Mark's was established under the stat. 56 Geo. 3, c. lxxv. By sect. 1 of that statute it was recited, among other things, that several of the inhabitants residing in the parish of Liverpool had procured a lease of land from the Corporation of Liverpool, and had built a church or chapel thereon, with galleries, pews, seats, and other conveniences, accommodations, &c.; and that the subscribers to and promoters of the said church or chapel having purchased from the corporation the freehold reversion and inheritance in fee simple of the said church or chapel, had procured the said church or chapel to be consecrated, &c. The statute then enacted, by sect. 4, that certain persons and their successors were appointed commissioners and trustees, &c. By sect. 6, that two persons should be appointed annually to act as churchwardens, with power to collect seat and pew rents; and in case of nonpayment of rent the commissioners and trustees were authorised and empowered to enter upon and sell, or else to sue for and recover the rent by action. By sect. 11, the pews or seats in schedule 1 were for ever to become the sole and exclusive property of the incumbent, and the churchwardens were, out of the yearly rent of the pews and seats in the third schedule, to pay the incumbent of the parish the yearly sum of 250l. By sect. 13 it is enacted that all the pews and seats, save and except those in the first and second schedules (i.e., all the pews and seats in the 3rd schedule), shall for ever be subject to the yearly rents set opposite them in the third schedule; and all such pews or seats shall also be charged with such other rateable leys or assessments to be made as shall be necessary, &c. By sect. 15 it is provided that every purchaser, &c., of a seat or pew, &c., shall pay the rent charged thereon as aforesaid, and every such other rateable ley and assessment as aforesaid; and, in default, the churchwardens shall and may enter upon and hold such seat or pew, or let the same, or sell the same by auction; or the churchwardens may sue for and recover the said rent, ley, or assessment, by action of debt, or upon the case for the use and occupation of such pew or seat, to be brought against the owner, &c. By sect. 17, the commissioners and trustees, and their successors, are empowered to let or sell, and transfer and convey, "for the purpose only of attending Divine service," all and every of the pews or seats, &c., which are not by the Act otherwise appropriated, &c. By sect. 20 such sale can be made only to such as are at the time inhabitants of one of the two parishes which are named. By sect. 21 the seats in schedule 2 are free seats. Schedule 3 comprises all the pews in the church or chapel which are not in schedule 1 and 2. The pews in question are in schedules 3. In the stat. 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii., sect. 4 is as follows:—"Whereas doubts have arisen as to the estate and interest which the subscribers to and proprietors of the said church of St. Mark took in the pews and seats set forth in the third schedule of the recited Act, be it enacted that the fee-simple and inheritance of and in the said pews or seats set forth in the third schedule shall be vested in the said subscribers to the said church of St. Mark's, or the proprietors for the time being of the pews and seats, their heirs and assigns for ever; and they are hereby authorised and empowered to sell, dispose of, and convey, all or any of the said seats or pews, together with the fee-simple and inheritance of the same respectively, to any person or persons willing to become purchasers thereof." Upon these facts and circumstances, it was contended for the claimant that, by virtue of the Acts of Parliament, or one of them, and of the deeds, he was possessed of the freehold, not only of the pews, but of the land on which they stood, and if not, but only of the pews, yet that he was entitled to them as free tenements, as being profits arising out of the land, and therefore entitled to vote as being owner of a tenement within the stat. 3 Hen. 6, c. 7. It was contended for the appellant that neither by the Acts of Parliament, nor by the common law, could the grantors to Highfield grant to him more than an easement, and that consequently they did grant only an easement, and therefore he (Highfield) could only grant an easement to the claimant; and it was further contended that if the original grantors could and did grant more than an easement to Highfield, still he had only, by the terms of his deed, granted an easement to the claimant. The case depends, no doubt, entirely upon the construction of the Acts of Parliament, and the questions which arise are—first, did the Act of Geo. 3 empower the original grantors to grant to Highfield an estate of freehold in the land on which the two pews stood, or a tenement in the pews, in respect of which he might have voted, by virtue of 8 Hen. 6, c. 7; and secondly, if it did not, did the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii., give to the original grantors power to make grants of a freehold estate in the land, or of free tenements within the statute of Hen. 6 in the pews to Highfield. Now, in the first place it must be remembered that, unless the statutes do, or one of them does, expressly give the suggested rights, the ownership of a pew would not carry with it the freehold in the soil, nor more than an easement in the nature of an exclusive right to occupy the pew during Divine service and the times of other religious observances. By the common law there is no property in, nor any right to sell or let a pew or seat in the body of a parochial church or chapel; the freehold is generally in the parson, and the inhabitants have the right to use the church for Divine worship, though the right to use particular seats may have been acquired as appurtenant to particular messuages by faculty or prescription, or, for the time, by the appropriation of the churchwardens or the ordinary. The right in a pew is essentially a right to use it for the services of the church, and at times when it is open for use, subject to the regulations of the church; and there is no right of access to it, or to use it for other purposes, or in any other manner. The word "pew" is said to be derived from the Dutch "puye," and to signify "a seat inclosed in a church" (Johnson's Dictionary); and obvious inconvenience would arise if it were lightly held that each owner of a pew or seat was owner of so much of the site of a church as is comprised within the area of such pew or seat. And again, it is necessary, in order to determine this case in favour of the respondents, to distinguish it from the case of Hinde v. Chorlton, in which a similar claim to the present, made upon a statute at all events prima facie not dissimilar from the statute in this case, was disallowed. It lies strongly, we think, on those who rely upon the present Acts of Parliament, to show that they clearly enact the unusual consequences sought to be derived from them. Now, on examining the first Act, we find, in the first place, that the freehold and fee-simple in the church or chapel are recited to be in the original subscribers and promoters of the church or chapel, who, after having taken the lease for lives of the site, are said to have purchased the reversion thereof in fee. Secondly, we find that there are no words in the statute assuming to pass any interest in land, but only in terms "in pews or seats." Then we find not only that the pews and seats are subject to payment of rent, but that the churchwardens may assess upon them leys or assessments; and the churchwardens may sue for and recover the said rent, ley, or assessment by action for use and occupation, to be brought against the owner. And when the commissioners or trustees are empowered to sell and convey, it is only for the purpose of attending Divine service. It seems to us that upon a candid consideration of these enactments, it is impossible to say that the Legislature has given to the owners of these pews or seats any freehold interest in the land which is covered by such pews or seats, or in any profit arising out of such land. There are none of the recognised terms for passing such interests, and the incidents imposed on the ownership of the pews and seats, are inconsistent with the rights of ownership in the land. The interest which passes by the statute is in terms an interest in "a pew or seat"—that is, an interest in the occupation of a pew or seat, to be enjoyed during Divine Service and other times of religious observances. Such an interest is not an interest in land, but an interest of a peculiar nature, created by the Act of Parliament, and more in the nature of an easement, though there are attached to it incidents of perpetuity of possession, which could only be attached to such a right by the power of legislation. The statute has created a special interest in the pews or seats not known to the common law, and such interest exists by force of the statute, but it is of a very peculiar nature, and does not, in our opinion, create such an estate or interest in the land as will confer a vote. In a similar manner this court recognised the creation of a new species of statutory property and interest in water, in case of The Medway Navigation Company v. Romney, 9 C. B., N. S., 575. Such being our view of the true interpretation of the statute of Geo. 3, we must next consider the effect of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. xxxiii. That statute has, no doubt, very strong words referring to the extent of the interests of owners of some of the pews and seats—namely, those in the third schedule; but it does not seem to us to alter in any way the nature of the subject-matter in respect of which, or in which that interest exists. The subject-matter is still a pew or seat, and not land, or any free tenement, such as was known to the common law, so as to be within the statute of 8 Hen. 4, c. 7. The present case is, as it seems to us, governed by the case of Hinde v. Chorlton, for in that case, although the freehold in the church was in the rector, the contention was that the freehold in the land on which the pews were placed, or a freehold in a free tenement, passed to the owners of pews by virtue of certain Acts of Parliament. In those statutes the pews or seats were to be held by the proprietors, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns; and the trustees were empowered to sell the pews or seats, and the fee-simple and inheritance thereof; and by the sale and conveyance, the pews or seats were to be vested in the purchasers and their heirs and assigns for ever. Yet the court held that such purchasers were not entitled to be registered. We think that the statutes in the present case in like manner have not the effect suggested by the respondents, and are of opinion that, upon the true construction of the statutes, the decision of the revising barrister cannot be supported, and that it must be reversed.

GREENWAY (app.) v. HOCKING (resp.)

Qualification of a county voter—Pew in church.

By a public Act, 27 Geo. 3, c. 17, after reciting that the chapel of East Stonehouse, Devon, was decayed and was not large enough for the inhabitants, it was enacted that certain persons holding offices in the neighbourhood for the time being, and every person who should subscribe 50*l.* or upwards towards erecting a new chapel should be trustees for erecting a new chapel; and by sect. 9 the said trustees were required to set out and appropriate certain pews or seats unto or for the several persons who should subscribe money towards building the said new chapel; and such persons should respectively be deemed proprietors of such numbers of the said pews or seats as should be proportionable to the sums by them respectively subscribed; and such pews or seats should be vested in such proprietors respectively, their heirs, and assigns for ever.

A pew in the said church, exceeding in value 40*s.* a year, had been duly appropriated to a subscriber and conveyed to a person who claimed upon that qualification a vote for the county. The revising barrister held that he was entitled to have his name on the list of voters:

The court, in accordance with the preceding case, Brumfitt v. The Overseers of Liverpool, reversed the barrister's decision.

At a court held for the revision of the list of voters in and for the southern division of the county of Devon John Greenway duly objected to the following claim to be entitled to vote in respect of property within the parish of East Stonehouse: "Cox, George, Manor-house, Emma-place, Stonehouse, freehold pew No. 74, St. George's Chapel, Stonehouse."

The pews were in St. George's Chapel, within the parish of East Stonehouse, which had been rebuilt under a public Act (27 Geo. 3, c. 17), entitled, "An Act for rebuilding the Chapel of East Stonehouse, in the County of Devon."

By that Act, after reciting that the chapel of the chapelry of East Stonehouse, in the county of Devon, was a very ancient building, and was become much decayed, and was not sufficiently large for the inhabitants of the said chapelry to attend divine service therein, and that the vicar of the parish of St. Andrew, Plymouth, in the said county for the time being, had in right of the said vicarage the nomination and appointment of the curate of the said chapelry, and the Reverend James Formeaux was the then curate thereof, and that the building of a new chapel within the said chapelry sufficiently large for the inhabitants would be a great convenience to them, and would lead to the encouragement of religious worship within the said chapelry, it was by sect. 1 enacted that certain persons therein named, and every person who should subscribe the sum of 50*l.* or upwards towards erecting a new chapel in pursuance of the said Act, and also the lord of the manor of East Stonehouse aforesaid for the time being, the Mayor of Plymouth for the time being, the commandant of the marines in the barracks at East Stonehouse aforesaid for the time being, and the curate and two chapelwardens of the said chapelry for the time being should be and were thereby appointed trustees for taking down the then chapel within the said chapelry, and erecting a new chapel instead thereof, and for carrying the said Act into execution.

And it was thereby further enacted by sect. 4 of the said Act that it should be lawful for the said trustees, and they were thereby authorised and empowered to cause the then chapel of the said chapelry to be taken down at such time as they should think fit, and the materials thereof should be and were thereby vested in the said trustees, and they were thereby authorised and empowered to sell or otherwise dispose of the same for the purposes of the said Act; and it should also be lawful for the said trustees, and they were thereby authorised and empowered by contract or otherwise to cause a chapel to be erected or built upon the site of or near to the present chapel of the said chapelry after such model of such dimensions, and in such manner as the said trustees should think proper, and also to cause such pews or seats and galleries, and also such furniture, ornaments, and conveniences to be made, erected, and placed in the said new chapel as the said trustees should think proper or necessary; which said pews or seats should be built as uniform as conveniently might be, and should be numbered in such manner as the said trustees should think proper.

And it was thereby further enacted by sect. 9 that it should be lawful for the said trustees, and they were by the said Act required, to set out and appropriate a pew or seat in the said new chapel unto or for the said curate of the said chapelry; and the same should for ever afterwards belong to the curate of the said chapelry for the time being without his paying anything for the same: provided he or any of his family should reside within the said chapelry; and that all other the pews or seats in the said new chapel should be respectively set out and appropriated by the said trustees unto or for the several persons who should subscribe money towards building the said new chapel; and such persons should respectively be deemed proprietors of such number of the said pews or seats as should be proportionable to the sums by them respectively subscribed, and should respectively have the preference in the choice of the situation of their pews or seats according to the amount of their respective subscriptions; and such pews or seats should be vested in such proprietors respectively, their heirs and assigns for ever.

The pew in question was set out and appropriated by the trustees to a subscriber to the building of the chapel, and had been conveyed by such subscriber to the person who had conveyed to George Cox.

It was admitted that the pew exceeded 40*s.* a year in value.

George Cox occupied the pew by himself and family.

No evidence was given to show in whom the freehold of the soil was vested previous to the passing of the Act.

On behalf of the appellant, who quoted Hinde v. Chorlton, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 104, it was contended that the voter was not entitled to vote, the Act having only conferred an easement upon him.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the Act conferred a freehold interest to subscribers to whom pews were appropriated by the trustees. That the present case was distinguishable from Hinde v. Chorlton, the vicar of the parish of St. Andrew not being made a trustee under the Act; that the money was subscribed for the purpose of building the church and not paid for pews after the church had been built; and that the Act contained no restriction from parting with the pews to other than parishioners.

The revising barrister held that the voter was entitled to have his name on the list of voters.

If upon the facts stated the court should be of opinion that the Act conferred such an interest as to entitle the holder to vote in the election of knights of the shire, then his name was to remain on the list of voters.

If the court shall be of a contrary opinion, it was to be erased.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Charles) for the appellant.—The freehold in the pews or seats must be in the parson unless it is otherwise shown, and there is nothing in this Act to vest in the proprietors more than a right to occupy at certain times: (Hinde v. Chorlton, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 104; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472.) Various inconveniences would arise from extending the right to a vote upon the occupation of a pew; e.g. widows and single ladies, who want the seats in churches most, would have to pay more for the indulgence of their piety, if men could obtain votes by renting pews.

Lopes, Q. C. (with him Bosanquet) for the respondent.—Sect. 9 of the local Act in clear language creates a property in the subscribers, and the fact that no person is limited to the possession of one seat shows that it was not intended to create a mere personal right. By 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, a chooser of knights of the shire must "have free land or tenement to the value of 40*s.* by the year;" and tenement is defined (Co. Litt. 6*a* and 19*b*) to be "a large word to passe not only lands and other inheritances which are holden, but also offices, rents, commons, profits apprender out of lands, and the like, wherein a man hath any franktenement, and whereof he is scised ut de libero tenemento;" also "it includeth not only all corporate inheritances which are or may be holden, but also all inheritances issuing out of any of those inheritances, or concerning, or annexed to, or exercisable within the same, though they lie not in tenure." What is the claimant's right to this pew but a tenement? The case of Hinde v. Chorlton is distinguishable from this, because there the freehold was found to be in the vicar, and the conveyance was limited in its form, and could be made only to parishioners.

Mellish, in reply.—The passages in Co. Litt. relate only to profits a prendre, and there is no authority for holding an easement in gross to give a right to a vote.

KINGSTON SURREY SPRING ASSIZES— CIVIL COURT.

March 28, 29, and 30.

(Before COCKBURN, C. J.)

CHAPMAN v. POLE, P. O. (a).

Contract—Insurance—Nature of—Contract of indemnity—Fraud.

A policy of insurance against fire is, in its nature, a contract of indemnity, and the insured is not entitled to recover more than such an amount as will indemnify him against the actual loss or damage sustained according to the real quantity and value of the goods at the time of the fire. An honest claim is not, under the condition against fraud, invalidated on account of error, or even some degree of exaggeration or over estimate; and in such a case the insured will be entitled to recover according to the real value and the amount of actual loss sustained. But if the claim is wilfully and intentionally excessive that will amount to such fraud as will under the ordinary condition against fraudulent claims, invalidate the claim altogether, and disentitle him to recover at all.

Action against the public officer of the Sun Insurance Company on a fire policy. Declaration upon a policy of insurance by the plaintiff in the Sun Fire Society, the insurance being from loss or damage by fire on his household goods, wearing apparel, printed books, and plate in his then dwelling-house, 380*l.*, china and glass therein, 30*l.*, pictures and prints therein 40*l.*, stock utensils, fixtures, 100*l.*, from 10th Feb. 1866, till 25th March 1867, the company agreeing to pay all damage which the plaintiff should suffer by fire not exceeding upon each head of insurance the sums above mentioned, amounting in the whole to no more than 500*l.* according to the terms of the printed proposals, the conditions of which were, inter alia, that the persons insured sustaining any loss or damage by fire are forthwith to give notice thereof at the office, and as soon as possible afterwards deliver in as particular an account of their loss or damage as the nature of the case will admit of, and make proof of the same by their solemn declaration, and by their books of account, or such other proper vouchers as shall be reasonably required until the production of which the loss money shall not be payable; and if there appear any fraud or false swearing, or that the fire shall have happened by the procurement or wilful act, means, or contrivance of the insured, he shall be excluded from all benefit from the policy. Averment that the plaintiff at the time of making the policy, and thence until the time of the damage and loss, was interested in the premises insured to the amount insured thereon respectively, and while the policy was in force the goods and premises insured were burnt and destroyed by fire, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage and loss on the furniture, goods, and premises respectively, and all conditions were fulfilled. Breach, nonpayment of the loss and damage.

Pleas, 1. That the plaintiff was not interested as alleged. 2. That the goods and premises insured were not, nor was any part thereof, burned and destroyed as alleged. 3. That the plaintiff did not, as soon as possible, after sustaining the said loss or damage, deliver in as particular an account of his loss or damage as the nature of the case would admit of, as required by the said conditions. 4. That the plaintiff did not, although required so to do by the company, make proof of his loss and damage by solemn declaration, as required by the conditions. 5. That the plaintiff did not make proof of his said loss and damage by his books of account, or by such other proper vouchers as the company reasonably required. 6. That there appeared to be, and was fraud in the claim made by the plaintiff upon the company, for and in respect of the said alleged loss and damage, &c., on account of the said loss or damage delivered to the company's office.

M. Chambers and J. Thompson for the plaintiff.

Ballantine, Serjt. and F. M. White for the company.

The policy was effected in Feb. 1866. The fire occurred on the following Sept., and the claim was made forthwith for 418*l.* as for a total loss, but no particulars were delivered until required under the conditions. The particulars of the claim when delivered appearing—on comparison with the salvage and debris—grossly exaggerated, payment was refused. In Nov. this action was brought, and in Feb. 1867 interrogatories were delivered to the plaintiff, which, not being answered, the action was stayed until, in Jan. 1870, they were answered, and the action proceeded.

After the plaintiff made a claim of damage to the amount of 418*l.*, further particulars being required, in October particulars of claim were delivered, claiming large sums for specific articles to each room. The plaintiff also made a statutory declaration in the usual form "that the said estimate or account contains, to the best of my knowledge and belief, a true and faithful account of the loss and damage sustained by me in my said goods and chattels, all of which were my own property, and were in and upon the said house when the fire happened, and were burned, lost, or damaged by the fire; and that my real and just loss on the said goods and chattels occasioned by the fire amounts to 418*l.*; and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true." It had appeared, however, on the report of the inspector as to salvage and debris, that it was impossible there could have been the quantity and value of the goods represented, and in one of the rooms remaining unconsumed, the contents, valued at 30*l.*, were not worth 3*l.*; and in the bedrooms the remains of cheap iron bedsteads, worth a few shillings, were found in the place of mahogany, stated as worth 15*l.*; while the debris of crockery, &c., found would only represent a few shillings' worth, instead of 33*l.*, the value stated; and other heads of claim were found in the same proportion to exceed the real value.

CHAPMAN v. POLE, P. O.

The company, however, having disputed the claim, and having in this action interrogated the plaintiff as to the mode in which he had acquired the goods insured, he stated in his answer that he had purchased the greater part of them at sales, and had them many years before the policy, though some of them were given to him, and some by one Bennett, an attorney, now dead. Being cross-examined as a witness, he stated that he had purchased them nearly all from Bennett, and had given him between 300*l.* and 400*l.* for them. He also stated that in July he had assigned the goods to one Walker for advances to the amount of 400*l.* The plaintiff was called, with Walker, in support of his claim, but could give no particulars or vouchers. Strong evidence, however, was given on the part of the company to show that the furniture was of the poorest description, not worth above 50*l.*; that a great part had been removed in June, so that at the time of the fire the things in the house were not worth more than 30*l.* The brokers, from whom the plaintiff had purchased the furniture were called, and the amount and nature of the purchase proved; and, in addition to this, the servants were called and gave similar evidence. Altogether, the case for the defence was of the strongest kind.

Chambers, however, in reply on the part of the plaintiff, insisted that it was a case of mere exaggeration or over estimate in the amount of the claims, that there was no evidence to show such fraud as would invalidate the claim in toto; that therefore it was the duty of the company to make an offer of what they considered to be the real amount, and pay it into court upon the claim; and that it was unfair to hold the claimant at arm's length, treat it as a case of fraud, and dispute the claim in toto.

COCKBURN, C. J., to the jury.—In consequence of the observations which have been made upon the conduct of the Insurance Company, I feel it to be my duty to say that I consider that in insisting on a full and searching examination into the case in a court of justice, the defendants, the Sun Fire Insurance Society, have only discharged their duty to their shareholders and the public. Beyond all doubt this is a case deserving of such an examination and inquiry; for, whatever may be its result, from beginning to end the case presents itself under circumstances of grave suspicion, and calling for searching inquiry. The issue for you to determine in substance upon this case is whether the plaintiff has made an honest or dishonest claim—the issue is fraud or no fraud. If the defendants have failed to satisfy you that the claim was fraudulent, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and in that case the only question will be, what was the real value of the goods destroyed? for that is all he is entitled, in any event, to recover. But if you think the defence is made out, and that, in point of fact, with reference either to the quantity or value of the goods, the plaintiff knowingly preferred a claim he knew to be false and unjust, then he is entitled to recover nothing. That is one of the conditions in the policy, and the company are entitled to stand upon the defence. And considering how exposed they are to deception, and how rarely they are able to establish it by proof, in my opinion when they have a case in which they are honestly convinced that fraud has been perpetrated, and that they have sufficient evidence of it to submit to a jury to establish it, then they are not only fairly entitled, but they are bound to do so. For you will do well to bear in mind that the rate of insurance is calculated upon the average of losses as compared with profits; and the more the company is subjected to deception and fraud the higher the rate of premium which they are obliged to charge. Therefore, the public have an interest in such cases, and the company is bound to defend them when they have fair ground for so doing, as they certainly have in this instance. We must start in such a case with certain principles. It is not certainly a question of mere accuracy or inaccuracy. A man may make a mistake in his claim, and it may be quite honestly. If, for instance, a man either fails to recollect the precise quantity of goods he has on his premises at the time of the fire, or mistakes the value of those of which he was in possession, and thus he presses a claim according to what he believes honestly to be true, but which may, in the end, turn out to be mistaken, the only consequence which ensues is, that inasmuch as the contract of insurance is simply a contract of indemnity, he can only recover to the extent of the real value of the goods he has actually lost. You must not run away with the notion that a policy of insurance entitles a man to recover according to the amount represented as insured by the premiums paid. It is essentially a contract of indemnity. If a man chooses to insure goods worth 100*l.* at a rate of premium which represents a value of 500*l.*, he can only recover the real and actual value of the goods. The law will not allow of gambling in the form of insurance. Insurance companies are subject to fraud enough as it is, and if persons were allowed to insure goods to a greater amount than the real value, it is obvious that a door would be open to fraud and wickedness of the most abominable description. Therefore, in all the cases the only question—supposing the claim to be honest—is, what was the real and actual value of the goods destroyed. But beyond that—although the insured has not caused the fire—yet, if he has made a fraudulent claim, then, on such a condition as is contained in this policy, he must fall by the fraud he has thus attempted to perpetrate, and is not entitled to recover at all. Such being the legal principles on which the question to be determined arises, it is for you to determine upon the evidence. If you believe the evidence for the defence it is clearly established, and it is a gross and scandalous case of fraud. According to that evidence the claim was grossly excessive, not only in point of value, but as to the quantity and character of the furniture insured; and it is not easy to conceive of such gross exaggeration being honest. A man may be somewhat mistaken as to the exact value or the precise number of the articles of furniture he possesses, but he can scarcely be so grossly ignorant of the furniture of the rooms in which he lives and sleeps as honestly to represent articles worth a few shillings or pounds as worth large sums of money. If, then, you believe the evidence for the defence, it is your duty to find for the defendant, as in that view a more scandalous fraud never was attempted.

Will—Codicil—Revival—Mistake in date.

In preparing a codicil to the last will and testament of a testator, the solicitor by mistake referred by date to a former will which was revoked by the will subsequently executed. The court on affidavits explaining how the mistake had arisen, negatived the presumption that the testator intended to revive the former will, and granted probate with the codicil of the latest will.

George Anderson, deceased, duly executed a will on Feb. 13, 1864. On June 24, 1865, he executed another will, revoking all former wills, and on June 21, 1869, he executed a codicil which commenced thus: "This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me, George Anderson, of Keelby, in the county of Lincoln, grazier. Whereas by my will dated 13 Feb. 1864, I gave and devised my real estate in Keelby, in the county of Lincoln, devised to me by my father, unto my son George Anderson, his heirs, executors, and assigns, for ever. And, whereas, since the date of my said will, my said son, George Anderson, has departed this life. Now I do declare this to be a codicil to my said will, and do hereby revoke the said devise so far, and so far only, as regards the house and premises in which I now reside." The codicil then went on to devise the said house and premises to his daughter charged with the payment of 550*l.*, and it concluded thus: "in all other respects do ratify and confirm my said will."

Both wills were prepared by the testator's solicitors, Messrs. Marris and Smith, and were by them deposited in an iron chest. In June 1869, the testator sent for Mr. Marris to make a codicil to his will, and gave him the following instructions in writing: "I wish for the house in which I live, and the property connected therewith, left by my will to my late son, George Anderson, to be given to my daughter, Fanny Anderson, for which she shall give me an equivalent out of my other property." Mr. Marris on his return home prepared the codicil, and in order to insert the date of his will, he told one of his clerks to get the will of George Anderson out of the will chest. The clerk by mistake brought the will of Feb. 13, 1864, and its date was inserted in the codicil under the supposition that it was the last will of the testator. Both the wills contained a devise of the real estate at Keelby, devised to the testator by his father, to his son George Anderson.

Dr. Tristram now moved for probate of the will of June 24, 1865, and of the codicil of June 21, 1869, as together constituting the last will and testament of George Anderson. He cited:

In the goods of Steel, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 575;

In the goods of Wilson, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 575.

LORD PENZANCE:—In this case the court has got to say whether under the words of the statute this codicil shows an intention to revive the first will, and whether the court can go into evidence to show that a blunder was made. I can find no such intention. It alludes to the death of the son, which is an event which occurred after the second will. In this view I think the court ought to grant probate of the second will with the codicil.

KELLY v. KELLY.

Judicial separation—Cruelty—Undue exercise of marital authority.

Held, by the full court (confirming the judgment of the Judge Ordinary), that mere moral coercion, if systematically exercised for a sufficient time and to a sufficient degree to injure the health of the wife, and to bring her to the brink of a serious malady, amounts to legal cruelty, and entitles the wife to a judicial separation.

This was a suit for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty instituted by Mrs. Frances Kelly against her husband, the Rev. James Kelly, incumbent of St. George's, Liverpool.

The case was tried before the court on the 19th, 20th, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th Nov., and Dec. 7, 1869, and the Judge Ordinary, after taking time to consider his judgment, pronounced a decree of judicial separation: (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 564.)

The respondent appealed to the full court, and the case was argued on Feb. 1 and 2.

Dr. Deane and Inderwick for the petitioner.

Mr. Kelly conducted his own case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9. CHANNELL, B.—This is an appeal to the full court from a decision of the Judge Ordinary. Lord Penzance is desirous that my brother Hannen and myself should first state our views. I proceed, therefore, to deliver our joint opinion. The appeal is by the Rev. James Kelly against a decree whereby the Judge Ordinary, on the petition of the appellant's wife, Frances Kelly, decreed in favour of the petitioner for a judicial separation from her husband on the ground of cruelty. Mr. and Mrs. Kelly were married in Ireland in the year 1841. There was issue of the marriage a child, deceased, and a son, now living, who was born in 1845. With the exception of a visit made by Mrs. Kelly to Wales and Ireland, Mrs. Kelly lived under the same roof with Mr. Kelly from the time of the marriage until Jan. 1869. Since that time Mr. and Mrs. Kelly have ceased to cohabit, Mrs. Kelly having left her husband's home, and claimed from this court the decree for judicial separation now appealed against. There is some evidence that on one or two occasions Mr. Kelly laid hands on Mrs. Kelly against her consent. But the evidence is so slight on this head that we think it safer to treat the case (as it was considered by the Judge Ordinary) as one on which there is an absence of any proof of such physical violence towards the wife on the part of the husband as would justify a decree. The question then arises whether the decree is erroneous in holding that, although there was not such actual physical violence on the part of the husband towards the wife, there is shown to be that cruelty which will entitle her to ask this court for a decree for a judicial separation. The appellant seeks the reversal of the decree on two grounds—first, that the Judge Ordinary has erred in point of law in the definition which he has given of cruelty; and, secondly, that the evidence does not establish that the appellant has been guilty of legal cruelty. The passages in the judgment of the Judge Ordinary in which he has laid down the principles upon which his decision is based are the following: "The peculiar and distinguishing feature of this case is the adoption by the respondent of a deliberate system of conduct towards his wife with the view of bending her to his authority. If force, whether physical or moral, is systematically exerted for this purpose in such a manner, to such a degree, and during such a length of time, as to break down her health and render serious malady imminent, the interference of the law cannot be justly withheld by any court which affects to have charge of the wife's personal safety." "Moreover," says his Lordship, "the decisions have imparted this further proposition as a condition of the court's interference, that the troubles of the wife are not owing to her own misconduct." We are of opinion that the above cited passages contain an accurate and, so far as was necessary for the determination of the case, a complete statement of the law on the subject. It would be difficult to frame a definition of legal cruelty which should be applicable to all the cases which may arise. The object of the Matrimonial Court in exercising its jurisdiction in decreeing for judicial separation for cruelty is to free the injured consort from a cohabitation which has been rendered, or which there is imminent reason to believe will be rendered, unsafe by the ill-usage of the party complained of. It is obvious that the modes by which one of two married persons may make the life or the health of the other insecure are infinitely various, but as often as perverse ingenuity may invent a new manner of producing the result the court must supply the remedy by separating the parties. The most frequent form of ill-usage which amounts to cruelty is that of personal violence; but the courts have never limited their jurisdiction to such cases alone, as will be clearly seen by reference to some of the authorities. His Lordship then cited several decisions on the question of cruelty, and afterwards referred in detail to the evidence in the case, which he said had satisfied the court that the acts imputed to Mr. Kelly as amounting to legal cruelty were established. The court adopted the view of the evidence taken by the Judge Ordinary, and dismissed the appeal.

KELLY v. KELLY.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—The appellant has loudly complained that the subordinate facts of this case, and especially the numerous charges made by him against his wife, did not find a place in the judgment now under appeal. It was not needful that they should have done so, and for several reasons. First, these charges of impropriety, or such of them as were established, were, in my judgment, either justified, or, at least, rendered pardonable, by the appellant's own conduct. Secondly, they were wholly insufficient if they had been all true, and without excuse or palliation, to justify the treatment of which the petitioner complained. And, lastly, because they could not (if the quarrel in reference to Mr. Kelly's son and to Colonel Thornbury be excepted) have made the cause of the "affectionate discipline," as Mr. Kelly called it, which he pursued towards his wife, inasmuch as the commencement of that discipline preceded their occurrence. I do not venture to hope that the views of others, however dispassionate, may suggest to the appellant that he can possibly be wrong in his estimate of all that his wife did. But after the appeal he has made to the court for the expression of its opinion on this topic, I think it is not right to be wholly silent. [His Lordship then referred to the various grounds of complaint alleged by Mr. Kelly against his wife, and remarked that Mr. Kelly appeared, from first to last, to have kept out of sight the inevitable results of the course he was pursuing towards her. His wife had, in his opinion, done wrong, and it was his duty to make her repent; but the question what should happen if repentance did not come seemed never to have disturbed his serenity.] There never was a case (his Lordship continued), of matrimonial dispute which ultimately depended so little upon the truth or falsehood of the evidence of the parties themselves. It is due to the respondent, and equally to the appellant, to say that in my opinion they neither of them willingly deviated from the truth in the account of the facts upon which the decision of the court must rest; nor, indeed, upon those facts is there any essential contradiction. Thus far upon the facts. On the legal principles involved in this case I have nothing to add to or withdraw from the expressions used in the judgment under appeal. I forbear to cite cases. In my judgment the principles of every case in which the court has decreed separation on account of cruelty apply to this case. But as conclusions wide of the truth, and much broader than the judgment warrants, have been sought in argument to be drawn from the words there used, I would add something by way of fuller and further expression. In determining whether a case is made out for the interposition of the court, reliance is not to be placed on any one feature of the case to the exclusion of the rest. It is not to be said from anything which the court has here decided that this or that is denied to the husband or permitted to the wife. The health and safety of the wife is, no doubt, the leading consideration. Still, it is necessary that due regard should be had, not only to the degree in which that safety or health appears to have been compromised or placed in jeopardy, but to the clearness with which this fact is established in evidence. So, again, it is necessary that the acts of the husband, by which the wife's health or safety is said to have been thus threatened, should not only be proved, and the alleged consequences plainly deduced from them, but their motives examined and their causes considered. And, finally, the conduct of the wife herself by way of provocation, must not only be taken into the account, but her demeanour under even unmerited oppression or unprovoked cruelty, must be studied by the court. It is upon the sum of these considerations that the court can alone decide whether a case is made for a decree. The appellant affirms that a new law has been made to meet his case, and that it will form a dangerous precedent. I hope not. To the best of my judgment it is the case which is new, and not the law. I have searched the recorded decisions of the Matrimonial Courts in vain for a case the features of which in any considerable degree resemble the present. It has no parallel in the past, and as to becoming a precedent it is hardly likely to find one in the future. So much injustice, so much perversion of mind, so much abiding rancour for so trifling a cause, so much deliberate oppression under provocation so slight, moral chastisement so severe administered with so much system, maintained with such tenacity up to the brink of so perilous a danger to health, with so utter a disregard of consequences, and all to extort confession of acts never committed, and force repentance without consciousness of wrong will probably never be exhibited again. That such a case should recur it would be necessary that to an inflexible will should be added the power of self-deception in an inordinate degree, so that the promptings of angry resentment should be mistaken for the voice of duty, and that while religion should be put forward to sanction and even enjoin a harsh and cruel retaliation, the leading precepts of religion, humility, and forgiveness should be altogether forgotten or but little heeded.

Goods sent by English manufacturers to Irish holders.

Although goods may be "sent on sale" by English manufacturers to Irish traders, where the words "or return" do not appear, and that no commission ever appeared by the account between the parties to have been paid, upon the bankruptcy of the trader the goods will not be given back to the manufacturer.

Woodlock, in this case, applied on the part of an English agricultural implement manufacturer that certain goods which remained unsold should be returned. In the invoice sent with the goods the words "sent on sale" appeared, and the manufacturer made an affidavit that the goods were sent on sale or return; the trader made an affidavit denying that fact, but he, counsel, relied on the facts of the case. The custom appeared to be that whatever remained on hand at the end of the season were to be held over for the manufacturer or owner until the following season; but it was quite clear that having been merely "sent on sale," the property still remained in the original owner, and it would be great injustice to compel him to take a small composition on his debt, instead of getting back his property. It was a matter in which English manufacturers in that line were much interested. If the words "or return" were added, there could be no doubt about it; but such was not necessary. The simple question was, did the property still belong to the original owner? The question of reputed ownership did not arise in this case.

Houston for the creditor.—The application is untenable. There was an affidavit by the trader that there was an absolute sale, and in confirmation of that view of the case there did not appear, after a long series of dealings, to ever have been any charge for commission.

HARRISON, J. said:—It would appear at first sight that the property still belonged to the manufacturer, but upon looking over the whole account it did not appear that any commission was ever charged, or any of the goods sent on sale returned. The case might be said to be important to English manufacturers, but they could protect themselves by having the contract, that if the goods were not sold they should be returned. He would refuse the application, but he would not give costs.

WALTHER AND ANOTHER v. MAVROJANI AND OTHERS.

General average—Perils of the sea—Stranding of ship—Landing of cargo—Expenses of floating ship—Liability of cargo to—Benefit of shipowner—Common peril and common benefit—English and American authorities contrasted.

The doctrine of general average depends upon the general principle that there must be a common danger, actual or impending, affecting all parties, and an extraordinary expenditure or a voluntary sacrifice on the part of some or one of the subjects to avert the general peril, and then all must contribute their apportioned share.

A vessel, lying moored in port at Calcutta, with a cargo on board on freight for England, was, on the 5th Oct., blown by a cyclone from her moorings, and driven, in a damaged condition, upon a mud bank in the river, where she grounded. Under the advice of surveyors, the ballast and cargo were discharged in order to lighten the ship, and by the 19th Oct. the whole of the cargo had been taken in flats from the ship, and was safely warehoused at Calcutta, under the superintendence and control of the agents of the shipowners. The surveyors then recommended extraordinary means to be employed to prevent the ship becoming a constructive total loss, and, under that advice, operations under a contract were commenced for that purpose by the said agents, and continued until the 24th Nov., when the contractors, failing to float the ship, abandoned their contract. Another contract was then, under the like advice, entered into by the agents with other contractors to float the ship for 2300l., the operations under which proved successful, the ship being, on the 31st Dec., floated off the bank, and taken into dock at Calcutta to be repaired; and, the repairs being completed by the 15th March, the cargo, which had remained warehoused at Calcutta in the possession of the agents of the shipowners from the 19th Oct., was reshipped on board, and was carried to England and safely delivered to its owners.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer below, and adopting the principle laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Job v. Langton, 6 E. & B. 779; 26 L. J. 97, Q. B.; and Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523; 26 L. J. 187, Q. B.) that, the cargo being in safety when the contract for floating the ship was made, there was no common peril and no common benefit, and the principle of general average did not apply; and therefore the owners of the cargo were not bound to contribute towards the expenses incurred by the shipowners in floating the ship; the latter alone being benefited by such expenditure by being thereby enabled to continue and complete the voyage; it being a matter of indifference to the owners of the cargo whether the ship floated or sank, or whether the cargo were forwarded by the same ship or another.

But, semble (per M. Smith and Hannen, JJ.), under exceptional circumstances as e.g., if the cargo or goods should be unshipped on a desolate island, or could not be otherwise carried on to their destination, or could only be so carried on at an increased cost, or after long delay and consequent deterioration in value, the expenses of floating a stranded vessel may be the subject of general average as against the cargo owner:

Hallett and others v. Wigram and others, 9 C. B. 580; 19 L. J. 281, C. P.; and Kemp v. Halliday, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256; 34 L. J. 238, Q. B.; 6 B. & S. 764, discussed and approved of.

The difference between the English and American doctrine and authorities on the subject of general average pointed out, and the English view preferred.

Error from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer on a special case.

This was an action to recover 670l. 5s. 8d., claimed by the plaintiffs from the defendants, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, and by consent of parties and a judge's order the following special case was stated, without pleadings, for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The plaintiffs are the owners of the ship Southern Belle, and the defendants are merchants carrying on business in London, under the firm of Ralli and Mavrojani, and having agents in Calcutta.

Ex. Ch.]

WATHEW AND ANOTHER v. MAVROJANI AND OTHERS.

[Ex. Ch.]

Prior to the 5th Oct. 1864 the defendants had by their aforesaid agents shipped on board the Southern Belle, then lying safely moored in the port of Calcutta, a cargo of linseed for conveyance to England, on freight payable on delivery of the cargo in England. On the said 5th Oct. the port of Calcutta was visited by a cyclone of extraordinary violence, which drove the Southern Belle from her moorings ashore in a damaged and disabled condition upon a mudbank in the river. From the 7th to the 19th Oct. the crew, with a number of coolies, were employed in partly dismantling the ship, and in discharging her cargo and ballast, in accordance with the recommendation of surveyors, who advised that all means should be adopted to lighten the ship forthwith, and to dismantle her, as it would, in their opinion, be otherwise impossible to remove her from the position in which she lay.

Before the 19th Oct. the whole of the cargo had been unladen, and taken in flats to Calcutta, and there safely warehoused, under the superintendence and control of the agents of the shipowners. On the 19th Oct. a surveyor examined the ship, at the request of the agents of the shipowners, and made the following report:

Calcutta, 19th Oct. 1864.

I hereby certify to having this day, and at the request of Messrs. W. C. Stuart and Co. examined the ship Southern Belle, lying stranded on the bank at Ramskistopere, and declare as follows:—That I sounded round the vessel at high water, and found only three feet aft, increasing along the port bilge, and the same quantity at the starboard side, increasing to seven feet at the stern. The nature of the bank was, originally, soft, and nearly a level before her stranding, but it has been much altered since by obstructions in the shape of a wreck, jettisoned coals, and other property likely to assist the silt forming a higher embankment, and which appears to be rapidly increasing. From the circumstances above noted, it is my conviction that the vessel will not float on the coming spring, and without extraordinary means are employed to get her off the strand, the ship will become a constructive total loss. I therefore recommend that public tenders be invited without delay for the purpose of floating the ship, the Southern Belle.

N. HICKFORD, Member of Lloyd's, Surveyor of Shipping and for Local Insurance Offices.
ROBERT CARR, Master of ship Gem.

In accordance with that recommendation public tenders were invited for the purpose of floating the ship, and shortly afterwards Messrs. Browning and West contracted with the agents of the shipowners to launch and float the ship for the sum of 15,000 rupees; but on the 24th Nov., their efforts proving to be of no avail, they declared their inability to perform their contract, and abandoned the same accordingly. Thereupon, at the request of the agents of the shipowners, surveyors again surveyed the ship, and recommended that further means should be taken to float her, and accordingly the said agents entered into a contract with Messrs. Burns and Co. to float the ship for 2300*l.*, in pursuance of which contract Burns and Co. proceeded to make an embankment, and to construct a dock round the vessel, which dock was, by means of a steam pump, filled with water, and in this manner they succeeded, on the 31st Dec., in floating the ship, and in mooring her safely in the river.

The ship was then taken into dock at Calcutta and repaired, and the repairs being completed on the 15th March, the defendants' cargo, which had remained warehoused at Calcutta in the possession of the agents of the shipowners since the 19th Oct. as aforesaid, was, on the 22nd March completely reshipped on board the vessel, and was then conveyed to England, and there safely delivered to the defendants. According to the estimate of the surveyors the ship in her damaged condition was worth 85,000 rupees, and would, upon being repaired, be worth from 85,000 to 90,000 rupees at Calcutta.

The shipowners, the plaintiffs, contended that the amount of 2800*l.*, paid by them to Messrs. Burns and Co. for floating the ship as before mentioned, constituted general average expenditure, towards which the defendants as owners of the cargo were bound to contribute their proportionate share, and they brought this action to recover such share from the defendants. The court was to be at liberty to draw all inferences of fact which a jury would be justified in drawing.

In Trinity term 1867 the Court of Exchequer, after argument had been heard, gave judgment in favour of the defendants, and thereupon the plaintiffs brought error.

Grounds of error on the part of the plaintiffs: First, that the expenses in question are the subject of general average, and that the cargo was liable for contribution thereto. Secondly, that the expenses in question were part of a continuous operation for the common benefit of ship and cargo. That the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was erroneous in law.

Points argued on the part of the defendants:—1. The expenditure of the 2300*l.* was incurred only for the safety of the ship and freight, and the completing the adventure, and not for the purpose of saving any part of the cargo. 2. That saving the ship and cargo was not one continuous operation within the meaning of the rule laid down in Moran v. Jones, 7 El. & Bl. 523; 26 L. J. 187, Q. B.

Aspinall, Q.C. who (with Little) appeared to argue on the part of the plaintiffs, contended that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer below was erroneous, and that the expenses incurred in floating the vessel were properly general average expenses. What was done from the first moment of the vessel getting fixed on the bank to the time when she was floated off and moored in safety in the river, including the unloading of the cargo, and taking it in flats to Calcutta where it was warehoused, under the superintendence and control of the agents of the shipowners, formed one continuous transaction or operation. It was one adventure in which the whole cargo was at risk. It was necessary to lighten the ship in order to get her off the bank on which, in a disabled condition, she had grounded, and where she lay in imminent peril to both the ship and cargo. In order to lighten her, and so to save both ship and cargo, the latter was unshipped and taken on shore. Being thus lightened, after one unsuccessful effort to float her, the ship was at length gotten off the bank and safely moored in the river. The necessary repairs being complete, the cargo, which had never been out of the control of the shipowners, was reshipped on board, and the voyage was then completed, and the cargo duly delivered. The whole adventure was at risk, and what was done to get the ship off was done, and the expenses bonâ fide incurred, for the common benefit of ship and cargo, which were both in peril. The decision of this court in the present case will be either for or against the plaintiffs, according to the view which the court may take of the doctrine laid down in the two cases in the Court of Queen's Bench of Job and another v. Langton, 6 E. & B. 779; 26 L. J. 97, Q. B.; and Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523; 26 L. J. 187, Q. B. It is contended, on the part of the present plaintiffs, that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Job v. Langton is erroneous and inconsistent with the decision of the same court in the subsequent case of Moran v. Jones, in which it is submitted that the more accurate and correct rule is laid down. That latter case very closely resembled the present case in its facts. The true test in the matter was, whether or not the voyage had been abandoned. Now there had been no abandonment here. The liability to general average continues, it is submitted, until the property has been completely separated from the rest of the cargo, and from the whole adventure, so as to leave no continuity of interest remaining. That complete separation had not taken place here, and the continuity of interest remained. The enterprise was not abandoned, and the property, though removed from the ship for the purpose of lightening the latter, and to enable her to float, was still under the control of the captain and shipowners, and was liable to be, and was, in fact, again taken on board for the purpose of the voyage being prosecuted. A common interest, therefore, remained, and what was done in floating and saving the ship was done for the protection and benefit of the cargo as well as of the ship, and so was done at the common expense. [BOVILL, C. J.—Would not that general proposition apply equally to repairs for enabling the ship to complete her voyage?] It may not be easy to draw the line between them, but practically the rule may be confined to extraordinary expenses, such as the cost of raising and floating a submerged or stranded ship: (See Moran v. Jones.) [Cohen, for the defendants, contra, referred to Kemp v. Halliday, in the Queen's Bench, 6 B. & S. 764; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256; 34 L. J. 233, Q. B., and the observations of Blackburn, J., in his judgment there, upon the case of Moran v. Jones.] The American courts and authorities, which on such a question are worthy of respectful consideration, strongly favoured the view now submitted on the part of the plaintiffs: See

WALTHER AND ANOTHER v. MAVROJANI AND OTHERS.

In giving his judgment in the Court of Appeal in the case of Nelson v. Belmont, 7 Smith N. Y. Rep. 36, Selden, J. discusses, at great length, the English cases of Job v. Langton, and Moran v. Jones, and in the course of his judgment he says: "The case of Moran v. Jones was, I think, rightly decided; but I cannot resist the conclusion that the idea of a continuous operation, commenced before and completed after the removal of the goods, was resorted to in order to reconcile the decision with that of the previous case of Job v. Langton." [M. SMITH, J.—In Moran v. Jones, the goods were the goods of the shipowners themselves. BRETT, J.—Is not the difference or break between the English and American doctrine this—that they hold that all the expenses, which are necessary to the completion of the voyage, are the subject of general average, whilst we hold only such to be the subject of general average as are necessary to save the cargo, and has not that distinction been strictly observed by our courts since the cases before Lord Ellenborough and the Court of Queen's Bench, of Plummer v. Wildman, 3 M. & S. 482, and Power and another v. Whitmore, 4 M. & S. 141? M. SMITH, J.—The question in every case is how we are to apply the principle to the particular facts. Even in America it is held that there must be a common danger and a common benefit.] He cited also Cohen for the defendants, contra, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in this case must be affirmed. There is no doubt at all that the costs of all repairs, which are rendered necessary to a ship by the ordinary perils of navigation, and which are needful in order to enable her to prosecute and complete the voyage and adventure, must be borne by the shipowner, who has undertaken, under the usual conditions and exceptions, to carry and deliver the cargo to its port of destination. Such repairs are costs incurred for the benefit of the ship only, and are not, therefore, the subject of general average. But, where extraordinary costs, losses, or risks, are incurred, in order to save the cargo as well as the ship, a different rule is then applicable; such costs, losses, or risks, being incurred for the common benefit of all parties interested, all such parties, being exposed to a common danger, must contribute their proportionate share towards the payment of them. That is the general principle; and that is not disputed by the defendants in the present case. From time to time, however, it has been attempted to introduce exceptions to the rule. Thus in Hallett v. Wigram, 9 C. B. 580; 19 L. J. 281, C. P., an attempt was made to cast a portion of the costs of repairs of the ship upon the owner of the cargo, and upon the very same grounds as those upon which Mr. Aspinall has, to-day, contended that the owners of the cargo in the present case are liable; and, in order to test the principle of law involved in the matter, the point was expressly raised, by the defendants in that case, upon the pleadings. That was an action, by the owners of the cargo, to recover from the shipowners the value of a part of the cargo, which had been sold for the purpose of raising money wherewith to pay for repairs, which were rendered necessary by tempestuous and stormy weather. The pleas there alleged that "on the occasion of the ship so being, by the force and violence of the winds and waves, and by means of stormy and tempestuous weather, damaged and injured, as in the first count mentioned, the ship became and was, in consequence of the said injury and damage—the same then being dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation—broken, leaky, dangerous, and incapable of further prosecuting her voyage, and that it became and was necessary, for the preservation of the ship and her cargo, and to enable her to complete her voyage, and to prevent the ship and her cargo from being wholly lost and destroyed, and for the common benefit and advantage of the plaintiffs, and all persons interested in the cargo, or in the completion of the voyage, that the ship should put and sail back, as in the first count mentioned, to have the cargo unloaded and taken from on board, and the damage and injury repaired." There were further allegations in the plea, "that the ship did sail and put back, for the purposes before mentioned to the most proper and convenient port, &c.; that the cargo was then unloaded, and the ship repaired for such common benefit and advantage as aforesaid, and not for the exclusive benefit or advantage of the defendants, or for the benefit or advantage of the defendants or owners of the ship, more, or in a greater degree, than of the owners of the cargo; that such repairs were necessary and requisite for the completion of the voyage, and such costs and expenses were then incurred for the said repairs, and in and about the unloading of the cargo as aforesaid; and that such costs greatly exceeded the value of the ship when repaired, and that the said repairs were such as ought not to have been done except for the purposes of conveying the cargo to the port of delivery, and the same would not have been done if the cargo could otherwise have been conveyed to such port." In that case, therefore, by the most precise and distinct allegations that the repairs, which were rendered necessary by the damage done to the ship by the violence of the winds and waves, were necessary or were done for the common benefit and advantage of both the ship and the cargo, it was sought to establish the principle, which Mr. Aspinall has

WALTHER AND ANOTHER v. MAVROJANI AND OTHERS.

argued for before us to-day, that repairs which are necessary to enable the ship to carry forward the cargo, and which, but for that purpose, would not have been required, and so are done for the common advantage of both cargo and ship, are general average repairs, towards which the cargo owner must contribute. But the Court of Common Pleas decided against any such principle. In delivering his judgment in that case, Wilde, C. J., at p. 601 of 9 C. B., and pp. 288, 289, of 19 L. J., C. P., says, "It is in respect only of the incapacity of the particular ship to carry the goods forward to their destination that the pleas show that the cargo was in danger of being wholly lost. It is difficult to see how the repair of the ship could be for the benefit or advantage of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' goods were of a description not to be deteriorated to any great extent. The pleas allege that the cargo could not be conveyed to its port of destination by any other ship; but it appears, both from the declaration and the pleas, that the cargo consisted of other goods besides those of the plaintiffs, and there is no allegation that the plaintiffs' goods might not have been forwarded by another ship, or that they were in any immediate peril. This is, therefore, the case of ordinary sea damage, which the shipowner must repair at his own expense. The claim for general average arises where a part of a shipper's goods is sold or destroyed for the purpose of relieving the rest from some impending peril." Again, his Lordship says, "If, during a voyage, by stress of weather or otherwise a vessel is in immediate danger of being lost, and part of the cargo is thrown overboard, or a mast is cut away, as a means of preventing the total loss of vessel and cargo, that loss, being incurred for the common benefit of all concerned, shall not be sustained by the owners of the ship alone, but by a general contribution from all. There is no analogy between such cases and the present, where the injury arose from the ordinary perils of the sea, and the whole cargo was landed in safety." And in another part of his judgment, the Chief Justice, after referring to the cases which had been cited, quotes the following observations of Lord Tenterden, from his work on shipping (Abbott on Shipping, p. 497, 5th edit.). "It seems to result from these decisions that, if a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, the necessary expenses of port charges, wages, and provisions during the stay, are to be considered as general average. But if the damage were incurred by the mere violence of the wind and weather, without sacrifice on the part of the owners for the benefit of all concerned, it falls, with the expenses consequent upon it, within the contract of the shipowner to keep his vessel tight, staunch, and strong during the voyage for which she is hired." And in a subsequent part of the same judgment the Chief Justice says, "It seems to me that the fair import of what Lord Tenterden lays down is to exclude from general average damage like this, and I therefore think that the sale of part of the cargo, under the circumstances stated in the plea, does not give any right to general average." Now, nothing could be stronger than the allegations in the plea in that case on which to establish the principle sought to be there established, yet the Court of Common Pleas, notwithstanding the clear and express allegations that the repairs were done for the safety of the cargo, distinctly and deliberately declined to adopt the principle contended for. A similar attempt was afterwards made in the Queen's Bench, in the subsequent case of Job and another v. Langton, 6 E. & B. 779; 26 L. J. 97 Q. B., to charge, against the owners of cargo, expenses incurred in getting a vessel off a shoal, after the goods had been removed and were in safety. It was there said, as it has been said here to-day, that there was a distinction between the actually repairing a vessel, and the raising and getting her off a shoal or bank and placing her in safety in a place where the repairs could be effected; and that in the latter operation there was a community of interest, the ship and cargo being both in peril, and a joint benefit accruing to both parties; that the goods, although transshipped, were still under the control of the shipowner, and the adventure was not abandoned; that the taking the ship off the shoal was necessary for the completion of the voyage, and that the subsequent repairs were an exception only. The Court of Queen's Bench, however, repudiated that argument, and the principle sought to be thereby established, on the ground that the cargo was safe, and the vessel only was in peril, and that, according to all the authorities in such cases, the owners of the cargo were not liable, the expenses incurred not being extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo, and not being distinguishable from the costs of ordinary repairs. The facts of that case appear to be undistinguishable from those of the case now before us, and the principle laid down in that case is applicable here. The only distinction which Mr. Aspinall could point out between the two cases was that another and subsequent case, in the Queen's Bench, of Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523; 26 L. J. 187, Q. B., was, as he contended, inconsistent with that of Job v. Langton, and that we must decide between them and follow the decision in Moran v. Jones rather than that in Job v. Langton. The case of Moran v. Jones was a peculiar one certainly. The facts there are very similar, though not quite so similar, to those of the present case as the facts in Job v. Langton are. We must, however, in judging of the decision, take not only the facts which are stated, but the inferences which are drawn from them. In Job v. Langton, the Court of Queen's Bench, after a very learned argument, took time to consider before delivering judgment, and in Moran v. Jones, the same court not only did not interfere with but, on the contrary, expressly adhered to the principle laid down by them in Job v. Langton, and I find nothing in Moran v. Jones to throw the slightest doubt on the decision in Job v. Langton. In Moran v. Jones the case turned on a different state of facts, and on the inferences drawn from these facts by the court. It was an action for freight by the owner of the ship against the underwriter, but the question raised in the case was the principle on which contribution ought to take place, the defendant (the underwriter) desiring to make the cargo liable for general average. But, on looking at the case itself, and the facts there stated, it appears that the goods in question which had been removed were not the general cargo, but a small quantity only of goods belonging to the shipowner himself. The vessel was chartered by the plaintiff, the owner, out and home, to bring a cargo of guano from Callao, and, by consent of the charterers, liberty was given to the plaintiff to ship on freight, on his own account, on the outward voyage, a small quantity of goods for Callao; in accordance with which arrangement goods to the value of 600*l.* were shipped on board, with which, and some 800 tons of ballast, the vessel set sail from Liverpool to Callao in performance of the voyage mentioned in the charter-party. The freight under the charter-party, on the completion of the voyage, would amount to about 6750*l.* Shortly after leaving Liverpool, and on the same day, the vessel encountered a heavy storm, and was forced to anchor near the Hoyle bank, when, the foremast being cut away, she drove and got firmly fixed on the bank. In the narrative of what followed, as given in the average-stater's adjustment, nothing particular was said about the goods; but there is the following passage:—"The sea made a complete breach over her, and she continued to strike heavily, straining and twisting very much. At noon on the 8th she floated and drove further on the bank, and struck very heavily, the decks rising about 2ft. each time that she struck. On the 9th, the weather being more moderate, assistance was procured from Liverpool, and men were employed in moving the wreck from alongside, and the materials of the ship, which, with some goods belonging to the shipowner, had been intrusted to the master, were all sent in lighters to Liverpool. On the 14th a stream anchor was carried out. The ship was afterwards scuttled, and about 300 tons of ballast were thrown overboard, and then the ship, being kept free by pumping, floated. The stream anchor and cable were then slipped, and the vessel was taken in tow by two steamers, and was anchored in the river Mersey. . . . When the repairs were completed the vessel was again fully ballasted, the goods were re-shipped, and she again set sail on her voyage." The only goods, therefore, stated to have been unshipped and reshipped were this small lot of goods of the shipowner; and it is not at all surprising that, with the above statement before them, and having to draw inferences, the court came to the conclusion, although the goods were landed before the expenses were incurred, that it was all one continuous transaction and operation. The goods and the materials of the ship were saved together, at one and the same time, and by one and the same operation. The case therefore proceeded entirely on the particular facts. Lord Campbell, C. J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court, therein says (at p. 533 of 7 E. & B., p. 191 of 26 L. J. Q.B.) "The goods had been taken from the ship and put on board a lighter before these expenses were incurred; and if this had been a separate operation, by which they were intended to be saved, for the benefit of the owner of the goods, we should have thought, as in (Job v. Langton) that the goods were not liable to contribute to the expenses subsequently incurred. Looking, however, to the facts stated in this special case, it seems to us that the act of putting the goods on the lighter was only part of one continuous operation, viz., getting the ship off the bank on which she was stranded, and sending her to Liverpool, where she might be repaired with a view to prosecute the original adventure. When she got to Liverpool the operation of saving her from shipwreck was completed, but the expense of this continuous operation for the common benefit of ship, goods, and freight, are the subject of general average. In Job v. Langton, we considered that the goods had been saved by a distinct and completed operation, and that afterwards a new operation began, which could not be properly distinguished from the repairs done to the ship to enable her to pursue the voyage. The steam-tug did not work at the ship, and does not appear to have been engaged till after the cargo was landed, and the coals and ballast had been taken out of her. In giving judgment in that case (Job v. Langton), the court then observed, 'The employment of the steam-tug and the cutting of the channel by which the ship was rescued, cannot, as was contended for, be part of the same operation as the unloading of the cargo. Under the circumstances stated, after the cargo had been safely discharged and landed, it does not even appear that it was for the advantage of the owner of the cargo that the ship should have been got off the strand and repaired. The owner of the ship, after the cargo was discharged, appears to us to have done nothing, except in the discharge of his ordinary duty as owner, and for the exclusive benefit of the ship.' But in the case on which we have now to adjudicate (Moran v. Jones) the goods were put into a lighter by the master of the ship, along with materials of the ship saved from the wreck, and they remained in the custody and under the control of the master till the ship was repaired, when they were reloaded in the ship and carried forward, without any interference by the owner of the goods, to their destined port. Unless it had been intended that an operation should be undertaken and completed, by which both ship and goods should be rescued from the peril to which they were exposed, nothing might have been done, and the goods might have perished. Because the goods happened to be saved in the earliest part of the operation, this can be no sufficient reason for saying that they ought not to contribute to all the expenses of the operation, which contemplated the benefit of all the interests imperilled by the stranding." In my opinion the decision in the case of Moran v. Jones does not at all interfere or clash with the doctrine laid down in the case of Job v. Langton. If there were any inconsistency between them, we are prepared to abide by the decision in Job v. Langton; but that is not necessary, for we think that the same principle was affirmed in each case. It is true that the American courts have adopted a different rule, but there is nothing new in that, as their books and authorities show. Their wish and aim are to increase the fund for general average. We, on the other hand, from the date of the case before Lord Ellenborough (Plummer v. Wildman, 3 M. & S. 482), have held strictly that there must be a common danger, to which both the ship and the cargo are alike exposed, and a voluntary sacrifice or an extraordinary expenditure incurred for the common benefit of both ship and cargo, in order to bring the latter under a liability to a claim of general average. Let us apply that principle to the present case. What, in the first place, is the plaintiff's claim? It is for the apportioned share which the defendants are, as the plaintiffs contend, bound to contribute towards the amount paid by the plaintiffs to the contractors for floating the ship from off the bank on which she had stranded, and getting her safely moored in the river for repairs, that amount constituting, as the plaintiffs allege and contend, general average expenditure. Now it appears that the ship had been driven on shore by the cyclone, and grounded on the bank upon the 5th Oct. By the 19th Oct. all the cargo had been unladen from on board her, and had been taken on shore at Calcutta, and was there safely warehoused, under the superintendence and control of the agents of the shipowners. What, at that time, was the state of the ship? She was still on the bank, and in great peril, and, according to the opinion of competent persons, she would not float. The cargo was then safe, and had the vessel been then overwhelmed by the tide and gone to the bottom, the loss would have been the loss of the ship alone, and would have made no difference whatever to the owners of the cargo. On the 19th Oct. extraordinary means were adopted to save what? why the ship, not the goods. A contract was entered into to save what? not the goods, for they were already safe on shore, but the ship. That effort failed, and the contract was abandoned. After the failure of the first contractors, Messrs. Burns and Co. made a contract to float the ship for 2300*l.*, and it is in respect of that sum alone that the question now before the court arises. Messrs. Burns and Co. succeeded in floating her off the bank on the 31st Dec, when she was taken into dock at Calcutta and repaired; and the repairs being completed by the 15th March the cargo was reshipped on board her from the warehouse, in which it had remained from the 16th Oct., and was then conveyed to England, and there safely delivered to the defendants. Now the general principle upon which the doctrine of general average

WALTHER AND ANOTHER v. MAVROJANI AND OTHERS.

[Ex. Ch.]

depends is, that there must be a common danger, actual or impending, affecting both ship and cargo. There must be an extraordinary expenditure or a voluntary sacrifice on the part of some or one of the subjects to avert the general peril, and then all must contribute their apportioned share. Here we fail to see who or what was benefited save the shipowners, who, when the ship was repaired, would be able to continue and complete the voyage. The cargo was in safety when the contract for floating the ship was made, and it was a matter of positive indifference to the owners of the cargo whether the ship floated or sank. The cargo was no longer connected with the ship when these expenses were incurred, except that, if the ship were floated and repaired, she might be able to carry it forward. The case fails to show that any advantage would have resulted to the cargo owners from that having been done, over and above that which would have resulted to them from its being carried forward in any other vessel. No expenses were incurred by the shipowners in order to save the cargo, nor has any benefit to the cargo, as derived from the expenses which were incurred, been pointed out by Mr. Aspinall. It has, indeed, been argued that it was all one adventure which was not complete until the goods were in the custody and under the control of their owners, until which event all parties had a common interest in carrying out the adventure. But, in answer to that, it may be said, that repairs are equally necessary to enable the ship to pursue her voyage, and so to complete the adventure, and yet such repairs are not the subject of general average. The contention fails also signally in this respect, that the case is altogether void of the ingredients necessary to constitute general average, namely, a common peril and a sacrifice or expenditure to secure a common benefit. The case is governed by the principle laid down in the case of Job v. Langton, and also in that of Moran v. Jones. That the principle in the latter case is correct I take for granted from the observations of Blackburn, J. in the case of Kemp v. Halliday, 6 B. & S. 764; 34 L. J. 233, Q. B.; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256; affirmed in error, 35 L. J. 156; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 752; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 520. In that case the learned judge, in the course of his judgment in the court below, said, "In order to give rise to a charge of general average, it is essential that there should be a voluntary sacrifice to preserve more subjects than one exposed to a common jeopardy; but an extraordinary expenditure incurred for that purpose is as much a sacrifice as if, instead of money being expended for the purpose, money's worth were thrown away. It is immaterial whether the shipowner sacrifice a cable or an anchor to get the ship off a shoal, or pays the worth of it to hire the extra services which get her off. It is quite true that, so long as the expenditure by the shipowner is merely such as he should incur in the fulfilment of his ordinary duty, as shipowner it cannot be general average; but the expenditure in raising a submerged vessel with cargo is extraordinary expenditure, and is, if incurred to save the cargo as well as the ship which prima facie is the object of such expenditure, chargeable against all the subjects in jeopardy saved by the expenditure. In the last edition of Arnould on Insurance, vol. 1, pp. 231-2, sect. 340, it is said, "A stranded vessel is in most cases in danger of being lost unless speedy steps are taken for her preservation, either by unloading the cargo to lighten her, or by endeavouring to float her by means of lumps, &c., with the cargo in her. The remuneration, which the shipowner is obliged to pay for the services thus rendered, gives a claim to general average contribution, provided such services shall appear to have been incurred for the joint benefit of the ship and cargo, which will be the case if ship and cargo are both exposed to a common danger, and both saved from it by the exertions employed for their rescue." Blackburn, J. proceeds to say, "This I apprehend is a perfectly accurate statement of the law. In the present case" (Kemp v. Halliday) "the greater part of the cargo was on shore and safe before the ship was submerged, but the extraordinary expenditure necessary to save the ship and the portion of the cargo on board would have been chargeable as general average as against them, though not against the part that was safe: See Moran v. Jones (ubi sup.) I do not mean to say that in every case where a ship with cargo is submerged, and the two are, in fact, raised together by one operation, the expenditure incurred must necessarily be for the common preservation of both. I think it is in every case a question of fact whether it was so; and if the cargo could be easily and cheaply taken out of the ship and saved by itself, it would not be proper to charge it with any portion of the joint operation which, in that case, would not be incurred for the preservation of the cargo." Now in the present case we have the power to draw inferences of fact, and the inference which I draw is, that there was here no common peril and no common benefit; the goods were safe when the expense was incurred, and the principle of general average does not apply. The judgment of the court below must, therefore, be affirmed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

M. SMITH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I only wish to add that I think there may be cases where, although the goods may have been landed and be safe before the floating expenses have been incurred, yet they might still be in peril in one sense, and so be still a part of a common adventure and liable to general average; as, for instance, if they should be perishable goods, or goods landed on a desolate island in a distant hemisphere. In the present case, however, the goods were safely warehoused in Calcutta; and it was, as we are at liberty to infer, utterly immaterial to the owners of them whether they were forwarded to England by the plaintiff's ship the Southern Belle or by any other vessel. No portion of the defendants' adventure was in peril, or risk of loss, or damage of any kind by the delay in waiting to be carried on by the plaintiff's vessel, and therefore the defendants are not liable to general average in respect of their cargo.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

HANNEN, J.—I also agree with the rest of the court in thinking that the judgment below should be affirmed. As between the two doctrines, English and American, relating to this matter, I prefer the English, and the principle on which general average is founded, as laid down by our own authorities. I think the English doctrine is the true one. As has already been observed by my brother, M. Smith, it was in this case immaterial to the goods owners whether their goods were forwarded by the same ship or by another: and it generally is so, except, of course, where they could not otherwise be carried on at all, or only at a much greater cost or after a damaging and deteriorating delay, and then the cargo would fairly be liable to general average. But, as a rule, expenses incurred subsequently to the removal of the cargo are incurred for the advantage of the ship alone. In the present case they were incurred, not in order to save both ship and goods from a common impending danger but, after the goods had been removed and were in safety, and, therefore, they were incurred for the benefit of the shipowners alone, and solely to enable them to prosecute and complete the voyage and adventure they had undertaken.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary for us to decide where the precise dividing line here is. I think the judgment of the court below is to be affirmed on the simple ground that, at the time when these expenses were incurred, the goods were safe. I think we ought to stand by the English rule, and hold that where there has been no joint peril and no joint benefit the goods cannot be the subject of general average.

REG. v. HAMILTON KINGLAKE, AND LOVIBOND.(a)
17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 9—Crimination—Privilege of witness—Pardon.

A witness who has received a pardon under the Great Seal is not privileged from answering questions, the replies to which may criminate him, on the ground that actions for penalties under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act are pending against him.

This was an ex officio information by the Attorney General against Doctor Hamilton Kinglake, and Mr. Henry Lovibond, containing various counts charging them with bribery, and conspiracy to bribe, at the election for Bridgwater, held in November, 1868.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge), Cole, Q.C., Kingdon, Q.C., Archibald, and J. F. Collier, for the Crown.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C., Pinder, A. Charles, and Kinglake, for the defendants.

A nolle prosequi was entered against Mr. Lovibond, and he was called as a witness by the Solicitor-General.

Mr. Lovibond having been sworn, on being asked a question connected with his participation in the last election for Bridgwater, sought the protection of the court on the ground that his reply might criminate him. The Solicitor-General thereupon tendered him a pardon under the Great Seal. The witness then appealed to the court to sustain his privilege, on the ground that two actions were pending against him for penalties for what took place at the election, and stated that he had been advised that a pardon could not obliterate the offence as regarded penalties.

The Solicitor-General.—I apprehend that a qui tam action does not affect this case, the witness cannot refuse to answer because it may act on his position in an action between a subject and himself in respect of money, of course we cannot stop the action of an informer, all we can do is to give Mr. Lovibond a pardon under the Great Seal for any criminal offence of any kind that he may have committed.

Sir J. Karlake.—These qui tam actions were both commenced before the pardon.

The Solicitor-General.—A qui tam action is an action for penalties for money, and I apprehend he cannot object any more than he could if called himself in the qui tam action by the informer. If called, I apprehend he could not refuse to answer because his answer might help the plaintiff in the action.

Sir J. Karlake.—I do not know whether we are entitled to say anything on the subject, but I apprehend the authorities are clear to show that a qui tam action is a penal action—they were actions pending before the date of the pardon; they are actions for 500*l.* penalties and more.

The Solicitor-General.—I do not think my learned friend has any right to be heard.

HANNEN, J.—I think not, but I shall be obliged to Sir John Karlake if he will give me any assistance.

Sir J. Karlake.—It occurred to us in the investigation, where a person who is a co-conspirator is called, and a nolle prosequi is entered, how far a pardon can affect this question. As I understand, the qui tam action is for penalties, and severe penalties, under the Act of Parliament. They are brought, it is true, by an informer, but I believe an informer who sues on behalf of himself and the Crown, and the qui tam actions were commenced before the pardon. I believe under the circumstances, where a qui tam action is commenced and is pending, a pardon has no effect upon it, and the witness is not bound to answer any question that may criminate him. The law affecting him in a qui tam action under the head of "Pardon" in Comyn's Digest, vol. 5, is this: "The king cannot by his pardon relieve a man from the consequences of an action commenced qui tam upon a penal statute except for the king's moiety or part. He cannot relieve him from the penalty due to the party aggrieved." That has been followed in certain cases, and it has been held to be that a pardon where another person has an interest in that which is the creature of an Act of Parliament, but is of a highly penal character, cannot be in any way affected by a pardon under the Great Seal granted after the action is commenced, and cannot affect the question as to the person who as an informer sues in that penal action, and does not exempt the witness from the consequences of answering, so far as that penal action is concerned. I only cite that for your Lordship's information.

The Solicitor-General.—I should submit to your Lordship that the authority my learned friend has read is conclusive against him.

Sir J. Karlake.—Then there is Dandridge v. Corden, 3 Car. & P., where Lord Tenterden held that "in an action upon a bill of exchange, if a person called to prove the consideration says that the bill was accepted for value received, but refused to say of what the value consisted, on the ground that it might render him liable to a qui tam action, he cannot be compelled to answer." There is also the case of Rawlings v. Hall, 1 Car. & P., and Thomas v. Newton, 2 Car. & P., which bears upon the subject, and there is the Stock Jobbing Act in Roberts v. Allnat, 1 Moo. & M. Rep., where it seems also to be assumed that the witness was privileged, where the question arose under the Stock Jobbing Act, and that Act, which is now repealed, is similar in language as to penalties to the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, namely, that the parties committing offences specified shall forfeit and pay the sums mentioned to be recovered by action on debt, bill, plaint, or information. I believe the authorities will be found to be conclusive.

The Solicitor-General.—I apprehend the authorities, which I am not going to dispute, are against my learned friend, because they all show so far as the Crown is concerned, the pardon would obliterate the offence, and that the moiety, which would be due to the Crown under the qui tam, is foregone by the pardon. Then it remains an action of debt for the penalty, and I apprehend that, as far as the action of the subject is concerned, there being no crime in respect of which Mr. Lovibond can be called upon to answer, the fact that he says it may be an advantage to the subject, cannot affect the Crown, and the cases my learned friend referred to are referable to the same principle in a qui tam action. An unpardoned man might expose himself to certain proceedings at the suit of the Crown. The pardon puts an end to all crime, there remains only the civil action; it is not a qui tam action, but a civil action for penalties between subject and subject, which, I apprehend, on no principle, can set free the witness from the duty of answering. The Act says: "Any person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of 100*l.* to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit." It appears in this case it is not a qui tam action, it is for the benefit of the informer himself; it is an action for a penalty at the suit of any person who chooses to bring the action, and I apprehend under no view can the witness be relieved from answering questions, because in that action by somebody that somebody can sue.

Sir J. Karlake.—My learned friend should see that this is treated as a penalty in the 9th clause, where it says, "The pecuniary penalties hereby imposed for the offence of bribery, treating, or undue influence respectively, shall be recoverable by action or suit by any person who shall sue for the same in any of Her Majesty's courts." I only read that from Comyn's Digest as showing the Crown courts only relieve the half of the penalty where it had half. Here the whole goes to the person, and that is treated in the Act exactly as it was under the Stock Jobbing Act.

HANNEN, J.—I confess that I had not anticipated this question, otherwise I would have applied my mind more to it. The difficulty I feel is, that it is a matter that affects the witness himself. It is not a point that can be reserved, and therefore it is necessary I should make up my mind upon it now, because the mischief will be done, if at all, when once my decision is given. [His Lordship retired to consider, and after an absence of an hour, returned into court and said:] I do not know whether you are in a position to give me any further assistance. I have only another question to ask—is it possible that this question can in any way be reserved for the consideration of the court? [The Solicitor-General.—Reg. v. Boyes seems to say your Lordship must decide it, and you alone.] I have not any doubt it is my duty to decide it. [The Solicitor-General.—Your Lordship's own court protested against its being reserved, and said they would decide it, but hoped it would not be drawn into a precedent.] If I could see my way to doing it I should, notwithstanding that intimation of the members of the court at that time, be anxious to have the matter considered more fully than I have been able to do. However, unless the counsel engaged in the case can see their way to it, of course I would not do it. [The Solicitor-General.—I apprehend with great respect it would be matter for new trial.] I do not think it would; I think it rests with the decision. If I thought so I should have very much less hesitation than I have if my decision were not final. But I am afraid that it is final as far as respects the interests of the witness.

HANNEN, J.—If I cannot get any assistance, I must take upon myself what I believe to be my duty, and give my decision now. I repeat that I greatly regret that I had not the opportunity of considering this point further; it is one which, though I have ventured to forecast the questions which might arise, I did not anticipate; but now, having taken time to consider, I have arrived at the conclusion that the witness is bound to answer; and, without travelling through all the stages by which I have arrived at that conclusion, I will state broadly this, that I come to the conclusion that this action, to which only after the pardon the witness can remain liable, is a liability to a debt, or a liability to a civil suit. And I am confirmed in that view by the fact that the Legislature has made the witness liable in the event of this action being proceeded with against him, to give evidence himself in that very case. Therefore it seems to me to confirm the view I take, that a proceeding of this kind is to be regarded only as a proceeding for a civil debt, and therefore I require the witness to answer.

CURRIE AND CO. (apps.) v. THE BOMBAY NATIVE INSURANCE COMPANY (resps.).

Marine insurance—Total loss—Notice of abandonment what sufficient as to terms and time—Duty of captain to cut up wreck to save cargo—Disbursements—Discretion as to transshipping cargo.

Insurances, against total loss only, were effected by the appellants with the respondents upon the cargo and disbursements respectively of the ship Northland for a voyage from Moulmein to Madras. The Northland set sail on June 1st 1867, and on the same day ran aground, and could not be got off. On June 6th surveys were made at the instance of the captain and underwriters respectively, and the surveyors reported, recommending that the ship should be dismantled with all despatch, and that immediate steps should be taken to save the cargo, consisting of heavy timber, padouk and teak. The captain, between June 6th and 10th, dismantled the ship, but did not attempt to discharge the cargo. On June 10th the appellants wrote to the underwriters, stating that the ship was a total wreck, and giving notice that they should claim payment of the policies. On June 11th the same surveyors made a second survey, and reported that it would be impossible to save the cargo without cutting the ship's decks and beams. The captain then sold the wreck and cargo. The purchasers saved nearly the whole of the cargo, discharging it through the hatchway and the timber ports:

Heid (on appeal from the judgment of the Recorder of Rangoon): First. That the letter of June 10th was sufficient notice of abandonment, since, though not containing the word "abandon," it expressed the intention of the assured to give up to the underwriters the property insured on the ground of its having been totally lost. (The dictum of Lord Ellenborough in Parmeter v. Todhunter, 1 Campb. 541, disapproved.)

Secondly. That the notice of abandonment was given in a reasonable time, the delay after the first survey having been a suspense of judgment fairly exercised on the part of the assured, in order to determine whether the circumstances were such as to entitle them to abandon.

Thirdly. That there was no total loss of the cargo; because part, at least, of the cargo might have been saved before or after the second survey, had the captain made proper efforts for that purpose.

Fourthly. That, the ship being a hopeless wreck, it was the duty of the captain to cut up the ship if the cargo could not otherwise be saved; for where a ship and cargo are in peril of loss, the captain must act for the benefit of all concerned, and not prefer the interests of one party to those of another.

The disbursements insured were advances made by the charterer to the captain, to be paid out of freight on the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge:

Held, that there was a total loss of the disbursements, the possibility of freight being earned, having been at an end when the ship became a wreck, and sufficient notice of abandonment having been given: (The Karnak, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159, approved.)

A captain is not under an absolute obligation to transship a cargo when a vessel is disabled from pursuing the voyage insured, but may exercise his discretion upon the subject.

This was an appeal against the judgment of the Recorder of Rangoon, by which he dismissed with costs a claim preferred by the appellants for rupees 40,000, due on two policies of insurance on the cargo and disbursement of the ship, Northland, dated 1st June 1867.

The point in dispute was whether the appellants were entitled to recover from the respondents rupees 40,000, insured by the appellants by two policies of insurance dated 1st June 1867, on the cargo and disbursements of the ship Northland, viz.:—

One policy, No. 1275, dated 1st June 1867, at Rangoon, effected on the cargo as therein described of the ship Northland	Rupees 38,400
One other policy, No. 1276, also dated 1st June 1867, at Rangoon, described as part insurance on disbursements of the above vessel	Rupees 1,600
Total rupees	40,000

The following is so much of policy No. 1275 as relates to the present appeal:—

The said goods and merchandises, or treasure laden thereon, for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and the company in the policy, are and shall be rated and valued at rupees thirty-eight thousand and four hundred only, and declared to be on timber marked and described as per margin, payable in case of total loss only, which shall be proved in case of loss, &c.

The policy also contained the usual saving and labouring clause.

The following is so much of policy No. 1276 as relates to the present appeal.

The said goods and merchandises, or treasure laden thereon, for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and the company in the policy, are and shall be rated and valued at rupees one thousand six hundred only, declared to be part insurance or disbursements of the above vessel, described and valued as per margin, payable in case of total loss only, which shall be proved in case of loss, &c.

The policy also contained the usual saving and labouring clause.

The charter-party, dated March 18th, 1869, between the appellants and Captain Howard, the master of the Northland, contained the following clause as to disbursements:—

Charterers to advance the master what money he requires for the necessary disbursements of the ship at Moulmein (for the due appropriation of which they shall not be held responsible), not exceeding rupees 8,000, for which he will give his receipt on bill of lading or charter-party, at shipper's option, including agency commission at five per cent. and cost of insurance, and at current rate of exchange for sixty days' sight bills on Madras, the amount to be deducted from freight on settlement thereof, together with the cost of insurance.

Captain Howard gave a receipt for the disbursements indorsed on the charter-party in the following terms:—

Moulmein, 29th May 1867. Received from Messrs. M. R. Currie and Co. the sum of rupees 8,300 only, being disbursements at this port, the amount to be deducted from freight on settlement thereof, as per terms of charter-party.

The other facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Sir R. Palmer, Q. C. and Grantham (Pollock, Q. C. with them), for the appellants. The ship and cargo were sold by the captain, acting on the best advice, for the benefit of all parties, and as an uninsured owner of the ship and cargo would have done. The right to abandon depends upon the fact, whether the sale was or was not justifiable under the circumstances of the case. See Kidstone v. Empire, &c., Insurance Company, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 357;

Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing N. C. 266;

Tudor's Lead. Cas. in Merc. Law 139;

Cambridge v. Anderton, 2 B. & C. 691.

In Farnworth v. Hyde, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 204, the cargo was of a different character to that in the present case. The cargo was here timber of a peculiarly heavy kind, which would not float, and so could not be rafted. There was sufficient notice of abandonment in the letter of 10th June. Though the word "abandon" was not used; the intention to abandon was clear: (King v. Walker, 3 H. & C. 209; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259.) And the notice was in sufficient time. See

Read v. Bonham, 3 Brod. & Bing. 147;

Gernon v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 6 Taunt. 383.

Delay in giving notice is important when cargo is of a nature that its value is liable to rise and fall in the market. But here such a consideration could have no place. Further, even had the notice been insufficient, yet the conduct of the respondents shows that they waived the right to a formal notice, and accepted the cargo insured as a constructive total loss. It is therefore submitted that the appellants are entitled to recover the amounts insured under the policies as for an actual, or for a constructive total loss. As to the disbursements, the recorder was wrong in saying, in his judgment in the court below, that they "appeared to be money advanced to the captain for the purposes of the ship, to pay her dues for the port, wages, stores, outfit for the voyage, &c." The payments made by the appellants to the captain for disbursements were moneys paid by them at the time for and on behalf of the captain and owners, and not in any way payments on account of cargo or freight. The right to recover them consequently does not depend on whether freight could have been earned or not, but on those payments being lost. And as the freight out of which the appellants would have paid themselves, and out of which they were to have been paid, was lost, the respondents are liable to pay the amount claimed. [Lord CHELMSFORD referred to the Karnak, L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 516; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159, where certain advances obtained by the application of the captain to the charterer were held under the circumstances to be "advances of freight to be repaid by deductions from freight, if earned; and if not earned then to be lost by the charterer, unless he should have used the stipulated premium in insuring."]

Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C. (Solicitor-General) and Watkin Williams for the respondents.—We admit that the letter of June 10th would be in terms sufficient notice of abandonment. But we contend that the notice was insufficient—first, because not made at the proper time; secondly, because not made under proper circumstances. The object of an early notice is to give the underwriters an opportunity of saving as much as possible. [Lord CHELMSFORD.—

CURRIE AND CO. v. THE BOMBAY NATIVE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[PRIV. CO.]

Yes, that is the object of requiring a prompt notice rather than the one suggested by Mr. Grantham, viz., to prevent speculations on the rise and fall of markets.] The assured must give notice within a reasonable time, the question as to what is a reasonable time, depending "upon the certainty of the news of the disaster, and upon the nature of the casualty itself. . . . The assured may wait a reasonable time for more accurate information as to the nature of the loss, or the actual extent of the damage. For these two purposes alone can any delay be allowed him. He may not delay in order to observe the state of the markets; nor can he lie by and treat the loss as an average loss until the recovery of the property becomes hopeless, and then give notice of abandonment:" (Arnould on Marine Insurance, vol. 2, p. 858, 3rd edit.) Here the delay in giving notice had not the excuses above suggested. Notice might well have been given on June 5th or 6th; and the difference of a few days was most material in such a case as the present. Next, the circumstances under which the notice was given made it insufficient. The captain did nothing to save the cargo after the survey on June 6th till the 11th of the same month. The captain in his evidence says that he "proceeded to strip the ship," and the "work of dismantling continued, and we went on saving what we could until the 10th." But these exertions were to save the ship, not the cargo. It is clear from the report of the survey on June 6th that there was then no total loss, but that the cargo or some of it might have been saved. Boats were available for discharging purposes, and the cargo was practically imperishable; and after the survey on June 11th, the cargo might have been saved by cutting up the ship. [Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.—The object of the policy was to have the cargo safe at the end of the voyage. Was the captain bound to cut up the ship, and so prevent the possibility of the completion of the voyage?] Yes; where, as here, the ship was a hopeless wreck, and so damaged as to be incapable of repair. The assured cannot recover as for a total loss here, because the cargo existed in specie, and was practically capable of being sent in a marketable state to the port of destination. The question is, whether doing so would have cost more than the value of the cargo. But here the cargo was not damaged, and the only expense would have been in re-shipping the cargo. The expenses to be taken into account are stated in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Farnworth v. Hyde (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 225; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396), where Channell, B. said, "Where goods are in consequence of the perils insured against lying at a place different from the place of their destination, damaged, but in such a state that they can at some cost be put into a condition to be carried to their destination, the jury are to determine whether it is practically possible to carry them on, that is, according to the well-known exposition in Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94; 19 L. J. 235, C. P., whether to do so will cost more than they are worth; and in determining this the jury should take into account all the extra expenses consequent on the perils of the sea, such as drying, landing, warehousing, and re-shipping the goods; but they ought not to take into account the fact that if they are carried on in the original bottom, or by the original ship-owner in a substituted bottom, they will have to pay the freight originally contracted to be paid; that being a charge to which the goods are liable when delivered, whether the perils of the sea affect them or not." It is, on the whole, therefore submitted that there was no constructive total loss, and that there was no valid notice of the abandonment of the cargo. As to the disbursements, they stand on the same footing as the cargo, and if there was no right to abandon the latter, there was none to abandon the former. Reference on this point was made to

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18. — Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Recorder of Rangoon dismissing the suit of the appellants brought to recover the amount of two policies of insurance effected by them with the respondents upon the cargo and disbursements respectively of the ship Northland upon a voyage from Moulmein to Madras. The policies, which were dated 1st June 1867, were against total loss only. The Northland, with a cargo consisting partly of teak and partly of padouk and other timber (of great specific gravity), set sail from Moulmein on the insured voyage to Madras on the 2nd June 1867. She proceeded in charge of a pilot down the Moulmein River in tow of a tug steamer, and came to an anchor about half-past five in the evening of that day. In consequence of the strength of the tide the Northland dragged her anchors and went aground about nine o'clock. Endeavours were made during the night to get her off, but without success; and in the morning, the tide having left her, she was found (in the language of the pilot and the captain) "broken," or "almost broken in two." And the captain added, "if there had been any means by which she could then have been got into deep water she would most probably have gone down." The captain procured a survey of the ship, and on the 6th June three surveyors reported that they found her lying ashore on the sands perfectly upright, but hogged to the extent of four feet; and after describing particularly other injuries which she had sustained they concluded their report in these terms:—"In consequence of the vessel being loaded with a cargo of padouk and teak timber we would recommend that she be stripped and dismantled with all despatch, and steps taken to save as much of the cargo and stores as possible for the benefit of all concerned." The underwriters had a survey made on their behalf by a Mr. Peche, upon whose evidence in other respects their Lordships are not disposed to lay any stress, but upon this occasion he substantially agreed with the other surveyors, and reported as follows:—"Her hull is so seriously injured that I recommend prompt and decisive steps to be taken to dismantle and discharge for the benefit of all interested." The captain, in accordance with the recommendation of the surveyors, proceeded to dismantle the vessel, and "sent down spars and sails, and everything above water which they could move." This work of dismantling continued until the 10th June, the day on which a notice of abandonment was given, but nothing was done or attempted towards discharging the cargo, which, according to the evidence of Mr. Dodd, one of the surveyors, by employing extra hands, might have gone on simultaneously with the work of dismantling the vessel. The grounds upon which the captain thought it would be useless to attempt to get out the cargo were stated by him to be that, "at the time the vessel was aground the weather was nasty and squally up to the 10th or 11th June; that at that time of the year bad and heavy weather is to be expected, that he did not think he could have got out a single log of the cargo without destroying the ship by cutting her open. That if the ports (mean- the openings through which the timber was shipped, and under ordinary circumstances would have been taken out of the vessel) had been opened she would have filled with sand; and that if he had attempted to get at the cargo by cutting the ship, with the weather such as it was at the time, he did not think he should have saved any of the ship or cargo." There is some contradictory evidence as to the state of the weather between the 6th and the 10th or 11th June. The pilot, without specifying the exact time to which he was speaking, said, "The weather was very dirty, blowing hard with rain. There was a heavy sea on at high water. At low water it was smooth enough." The notarial protest made by the captain, however, does not state that there was any stormy weather between the time of the vessel grounding and the 10th or 11th June. His description of the weather on each day is, "Thursday, 6th June, commenced with light cloudy weather and variable winds." He gives no account of the state of the weather on the 7th June. On the 8th June he describes it as "squally weather and rain." But on Sunday, the 9th June, this is his description—"Throughout these twenty-four hours fine clear weather and moderate breeze from S.W." On Monday, the 10th June, he states it to have been "fine all day, clear weather, and very hot." And on Tuesday, the 11th June, that the "first and middle part was fine clear weather, and very hot, with fine S.W. breeze." This protest of the captain tends strongly to confirm the evidence of the witness Bodeker, who is the agent of the respondent, and who swore that "there had been unusually fine weather for some time before the second survey." With respect to the reason given by the captain for not making any effort to save the cargo, that none of it could be got out without cutting the ship open, this was not the opinion of the surveyors at the time of the first survey, but on the contrary, they recommend "steps to be taken to save as much of the cargo as possible." And at the trial, Mr. Dodd, the Government Surveyor, said, "On the second occasion on which I visited the ship I did not think it was possible to save the cargo without cutting the ship." And, "When I saw the Northland first I think she could have partly discharged her cargo and come up to Moulmein." Another of the surveyors, Mr. Carruthers, said, "It was on the second survey that I came to the conclusion that the cargo could not be got out except by cutting the ship's decks." Before this second survey was made, and while it was the opinion of the surveyors that steps ought to be taken to save the cargo, the assured, the appellants, on the 10th June 1867, wrote to the underwriters in these terms: "With regard to the Northland, we regret to say that she is a total wreck, and we have hereby to give you notice that we shall claim payment of the policies we hold against her cargo and disbursements." On the following day, the 11th June, another survey took place by the same three surveyors who had made the former one, and they reported as follows: "The ship is hogged to a fearful extent, and broken amidship, the water flowing and ebbing in and out and through her as the tide rises and falls, and the bow ports under water at high tide. We are of opinion it would be impossible to save the cargo, which consists of Padouk and teak, without cutting the ship's decks and beams, on account of the logs of timber being so severely jammed, which is caused by the vessel being so fearfully hogged and out of shape." After this second survey the captain, on the 14th June, advertised for sale by public auction the wreck of the British ship Northland, together with her cargo of timber, in one lot, and on the following day the ship and cargo were sold for the sum of 13,000 rupees. The purchasers immediately after the sale proceeded to discharge the timber, and succeeded in obtaining all of it except sixty logs. There were two timber ports at the side and one on the deck. These were opened, and the timber was got up through the hatchway and out of the ports, but the greater part was lifted through the hatchway. The person employed by the purchasers to discharge the cargo stated in his evidence that the vessel remained in the same position all the time they were discharging, and that they found no difficulty whatever in getting it out. They worked for thirty-five days uninterruptedly, but on the thirty-sixth day there was a strong wind, and the vessel became a wreck, and thereupon they ceased working and left her. Under ordinary circumstances the cargo could have been discharged in twenty-one days. Upon this evidence the recorder was of opinion that there was no total loss, actual or constructive, within the terms of either of the two policies, and that even if the assured had a right to abandon, there was no sufficient notice of abandonment. Upon the argument before their Lordships, the Solicitor-General for the respondents very properly admitted that the notice of abandonment was in its terms sufficient. The case upon which the Recorder founded his judgment of the insufficiency of the notice was a Nisi Prius case of Parmeter v. Todhunter, 1 Camp. 541, in which there having been a verbal notice that the ship insured had been captured, recaptured, and carried into Grenada, and that the underwriters were required to settle as for a total loss, and to give directions as to the disposition of the ship and cargo, Lord Ellenborough said "the abandonment must be express and direct, and I think the word 'abandon' should be used to render it effectual." But whatever strictness of construction may have been applied to notices of abandonment in former times, it never could have been absolutely necessary to use the technical word "abandon;" any equivalent expressions which informed the underwriters that it was the intention of the assured to give up to them the property insured upon the ground of its having been totally lost, must always have been sufficient. There can be no doubt that the letter of the 10th June from the assured to the underwriters was a sufficient intimation of the intention of the assured to divest themselves of the property in the Northland, and to vest it in the underwriters, subject, of course, to the question of their right to abandon, upon the ground of either an actual or a constructive total loss. The respondents confined their answer to the appellants' case to the denial of there having been a total loss of the cargo, and to the objection that if there were a total loss the notice of abandonment was not given within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time in a case of this description must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. On the one hand, the assured is not to delay his notice when a total loss occurs, in order to take his chance of doing better for himself by keeping the subject insured, and then when he finds it will be more to his advantage to do so, throwing the burden upon the underwriters, while, on the other, the underwriters cannot complain of a suspense of judgment fairly exercised on the part of the assured, to enable him to determine whether the circumstances are such as entitle him to abandon. In the present case, assuming the loss to be a total one, there appears to have been no unreasonable delay in giving the notice of abandonment. At the time of the first survey on the 6th June, there was no reason for supposing that the timber would be totally lost. The surveyors at this time recommended steps to be taken which they must have supposed would have been effectual to save some, at least, of the cargo. But at the time when the notice was given (as sufficiently appears by the surveyors' report of the following day), things had assumed a much more serious appearance, so as to justify the apprehension that the cargo would be entirely lost. Whether the vessel was brought into the condition described in the second survey, suddenly, or gradually between the 6th and the 10th June is not in evidence, but in either case their Lordships think that there was no unreasonable delay in giving the notice of abandonment, and that supposing there was a total loss of the subject insured it would entitle the appellant to recover the amount of the policies. We arrive then at the question whether there was a total loss under the policies. And here we must distinguish between the policy on the timber, and that upon the disbursements, as different considerations are applicable to them. Taking first the policy on the timber, does the evidence show that the assured were entitled to treat the case as one of total loss? It cannot be contended that at the time of the first survey the timber, or at all events some part of it, could not have been saved; and if part might have been saved, the loss, of course, could be only partial. The surveyors were all of opinion that endeavours should be made to get the timber out of the ship, and at the first survey they did not think it would be necessary to cut the decks to effect this object. It was the duty of the assured, or of the captain of the Northland (to whom everything appears to have been left), to take some steps in accordance with the recommendation of the surveyors to try and save the cargo. But towards this object the captain literally did nothing. As far as dismantling the ship went he acted upon the report of the surveyors, and continued this particular work down to the 10th June, but according to Mr. Dodd this need not have interfered with the discharge of the cargo, for although the crew could not have assisted in that service, "by employing extra hands both operations might have been conducted together." The excuse offered by the captain for not attempting to get out the timber is that not only at that time of the year "bad and heavy weather" might be expected, but that the weather was actually "nasty and squally," by which he must be understood to mean that it was of such a character as to render it impracticable to make even an attempt to get at the timber. But his evidence as to the state of the weather from the 6th to the 11th June, both inclusive, is positively contradicted by his own notarial protest, to which reference has been already made. It is impossible, therefore, to believe that the state of the weather prevented even the smallest attempt to save any portion of the timber, the weather having been, on the contrary, peculiarly favourable for that season of the year for at least making the experiment. At the time of the second survey things had materially altered for the worse, and from what the surveyors call "the fearful extent" to which the vessel was hogged, the timber had become "so severely jammed," that, in their opinion, it was impossible to save it without cutting the decks. Now, assume for the moment that the cargo was in such a condition at this time that it might be regarded as totally lost, if previously a portion of it, at least, might have been saved by the exertions of the captain acting for the assured, and he chose not to make the slightest attempt to save it, how can the assured recover from the underwriters a loss which was made total by their own negligence? This, in itself, would be an answer to the claim of a total loss upon the policy on the timber. But it is very doubtful whether, at the time of the second survey, there really was a total loss. It is true that it was the opinion of the surveyors that the cargo could not be saved without cutting the ship's decks and beams, and the captain said, "If they had attempted to get at the cargo by cutting the ship, with the weather they had at the time, he didn't think they would have saved any of the ship or cargo." The captain here again makes the state of the weather an obstacle to doing what was necessary for saving the cargo, but it has been clearly shown that this excuse cannot avail him. If there was nothing in the state of the weather to prevent the operation of cutting open the decks, what reason was there for not resorting to it? When a ship and cargo are in peril of being lost, the captain is called upon to act for the benefit of all concerned, and he is not at liberty to prefer the interests of one of the parties to those of another. In this case, his tenderness to the ship might have arisen from his being a part-owner uninsured, but, at all events, there was no reason why she should have been spared if her sacrifice were necessary to the safety of her cargo. She was a hopeless wreck, and was sold at the auction in that character and by that description. Can it be said that the captain was doing his duty, either to the owners of the cargo or to the underwriters, by not opening this wreck in order to obtain access to the cargo, by the only mode in which it was supposed at this time that it could be saved? But even at the period of the second survey, if any effort had been made by the captain to get at the cargo, some portion of it might have been saved without cutting open the decks. He states, indeed, in his evidence, that "he didn't think he could have got out a single log of the cargo without destroying the ship, and that if the timber ports had been opened she would have filled with sand." But, after the auction, the purchaser, according to the evidence of the person employed by him, discharged almost the whole of the cargo through the hatchways and out of the ports, without apparently experiencing any extraordinary difficulty, except that a longer time was occupied in unloading the timber than would have been required under ordinary circumstances. Whether the timber was taken out of the hatchways without cutting open the decks is not stated. It is said that during the thirty-six days employed on the work the weather was unusually fine, but this has been abundantly shown to have also been the case between the first and second surveys. Their Lordships are of opinion that there was no time between the grounding of the Northland and the sale by auction, at which the assured were entitled to treat the cargo as having been totally lost. They have already adverted to the absence of even the smallest attempt on the part of the captain after the first survey to save the cargo, and to the extreme probability that with the favourable weather which occurred afterwards and before the ship was hogged to such an extent as that the timber became "severely jammed," a considerable portion of it would have been obtained. This omission of the captain to take any steps towards saving the cargo, at a time when it was probable that his endeavours would be successful, in their Lordships' judgment, precludes the assured from claiming for a total loss of the cargo into whatever condition it might have been brought afterwards. But even at the time of the second survey, as the Northland had then become a perfect wreck, there was no reason for sparing her, and if the timber could not be got out without cutting up the decks, their Lordships think that the captain, who is bound where there is danger of loss of ship and cargo to act for the benefit of all concerned, ought to have treated the ship as utterly lost, and to have regarded only the interests of the owners of the cargo and of the underwriters. As far, therefore, as the judgment of the Recorder applies to the policy upon the cargo, their Lordships are of opinion that he came to a right conclusion that the assured were not entitled to recover. With respect to the policy on disbursements their Lordships cannot agree with the Recorder's judgment. The disbursements were advances made by the charterer to the captain of the Northland, to be paid out of freight which would not be earned except by the arrival of the vessel at Madras. There can be no doubt, upon the authority of the case of Droege v. Stuart and Simpson (The Karnak, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159; L. Rep., 2 Priv. Co., 505), decided by the Judicial Committee on the 15th July last, that the sums borrowed by the captain from the charterer at the port of loading, to be repaid by deductions from the freight, must be considered as advances of freight, and that the charterer had therefore an insurable interest. The possibility of freight being earned by the Northland was of course at an end when she was reduced to a wreck, and the case became one of total loss. It was argued, on the part of the respondents, that the captain might have hired another vessel and forwarded the timber to its destination, and so have earned freight out of which the disbursements might have been paid. But even supposing that the advances made upon the original freight would attach upon the freight thus acquired, the captain is not under an absolute obligation to transship a cargo when a ship is disabled from pursuing the voyage insured, but may exercise his discretion upon the subject. And while the ship was unquestionably a wreck, and utterly incapable of conveying the goods to their destination, and so earning freight, the assured gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters (which their Lordships have determined to be a good notice), and at this time there is no doubt there was a total loss of the disbursements which were to be paid out of freight. Their Lordships therefore will recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be varied so far as relates to the policy on disbursements, and that it be declared that the appellants are entitled to recover on that policy, with so much costs of suit as according to the course of the court below he would have been entitled to if the judgment had been given for him on that policy, and that in respect of the other policy the judgment be affirmed, and that the cause be remitted to the court below in order that a final decree be made in accordance with the above declarations. Their Lordships think there should be no costs of the appeal on either side.

CURRIE AND CO. v. THE BOMBAY NATIVE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Judgment varied.

(Before LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD.)

Re THE WESTERN LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY;
Ex parte WILLETTS.

Winding-up—Amalgamated companies—Official liquidators—Advisability of appointing the same person for all.

The A. company having amalgamated with the W. and several other companies, was ordered to be wound-up. Claims against the W. Society remaining unpaid, a creditor obtained an order that that society also should be wound-up by the court. Notwithstanding that conflicting claims and interests must arise between the A., the W., and the other amalgamated companies, or some of them, an order of James, V.C. appointing the official liquidator of the A. to be official liquidator of the W. was affirmed, on the ground of probable saving of expense.

In all independent and adverse questions between the companies, separate solicitors ought to represent the several companies.

On 17th Sept. 1869 the Albert Life Assurance and Family Endowment Society, which had under various titles carried on business in London since the year 1835, was ordered to be wound-up by James, V.C., and two gentlemen were duly appointed official liquidators for that purpose. That company had during its existence formed amalgamations with several other companies carrying on life assurance and kindred business, and amongst these was the Western Life Assurance Society, which had been at the date of the winding-up of the Albert absorbed in that company for several years. Policies and liabilities of the Western had been taken over by the Albert, and when this latter passed into liquidation the claims thence arising were not paid. A petition was then presented by a creditor for the winding-up of the Western, and the usual order was made by James, V.C., who appointed one of the gentlemen acting as official liquidator of the Albert to be the sole official liquidator of the Western.

Such an order was opposed by the petitioner who had procured the winding-up of the Western, on the ground that, as between that company, the Albert, and the numerous other companies which had been so amalgamated, there would of necessity arise a great conflict of interests, and that therefore it was not advisable that the same person should act as official liquidator for any two of them, and on the order being made he now appealed.

Kay, Q. C. and Waller supported this appeal for the reasons stated, which appear more fully from the judgment of the Lord Justice.

Cracknall, for the official liquidator, the Western Society.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C., and Higgins in support of the order, were not called on.

Fry, Q. C. and Solomon for other parties.

LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD—I will not trouble you Sir R. Palmer. This is an appeal against the appointment of a liquidator, the Vice-Chancellor having exercised his discretion as to that appointment. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the reasons which have been given why that discretion has not been well exercised, but I confess I cannot accede to those reasons. In point of fact, if those reasons were good for anything, there would be a multitude of liquidators appointed for these different companies to begin with, beyond all doubt. In the next place there must be an immense mass of ordinary administrative business, irrespective of litigation altogether, applying to all these companies and very much mixed together, and whatever gentlemen make themselves masters of the affairs of the Albert Company, must to a great extent, be masters of the affairs of all the other companies also. Therefore for that reason alone there will be a great saving of expense, if the same liquidators are appointed both of the Albert and all the other companies. The argument is that there are independent and adverse questions between the companies interested. That, no doubt, is true. But then, first of all it is to be observed, that all proceedings are in the names of the companies, and not in the names of the liquidators; in the next place, the liquidators are officers of the court; in the next place, it is very easy to appoint separate solicitors who, in point of fact in cases of this sort, would take care of the interest in respect of which they are appointed, and, besides that, the whole matter is under the direction and control of the Vice-Chancellor in Chambers; and have no doubt whatever that when James, V. C. appointed one and the same liquidator he also gave directions, and will give such directions, with respect to the raising of these particular questions, as will enable these separate solicitors who will have been appointed, to bring these independent questions properly and fairly and completely before the court. That being so, I have no hesitation whatever in affirming this order, and dismissing this application with costs. I may add that if the parties are dissatisfied it cannot be helped, but I do not think that there will be any ground for dissatisfaction. I think there would be great and grave ground for dissatisfaction if any other course had been adopted than that which the Vice-Chancellor has thought fit to adopt.

Re NICHOLL'S TRUSTS.

Practice—Trustee Act 1850, s. 24—Vesting order—Surviving trustee—Executors—Refusal by two executors to transfer to person entitled—Third executor lunatic.

There were three executors of the surviving trustee of a settlement. One of them was a lunatic. The other two, when requested by the person who was absolutely entitled to some shares which were included in the settlement to transfer the shares to him refused to do so:

Held, that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 24 of the Trustee Act 1850, to make an order vesting the shares in the person absolutely entitled to them, but that it would be necessary to present a petition entitled in lunacy.

Even if the lunatic executor had been of sound mind, the refusal of two of the executors to make the transfer would not have given the court jurisdiction under sect. 24 to make a vesting order.

This was an application under sect. 24 of the Trustee Act 1850, for a vesting order. That section enacts that where any one of the trustees of any stock or chose in action shall neglect or refuse to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for or recover such chose in action, according to the directions of the person absolutely entitled thereto, for the space of twenty-eight days next after a request in writing for that purpose shall have been made to him or her by such person, it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting the right to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for and recover such chose in action, in the other trustee or trustees of the said stock or chose in action, or in any person or persons whom the said court may appoint jointly with such other trustee or trustees.

In the present case some Oxford Canal shares were vested in the one surviving trustee upon settlement, on the trusts of the settlement. He died, having by his will appointed three executors. One of those executors was a lunatic. A request, in writing, was made to the other two by the persons absolutely beneficially entitled to the shares to transfer the shares to them.

The two executors, for twenty-eight days afterwards, refused to make this transfer, and a petition in Chancery was presented by the persons beneficially entitled, asking that the shares might be ordered to vest in them. James V. C., thought that sect. 24 of the Act gave him no jurisdiction to make the order, but he suggested that the matter should be at once mentioned to the Lord Justice.

Edmund Cutler now mentioned the matter, and argued that as at law the two executors, without the concurrence of the third, could dispose of their testator's personal estate, the vesting order might be made under sect. 24 of the Act, without the necessity of entitling the petition in lunacy, so as to bring the matter under those sections of the Act which gave a jurisdiction in lunacy.

Lord Justice GIFFARD thought that a petition entitled in lunacy must be presented, for, even if the third executor had been of sound mind, the refusal to transfer would not have given the Court of Chancery jurisdiction to make the vesting order now asked for.

The Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 71, 78, 130—Appeal—Where to be brought—Bankruptcy commenced before the Act came into operation—Proceedings transferred to a County Court—Order made by the County Court judge—The Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 83), sect. 20—General Rules in Bankruptcy, Jan. 1, 1870, Nos. 143, 144, 319.

An adjudication of bankruptcy having been made under the B. A. 1861 in a district court of bankruptcy, the proceedings in the bankruptcy were, when the B. A. 1869 came into operation, transferred by an order of the Lord Chancellor, made under the authority of that Act, to the County Court of the same district. The bankrupt applied to the judge of the County Court for his order of discharge, and the judge being of opinion that the bankrupt had, within the meaning of sect. 159 of the B. A. 1861, incurred debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them, granted him only a conditional order of discharge. The bankrupt presented an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery:

Held, that the appeal was properly brought to that court, and that it was not necessary to appeal in the first instance to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, as would have been the case if the order appealed from had been made in a bankruptcy commenced under the B. A. 1869.

On the 5th Oct. 1869 an adjudication of bankruptcy was made in the Bankruptcy Court for the Manchester District against Thomas Palmer. When the Bankruptcy Act 1869 came into operation the bankrupt had not obtained his order of discharge. Under the powers conferred by that Act the Lord Chancellor made an order transferring (inter alia) the proceedings in Palmer's bankruptcy to the Manchester County Court. On the 16th Feb. 1870, Palmer applied to that court for his order of discharge, and the judge being of opinion that the bankrupt had contracted debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them, within the meaning of sect. 159 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, granted to him only a conditional order of discharge, the condition being that he should out of his income or earnings during the next three years pay to his creditors' assignees, for the benefit of the creditors under the bankruptcy, the sum of 225*l.*, in three equal instalments of 75*l.* each. The bankrupt appealed against the order, the appeal being brought directly to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. The notice of motion of appeal, dated the 17th March 1870, was not served till the 21st March, more than twenty-one days after the making of the order appealed from.

De Gex, Q. C. and Jordan (of the Common Law Bar) opened the appeal.

Ex parte WIELAND; Re WIELAND.

[CHAN.]

Roxburgh, Q. C. and C. W. Bardswell, on behalf of the respondent, raised a preliminary objection to the competency of the appeal, viz., that it ought to have been brought in the first instance to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. The order appealed from was one made in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and sect. 71 of that Act provides that any person aggrieved by any order of a local bankruptcy court made in pursuance of that Act may appeal to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy; and that any order made by the chief judge, whether in respect of a matter brought before him on appeal or not, shall be subject to an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. The appeal also, according to Rule 143 of the General Rules in Bankruptcy of Jan. 1, 1870, ought to have been brought within twenty-one days from the order appealed from. Consequently this appeal was too late.

De Gex, Q. C. and Jordan, in support of the competency of the appeal, urged that sect. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 had no application to bankruptcy proceedings commenced under the Bankruptcy Act 1861. They were to be regulated by the old practice. This was evident from No. 319 of the General Rules of Jan. 1, 1870, as well as from sect. 20 of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869, which preserved all existing rights under the Bankruptcy Act 1861. Moreover, under the Act of 1861 thirty days was the time allowed for presenting an appeal with regard to an order of discharge, and it could never have been the intention of the Legislature to cut down that time in the case of bankruptcies commenced under the Bankruptcy Act 1861 without any express enactment to do so.

Roxburgh, Q. C. in reply, said that the Bankruptcy Act 1861 was altogether repealed by the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869, except so far as existing rights were preserved; but it was meant that the procedure in bankruptcies commenced under the old Act should be regulated according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

Lord Justice GIFFARD was of opinion that as this was a bankruptcy the proceedings in which were commenced under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, the appeal was properly brought directly to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. It was to be observed in the first place that there was in the language of Rule 319 a manifest distinction made between proceedings commenced after the Bankruptcy Act 1869 came into operation, and those which had been commenced before that Act came into operation. In the next place, sect. 20 of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869 provided that the repeal of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 should not interfere with the prosecution or affect the course of any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy or otherwise under any enactment contained in that Act, but subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 and the Debtors Act 1869, such proceedings should be prosecuted as if the repealing Act had not passed. The proceedings under this bankruptcy were in no sense proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, except so far as they had under the powers conferred by that Act been transferred by the Lord Chancellor's order to the County Court. His Lordship was of opinion that an order made by a County Court judge in a bankruptcy commenced under the Act of 1861, and transferred to him under the provisions of the Act of 1869 that he might wind it up, was not an order made in pursuance of the Act of 1869 within the meaning of sect. 71 of that Act. The appeal was therefore properly brought to this court; and another reason for so holding was, that otherwise the thirty days within which an appeal in relation to an order of discharge might have been brought would have been cut down to twenty-one days.

The arguments on the merits were then heard, the result being that the appeal was allowed, and an unconditional order of discharge granted to the bankrupt.

Bankruptcy — Petitioning creditor's debt — Creditor proving his debt under an adjudication, and after petitioning for another adjudication against the bankrupt — Transfer of proceedings from one court to another — The B. A. 1869, s. 80, c. 3.

There is no reason why a creditor who has proved his debt in an adjudication of bankruptcy against his debtor, should not afterwards himself petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor in respect of the same debt.

The 3rd clause of sect. 80 of the B. A. 1869, which gives power to the London Court of Bankruptcy, where proceedings against the debtor are instituted in more courts than one, upon the application of any creditor to direct the transfer of such proceedings to the London Court of Bankruptcy, or to any local bankruptcy court, applies to a case where proceedings have been commenced before the Act came into operation.

Mr. John Frederick Wieland, a bankrupt, appealed from two orders made by the Chief Judge in bankruptcy. The first order appealed from was made on the 22nd Feb. 1870, and confirmed an adjudication of bankruptcy against Wieland which had been made on the petition of the official liquidator of the National Savings' Bank Association (Limited). This adjudication was objected to on the ground that Wieland had been on the 24th Dec. 1869, adjudicated bankrupt in the County Court at Lewes, on his own petition, and that the liquidator had proved his debt under that adjudication. The second order appealed from was made on the application of the liquidator on the 1st March 1870, and it directed that the bankruptcy in the County Court, and all the proceedings thereunder, should be transferred to the London Court of Bankruptcy.

On the 18th March 1869, the liquidator had commenced an action at law against Wieland, to recover an alleged debt due from him. This action was afterwards referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator, on the 1st Nov. 1869, made his award, and thereby found that 7730*l.* was due to the plaintiff from Wieland, and also the sum of 117*l.* for costs. On the 11th Dec. 1869 another action was commenced against Wieland by a Mr. Scott, who had been formerly his family solicitor, to recover 95*l.* due for costs. On the 18th Dec. 1869, Wieland executed a bill of sale assigning to his brother all his furniture to secure an antecedent debt of 150*l.*

This bill of sale was registered on the 22nd Dec. 1869. On the next day Wieland, who had formerly resided in London, but who had then for some little time been living at Brighton, was on his way from there to Lewes; and at Bramber he was arrested at the instance of Scott, who, in default of appearance by Wieland in Scott's action, had, on the 22nd Dec., signed judgment against him for the 95*l.* and costs, and had issued a writ of ca. sa. Wieland was lodged under this writ in the Lewes gaol, and on the next day, the 24th Dec., he presented a petition in formâ pauperis in the Lewes County Court, for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, and he was the same day adjudged a bankrupt; and he was on that day also released from custody, Scott having signed a written waiver of his right to notice of Wieland's intention to apply for his release. Under this adjudication the liquidator proved his debt, and was appointed creditors' assignee. On the 27th Jan. 1870 he presented a petition in the London Court of Bankruptcy for an adjudication of bankruptcy against Wieland, founding his petition upon the same debt, and under this petition the orders already mentioned were made by the Chief Judge.

Robertson Griffiths, for the appellant, contended that as the liquidator had proved his debt under the first adjudication, he had elected in favour of that proceeding, and his debt could not afterwards support another adjudication. He also urged that the Chief Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order transferring the proceedings, inasmuch as sect. 80, clause 3, of Bankruptcy Act 1869, applied only to proceedings commenced after the Act came into operation. He cited

Ex parte Chambers, 2 Mont. & Ayr. 440.

Ex parte Diack, Ib. 675.

Ex parte Flower, 1 De G. 503.

De Gex, Q. C. and Ernest Reed, for the liquidator, with regard to the first point, contended that proof was merely an election to proceed in bankruptcy, but not in favour of a particular adjudication. Proceedings under one adjudication had often been stayed for the purpose of enabling a creditor to present a petition, so as to set aside some transactions of the bankrupt which could not be reached under an adjudication obtained on his own petition. On the second point they urged that sect. 80, clause 3, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 gave the Chief Judge jurisdiction to make the order transferring the proceedings to the London court. They cited

Ex parte Roberts, 3 De G. F. & J. 747;

Spencer v. Demett, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 123; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677.

Robertson Griffiths in reply.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that there was no ground whatever for the appeal. The fact that the liquidator had proved his debt under the first adjudication could not prevent him from afterwards himself presenting a petition for adjudication founded on the same debt. Ex parte Taylor was a clear authority in favour of what had been done by the Chief Judge in the present case. With regard to the order transferring the proceedings, his Lordship was of opinion that sect. 80, clause 3, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 applied to proceedings commenced before the Act came into operation as well as those commenced after it came into operation. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

GUEST v. SMYTHE.

Sale by court—Confirmation—Purchase by solicitor of party interested in the sale—Setting aside sale after confirmation.

In a foreclosure suit an order was made for the sale of the property. The property was purchased by a solicitor, whose name appeared at the foot of the particulars of sale as one of the persons from whom copies of the particulars and other information might be obtained, and who had acted as solicitor for one of the persons interested in the sale.

The sale was confirmed by the chief clerk:

Held, that, notwithstanding the confirmation, the property must be resold, being put up at the price at which the solicitor purchased, who, if there should be no advance, must be held to his purchase.

Lister v. Lister, 6 Ves. 631, followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by persons claiming under a mortgagor to set aside a sale by the court on the ground that the purchaser had acted as solicitor for one of the parties interested in the sale.

The suit was instituted by Guest, the sub-mortgagee of certain real estate, against the representatives of one Smythe, the mortgagee who had sub-mortgaged the property to Guest, and the representatives of one Piddocke, the original mortgagor of the property. The bill prayed for foreclosure or sale, and by the decree it was ordered that the property should be sold. Before the suit came to a hearing the plaintiff died, and the suit was revived by his representatives. Certain suits were instituted by various creditors for the administration of the estate of Guest, the original plaintiff in the present suit, and in one of those suits a Mr. Wright had acted as solicitor for the plaintiff.

The property was, in pursuance of the decree, put up for sale in July 1869. The name of Mr. Wright appeared at the foot of the particulars of sale as one of the solicitors from whom copies and other information might be obtained. There was a reserved bidding of 5600*l.* put on the property, and it was bought by Mr. Wright for the sum of 6100*l.*

On the 4th Aug. 1869, the sale was confirmed before Mr. Hawkins, the chief clerk.

The present application to set aside the sale was made by the representatives of the original mortgagor, who stated that certain circumstances rendered the property, which was reversionary, more valuable than appeared from the particulars of sale.

Southgate, Q. C., Speed, and Simmons, for the applicants, submitted that Mr. Wright's position as solicitor for parties interested in the sale incapacitated him from becoming a purchaser without the leave of the court, and that, therefore, the sale ought to be set aside.

Jessel, Q. C. and Bugshawe, for Mr. Wright, contended that the sale, having been confirmed, could not be set aside unless it was proved to have been fraudulent. This was proved by the authorities as the confirmation of the master's report under the old practice corresponded to confirmation of the sale under the new system. They cited

Lord ROMILLY: Mr. Southgate, I should like to consider this a little before I dispose of the case finally, but I will state now what I consider to be the principles affecting cases of this description. I should like however, to speak to Mr. Hawkins before I finally dispose of it. I do not think the form of your summons is right, and I am not at all clear whether the form of the summons ought not merely to have been to direct a new sale and nothing more, leaving the court to determine what should be done afterwards with the case. But I do not consider that the confirmation of the sale affects the question, unless there has been a great lapse of time and acquiescence. I consider the principle which governs the question to be that which was laid down by Sir John Leach in the case of Grover v. Hugell 3 Russ. 428: The question is this, was it the duty of the solicitor to give his aid to the procuring of the best possible price? That is the question, for if it was his duty to do so, then he could not buy. There are various authorities; there is another case of Re Bloye's Trust, 1 Mac. & G. 488, in which it is expressly laid down that the solicitor who conducts the sale cannot become the purchaser without giving full explanation to the vendor and informing him that he (the solicitor) is to become the purchaser on his own account; and in the course of that case Lord Cottenham refers to what Lord Eldon says: "How can a man, who cannot buy himself, give another person authority to buy?" Therefore, I think that the question which I have to consider is, first, what was the position of Mr. Wright? I should be glad to be set right if I mistake his position, but, as I understand, he was the solicitor of certain creditors of the mortgagee and in that character was employed to take steps for the purpose of intervening in the suit and having some management in the suit, for which purpose he obtained an order though not until the day after the sale, or a day or two after the sale. That, however, was his character; he therefore was representing the creditors in the cause. It was clearly a sale on behalf of mortgagees, and on behalf of the persons interested in the mortgage. It was for the purpose of all the creditors, therefore, and they were as much interested in it being a good sale in order that it might be sufficient to pay them as any other person, and Mr. Wright was their solicitor, and only their solicitor. Now they could not have appointed a person to purchase the property—without the leave of the court of course I mean; they could not in their character of creditors have appointed a person to buy. I understand that Mr. Wright obtained leave to intervene on behalf of the creditors. From that time I should consider that the creditors were parties to the suit, and that when Mr. Wright's name was added as one of the solicitors for the vendor, he was to act on their behalf, and to make the sale as effective as it could be for them. Well, that being his character, I do not think he was in a situation in which he was entitled to buy. The case of Grover v. Hugell (sup.) was a very peculiar case. A person entered into an agreement for the purchase of land, formerly part of the glebe of a rectory, and which had been sold for the redemption of the land tax. He was not bound to complete the purchase, because it appeared that the rector himself had been the actual purchaser in the name of the curate. I do not think that the fact of it being in the name of the curate was anything. What Sir John Leach says is this: "The general rule in equity is, that a man cannot place himself in a situation in which his interest conflicts with his duty. The duty of the rector was to obtain the best possible price for the land sold, and his interest as purchaser was to pay the least possible price for it. It is no answer to say that the superintendence of the commissioners would secure a full price. The sale is to be by public auction and before two of the commissioners or some person appointed by them, and their approbation of the sale is required by the Act. But still the duty of the rector was to give his aid to the procuring of the best possible price." I consider that every one of those observations applies on the present occasion; it was the duty of Mr. Wright to give all his assistance to the obtaining of the best possible price, and his name was put upon the list as one of the solicitors for that purpose. I do not assent to the observation which was made by Mr. Swanston, that where the name of an hotel keeper is inserted in the particulars with reference to the hotel where the sale was to take place, that the mere fact of the name appearing upon the particulars of sale would prevent that person from buying. When it is stated that information is to be obtained from solicitors it is assumed that they are the solicitors for the persons interested in the sale, interested in obtaining the highest possible price that can be obtained for the property; and I am of opinion that Mr. Wright's duty was, on behalf of the creditors, to obtain the highest possible price and to do everything for that purpose, and that in that situation he was not competent to buy. This is my present impression, but I will look further into the matter, and consult Mr. Hawkins, but that is the view I take of the case, and that is the view taken of the principle by Lord Langdale in the case of Greenlaw v. King, 3 Beav. 49, in which he points out the principles upon which the question rests. I agree in the observation made by Mr. Jessel that it is a question of great importance; it is a question whether a person whose duty it is to obtain the highest possible price he can for the property sold can become the purchaser of the property, and though there is no evidence upon the subject, observe what might in many cases be the effect of this, that upon seeing the person bid whose name appeared as one of the solicitors for the vendors, people might suppose that the property was bought in, and that it was not an effectual sale. I am, therefore, disposed to think that the proper order will be to direct a new sale of the property, but in that case it is clear that I ought to give leave to amend the summons or to take out another summons for that purpose. I am not at all clear that Mr. Jessel's client will not be entitled to be heard upon that point, but I will consult Mr. Hawkins about it. If the matter is carried further, which is very probable as it is a case of very considerable importance, I will put it in such a form that every facility shall be open for anything which you may wish to do.

GUEST v. SMYTHE.

March 17.—Lord ROMILLY.—I have spoken to Mr. Hawkins about this case, and I am confirmed in the decision which I gave the other day. Mr. Hawkins tells me that when he was asked to confirm the sale his attention was not pointedly called to the fact that Mr. Wright was in fact the solicitor of the mortgagee's creditors, who were interested in the matter, and that his name was upon the particulars of sale; and Mr. Hawkins tells me that if he had known such to be the case he should not have confirmed the sale.

As to the form of the order, Southgate, Q. C., referred to Lister v. Lister, 6 Ves. 631, a suit to set aside a sale, in which Sir William Grant says: "The rule is a rule of general policy, to prevent the possibility of fraud and abuse; for it may not always be possible to know whether the property was undersold. I was not aware that the Lord Chancellor had laid down a general rule as to the terms; that the property should be set up again at the risk of the trustee. It is a very important consideration whether that is to be taken as a general rule. If it is, I must adhere to it; but if it turns upon special circumstances, I see no special circumstances in this case. These lots must be resold, at all events. The only question is, whether they shall be put up at the price at which the trustees purchased." On a subsequent day Sir

RICHARDS v. FRENCH.

[V.C. S.]

William Grant said that he had mentioned the matter to the Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon), who stated that he meant to lay down a general rule, and that he understood that it had been so established in Lord Thurlow's time.

Lord ROMILLY.—I shall follow that rule exactly. The property must be put up at the price at which Mr. Wright purchased, and if there is no advance in the price he will be held to his purchase. I give Mr. Wright liberty to bid only in the event of his bonâ fide ceasing to be solicitor for the creditors or any party interested in the sale.

RICHARDS v. FRENCH.

Solicitor and client—Brother-in-law and sister-in-law—Confidential relationship—Assignments in favour of solicitor—Bill to set aside dismissed.

In order to bring a case within the rule that a solicitor can receive no gift or reward from his client, there must be clear and unequivocal evidence of the relationship between the parties, that advantage was taken of that relationship; and that what was given was a reward to the solicitor for his services.

Where, therefore, a bill was filed by the legal personal representative of a lady to set aside certain deeds executed by her in favour of her brother-in-law (a solicitor), and it appeared that he had never done or charged for anything in the course of the transactions as her solicitor; that he had, when necessary, resorted to other professional advice on her behalf, and that he had exercised no undue influence over her:

Held, that the relationship between the parties was not sufficient to invalidate the deeds, and that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

This bill was filed for the purpose of setting aside certain indentures executed by and between a Miss Elizabeth Harrison and the defendant, a solicitor, under these circumstances.

John Harrison, the elder, by his will, dated 30th June 1834, left the whole of his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same, and to invest the proceeds thereof, and, after payment thereof of a certain annuity, to divide the residue equally between all of his children who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one, or who, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under it; and the testator directed that the share of each daughter should be held by his trustees upon trust for such daughter during her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her death for her children, as therein mentioned, and in default of children, then as she should by will appoint, and, until sale, the rents and profits were to go in the same manner as was directed with regard to the proceeds of sale and conversion.

John Harrison the elder died in Dec. 1857, leaving four children, viz., John Harrison the younger, who acted as executor under the will, William Harrison, Mary Harrison, and Elizabeth Harrison, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one.

After the death of the testator his family lived together until 1854, when John Harrison the younger left them and married. In April, 1854 the defendant married Mary Harrison. At the time of the marriage the defendant was practising as a solicitor at Stamford, but as his wife did not wish to be entirely separated from her family it was arranged that she and her husband should spend half the year at her brother's and sister's house in London and that they in return should spend the other half at the defendant's house at Stamford. This arrangement was continued until Aug. 1859, when William Harrison dying the house in London was given up, and Elizabeth Harrison went to reside altogether at the defendant's house at Stamford, paying her share towards the household expenses.

In 1861 John Harrison, the younger, died. It appeared that although he had acted as trustee of his father's will up to the time of his death, he had never sold the residuary real estate, or rendered any accounts to his sisters of their share of the property, but had merely paid to them from time to time money on account. He had, however, settled all accounts in respect of his sister Mary Harrison's share, up to the time of her marriage; but subsequently his payments fell considerably into arrear; those which were made were (subject to a few trifling deductions) always handed over to the defendant by his wife. At the time of his death the arrears of the income accruing on his sisters' shares of the property, amounted, as to the defendant's wife's share, to 205*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, and as to Miss Harrison's share, to 247*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*

The defendant's wife died in April 1862. By her will, dated in Sept. 1861, she gave all the property under her marriage settlement and father's will, which she was entitled to dispose of to trustees (whom she also appointed her executors) upon trust, after payment of three legacies of 500*l.*, for Miss Harrison absolutely. The above-mentioned arrears of income not having been paid to the testatrix during her lifetime, passed by her will to her sister, Miss Harrison, but it appeared that it was the wish of the testatrix that the amount of such arrears should be paid to the defendant, and that Miss Harrison was aware of this wish, and was desirous of giving effect to it. One of the executors of the testatrix's will having died, and the other having refused to act, Miss Harrison determined to take out letters of administration to the estate; and for that purpose was, at her own request, introduced by the defendant to a proctor, who had been employed by the defendant on previous occasions, and who undertook the business of obtaining the grant of administration.

The personal estate was sworn under 12,000*l.*, and it became necessary to procure two sureties to an administration bond of 24,000*l.* At this time an agreement was made between the defendant and Miss Harrison, whereby the defendant undertook the risk of being one of the sureties of this bond, and also to find a co-surety; Miss Harrison, on her part, agreeing to carry out the wishes of her sister (the defendant's wife) with reference to the sum of 205*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* This agreement, which was reduced into writing by the defendant, and signed by him and also by Miss Harrison, was dated the 12th June 1862, and Miss Harrison thereby agreed to invest three several sums of 500*l.* Consols each, to provide for the contingent legacies given by will of defendant's wife, and also that the defendant "should be entitled to receive and should receive accordingly, the debt composing the balance of the dividends and proceeds due from John Harrison the younger, and arising from the estate of John Harrison the elder, from 25th April 1854 to 1st April 1862, to the defendant's wife, agreeably to her intention and wish. . . . And in consideration thereof the defendant agreed to join in the bond for 24,000*l.* to be given by Miss Harrison on her taking out letters of administration to the effects of the defendant's wife with her will annexed, and the defendant further agreed to procure a second surety to join in the said bond, to the satisfaction of the Court of Probate." Before signing this agreement Miss Harrison had no independent advice, but (as alleged by the defendant) she thoroughly understood what she was doing. Eleanor Harrison, as the personal representative of her husband (the trustee), not wishing to pay over the said sums of 205*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* and 2473*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* (4525*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*) to Miss Harrison, in cash, an agreement was made between these parties, dated 14th May 1863, whereby a share (one third) of certain leaseholds to which Eleanor Harrison as such personal representative, was entitled, should be sold to Miss Harrison for 4190*l.*, which sum was to be set-off pro tanto against the 4525*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* This was carried out, and the balance (335*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*) was paid the same day to Miss Harrison.

Contemporaneously with this agreement, and as part of one and the same arrangement, by an agreement bearing even date, and made between Miss Harrison of the one part and the defendant of the other part, after reciting (among other things) the above-mentioned agreements, and the amounts due from the estate of John Harrison the younger, in respect of the said arrears of income, Miss Harrison agreed to assign half of the one-third, so that the same one-third might be held by Miss Harrison and the defendant, as tenants in common, in the proportions therein mentioned, and the defendant also thereby agreed to allow Miss Harrison, to retain out of the 205*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, one-half part of the amount paid or allowed to Eleanor Harrison as the price of the said one-third, but that Miss Harrison should not require, the defendant to contribute any sum to the purchase aforesaid, beyond the sum of 205*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* This transaction was completed by two indentures of assignment, dated the 2nd July, 1863, and made between Miss Harrison of the one part and the defendant of the other part, each of them being expressed to be made in consideration of the defendant having, at the request of Miss Harrison, joined in a bond for 24,000*l.*, given by her on her taking out letters of administration to the effects of the defendant's wife, and having procured another surety to join in the said bond.

These deeds were prepared by the defendant's conveyancing counsel on verbal instructions given by the defendant (but as he alleged with the full consent of Miss Harrison), and were explained to her before execution by a Mr. Fraser, a solicitor, who it appeared had acted as the defendant's London agent on some occasions when he practised in the country; but the defendant stated that though this was the case, yet it was at Miss Harrison's special request that Mr. Fraser acted for her in this, as he had done in the year 1860, and that Mr. Fraser was considered by her to be, and in fact was, her solicitor both on this and on a subsequent occasion.

In Feb. 1863, the defendant and Miss Harrison entered into an agreement for the purchase of the lease of a house at Tulse-hill. It was arranged that the purchase-money (2500*l.*) should be paid in equal shares, and the property be so conveyed as to go to the use of the defendant and Miss Harrison during their joint lives, and after the death of either of them to the survivor during his or her life, and subsequent thereto to the defendant and Miss Harrison absolutely in equal shares as tenants in common.

At the time of the purchase, Miss Harrison was forty-five, and the defendant sixty-two, and it appeared that the counsel who prepared the draft conveyance introduced a clause into it to the effect that the property was to vest solely in the defendant in the event of Miss Harrison's marrying. The defendant and Miss Harrison, however, being desirous (as was alleged) that there should be an entire equality as regarded both of them in the provisions, signed a memorandum to the effect that they desired that the clause should attach equally to the event of the defendant's marrying again, and the draft was altered accordingly.

It was alleged by the plaintiff that Miss Harrison was in a very weak state of health, and that her life in fact was uninsurable at the time of this transaction. This, however was denied by the defendant.

Miss Harrison died in April 1865.

The plaintiff, who was her legal personal representative, filed this bill in pursuance of an order of the Lords Justices to that effect, praying that it might be declared that the agreements of the 12th June 1862, and 14th May 1863, and the two indentures of the 2nd July 1863 were fraudulent and void as against Miss Harrison, and that the same might be delivered up to be cancelled, and that it might be declared that the assignment of the house at Tulse-hill was procured to be made by the fraud and undue influence of the defendant, and that he might be declared a trustee of a moiety thereof, with consequential relief.

The grounds on which the deeds were sought to be set aside were, that the defendant had acted as Miss Harrison's solicitor in the transactions in question; that he had taken an improper advantage of the relationship towards her, and had otherwise exercised over her an undue influence.

The evidence on both sides was very voluminous and conflicting. That on the part of the defendant was to the effect that he had not acted in the transactions as Miss Harrison's solicitor, but simply in his capacity of brother-in-law. That he had never made out any bills of costs, or charged for his services, and that on all occasions when it had been necessary other professional advice and assistance had been called in. That Miss Harrison, up to the time of her death, had always treated the transactions as binding on her in every way, and that on nearly every quarter-day a settlement of account was come to between her and the defendant.

Greene, Q. C., Hardy, Q. C., and Hemming, for the plaintiff, contended that the relationship of solicitor and client subsisted between the defendant and Miss Harrison at the time of the transactions in question. The defendant had taken advantage of his position to induce her to execute the deeds, and that being so no subsequent acquiescence on her part could avail anything: (Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. 120.) At all events, the onus of proving, by independent testimony, that she was fully aware of the nature of the transactions, and that no advantage was taken, devolved upon the defendant:

Rhodes v. Bate, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 252; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 778;

O'Brien v. Lewis, 4 Giff. 221;

Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Vos. 266;

Walker v. Smith, 29 Beav. 394.

She was under no special obligation to the defendant, and there was nothing to prove that she was conscious of any such feeling. In fact, the deeds themselves went to show that the transaction was strictly regarded as one of bargain and sale, and it was not open to the defendant to contend for a different consideration than the one expressed:

Tomson v. Judge, 3 Drew. 306;

Gibson v. Russell, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 104.

It could not be said that the defendant incurred any substantial risk by becoming surety on the administration bond; the utmost he could be called upon to pay was 15,000*l.*, and on a mere pretence that he was liable for that sum, he got the benefit of more than 2000*l.* The relationship between the parties was in itself sufficient to invalidate the transactions: (Dent v. Bennett, 4 My. & Cr. 269); but it was an additional element in the plaintiff's case that Miss Harrison was in a weak state of health, and that the management of her affairs was left almost entirely to the defendant. As to the fact of the defendant's calling in other professional advice on different occasions, it amounted to nothing, for the gentleman so employed was his own friend, and, of course, might reasonably be expected to arrange matters with a regard to his interest. Upon the whole case, taking into consideration the relationship of the parties, the inference that improper advantage had been taken, and undue influence exercised by the defendant, and the absence of any evidence on his part to rebut that inference, the plaintiff was fully entitled to a decree in the terms of the prayer of his bill.

Dickinson, Q. C. and B. B. Rogers, for the defendant, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The object of this suit is to set aside two transactions by which the defendant has obtained a benefit to himself, purporting to be conferred on him by Miss Elizabeth Harrison, his sister-in-law. The relief is sought on the ground that the defendant is a solicitor; that he acted as such, and lived on terms of great intimacy with Miss Harrison during the transaction in question; and that the relationship which subsisted between the parties, if it did not amount to incapacitating him from taking the gift or bounty, at any rate cast upon him the duty of showing that there was no pressure or undue advantage exercised by him upon his sister-in-law. In Montesquieu v. Sandys, 18 Ves. 312, Lord Eldon, in stating the law on the subject, says, "The courts have wisely established the principle that an attorney shall not take from his client a gift or reward while standing in that relation, the connection between them subsisting with the influence attending it, though the transaction may be as right as was ever carried on." Lord Eldon clearly thought that the righteousness of the transaction did not remove the infirmity inherent in the relation of the parties to each other, and he goes on to show that the same rule applies to cases of guardian and ward, medical man and patient, and others which he mentioned. But in order to bring the case within this principle, there must be clear and unequivocal evidence of the facts of the relationship, of circumstances showing that an advantage was taken of that position, and that what was given to the solicitor was given as a reward for his services. Lord Eldon, in pointing out how necessary it is to look at all the surrounding circumstances, says, at page 308 of the report I have just referred to, "Cases of this description, more than any other, impose upon the court the direct duty of giving the most accurate attention to the real circumstances, the relief being required sometimes upon misconduct and fraud, bearing particularly hard upon moral character; in other circumstances not upon such grounds, but on that degree of negligence in the performance of duty which is sufficient to defeat transactions arising out of that negligence." The facts of the present case are very peculiar. The defendant by an agreement entered into between him and Miss Harrison, in June 1862, and which agreement was afterwards embodied in several deeds, acquired a right to certain property which, but for an accident would have sooner passed into his own possession. As to the question whether it was a bounty or reward for his services, it was not a bounty except so far as this, that Miss Harrison was not bound to give the property up to him. The relationship between Miss Harrison and him was no doubt a delicate one. They both lived in the same house, and had done so during the life of the defendant's wife. But it is impossible, on the evidence in the case to say that the defendant acted as Miss Harrison's professional adviser. He gave his advice more in the character of her brother-in-law. He never did anything, and never charged for anything as her attorney, or solicitor, though he was an attorney, and when it was necessary to resort to professional advice for her, he called in the intervention of another professional man, a Mr. Fraser. As to that it has been contended that Miss Harrison only knew that gentleman through the defendant, that he was the defendant's friend, and was introduced by the defendant for his own purposes. The evidence, however, and the comments of the plaintiff's counsel upon it, have entirely failed to support any such contention, or to prove that in these transactions any improper or undue influence was exercised by the defendant on Miss Harrison, or that anything was done by him to interfere with the unfettered action of Mr. Fraser as her professional adviser. Another peculiarity is with respect to the deeds themselves. They state nothing of any bounty, or any moral obligation on the part of Miss Harrison, or of the motive for her execution of them; they show that the defendant had executed an administration bond for 24,000*l.*, as surety for Miss Harrison, who was her sister's legal personal representative; and that in consideration of the liability so incurred by him she consented to give up to him the property in question. But that property represented considerable arrears of his late wife's income due to her in respect of funds settled to her separate use. Those arrears would have been long before in the defendant's hands, had not the conduct of Miss Harrison's brother prevented their being paid to her in her lifetime. That property, however, the defendant's wife had told him he should have after her death, and it was perfectly natural on the part of her sister to say that the property should go as it would have done but for their brother's misconduct. The evidence shows that it was a natural and spontaneous act on the part of Miss Harrison; but, even if it were done partly in consideration of the defendant's liability as her surety, the double motive is not inconsistent with probability and reason. Then, again, it is of great importance to observe that the defendant did nothing secretly—indeed, from the very nature of the case, and the character of the property, there could be no concealment in the transactions. The case, therefore, of Dent v. Bennett (sup.), which has been referred to in the argument, has no application to the present, for there Lord Cottenham set aside a gift by a patient to his medical man, not only on account of the relation between the parties, but on the grounds of improper concealment of the circumstances under which the gift had been made. As to the transaction relating to the house in Tulse-hill, I see no reason why the defendant and Miss Harrison should not have entered into a joint purchase. It was arranged between them that the survivor should enjoy the use of the house for his or her life, and it has been contended that as Miss Harrison was, at the time, in an infirm state of health, an improper advantage was taken by this mode of conveyance. Miss Harrison, however, appears to have been very well able to take care of her own interests, for, during the preparation of the conveyance, when it was suggested that a clause should be introduced to the effect that if she married she should cease to have the right of using this house, a memorandum was signed at her request by the defendant and herself, stating that they wished the clause equally to apply to the event of the defendant's marrying again. The draft conveyance was altered accordingly. This, coupled with the fact that Miss Harrison was in the habit of examining her accounts and settling her affairs regularly every three months, conveys the impression that this lady was a person of acute and business-like habits, and renders it highly improbable that any advantage could have been taken of her. The evidence certainly goes to prove that she was in a weak state of health at the time of the transaction, but opposed to this is the fact that the defendant was seventeen years her senior. Upon the whole case, therefore, looking at the subject-matter of the transactions, the relation between the parties, and all other circumstances, I am of opinion that no undue influence has been exercised by the defendant upon his sister-in-law; and that the relationship which subsisted between them was in no wise such as to invalidate the transaction in question. The plaintiff, as the legal personal representative of Miss Harrison, has only done his duty in filing the bill in this suit; but it must, nevertheless, be dismissed, with costs.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, March 2.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF LEEDS.

Nuisance—Local Act—Power under, limited by public Act—Convenience of majority—Injunction.

A corporation, under the powers conferred upon them by a local Act, constructed sewers having their outfall into a river, whereby a nuisance was created, and the persons living in the neighbourhood of the river below the town thereby injured:

Held, that the general sections of the Towns Improvement Act relating to nuisances must be considered as incorporated with the local Act, and that therefore an injunction must be granted to restrain the corporation from exercising their powers in such a manner as to create a nuisance.

Where it is shown that the granting of an injunction would be injurious to a greater number of persons than the refusing it:

Held, that the court will not interfere with the discretion of the Attorney-General as to the convenience or inconvenience of the parties.

This was an information filed at the relation of persons residing by the banks of the river Aire, below Leeds, against the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Leeds, for the purpose of restraining the defendants from polluting the river Aire by causing the sewage of the town to be discharged into that river before it had been sufficiently purified.

In 1848 an Act of Parliament was obtained by the corporation, called the Leeds Improvement Amendment Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 11), by the 3rd section of which Act it was provided that such of the clauses of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, as related to the making and maintaining the public sewers, and to the drainage of houses, "shall be incorporated with this Act, and such clauses, except so far as they, or any of them, are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, or are expressly varied or excepted by this Act shall form part thereof."

The 6th and 7th sections were as follow:

6. And be it enacted that the several townships of Leeds, Hunslet, and Holbeck, in the borough of Leeds, shall be one drainage district, and it shall be lawful for the council to construct one main trunk and other sewer or sewers, sufficiently capacious to receive the foul and drainage water and filth of all the said three townships, and to convey the same into the river Aire.

7. And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the council to unite the several other townships within the borough, or so much and such parts thereof respectively, as the council shall think fit, into one or more drainage district or districts, and to construct one or more main trunk or other sewer or sewers, for the purpose of receiving the foul and drainage water and filth of each such district.

Under the powers conferred by this Act, the corporation constructed sewers having their outfall into the river Aire, and they were still constructing more sewers having their outfall into the same river, the effect of which was to make the river no better than an open sewer.

The defendants did not deny that there was a nuisance, but contended that they were acting within the powers conferred on them by the 6th and 7th sections of the Leeds Improvement Amendment Act.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., E. E. Kay, Q. C., and C. Hall appeared for the information.

G. Jessell, Q. C., E. Fry, Q. C., Graham Hastings, and S. Tennant were for the defendants.

On behalf of the information it was contended that these sections must be read in connection with the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, the 24th section of which provides that sewers shall be made, "but so that the same shall in no case become a nuisance." And the 107th section provides as follows:

Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to render lawful any act or omission on the part of any person which is, or but for this Act would be deemed to be, a nuisance at common law, nor to exempt any person guilty of nuisance at common law, from prosecution or action in respect thereof according to the forms of proceeding at common law, nor from the consequences of being convicted thereof.

For the defendants it was contended that the express powers given by the 6th section of the Leeds Improvement Amendment Act was not limited by the general provisions of the Towns Improvement Act. The 107th section of which latter Act not being one included under the sub-heading, "With respect to the making of sewers," was not incorporated in the private Act by the 3rd section of which it is enacted that "such of the clauses in the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 as relate to the making and maintaining the public sewers, and to the drainage of houses shall be incorporated with this Act, and such clauses, except so far as they or any of them are inconsistent with the provision of this Act, or are expressly varied or excepted by this Act, shall form part thereof."

It was further contended that the provisions contained in the 24th section of the Act of 1847, that sewers were in no case to become a nuisance were inconsistent with the powers conferred by the 6th section of the Act of 1848, and were, therefore, not incorporated in it. And when a public body was empowered by Parliament to carry out certain works, everything incident to those works, even to the extent of creating a nuisance, was authorised unless there are special words to restrain them; and that there would be greater injury caused to the public health if the injunction was granted than if it was refused; if it was granted, the present sewer arrangements in the town would have to be stopped, which would be most injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the borough, the population of which was about 250,000, whereas the only persons injured by the present arrangements were a few persons who lived on the banks of the river. The court ought, therefore, to have regard to the balance of convenience or inconvenience, and not to endanger the health of so large a population as that of the town of Leeds for the sake of affording relief to the few persons who at present may suffer inconvenience from the alleged nuisance.

On behalf of the information, evidence was given of certain resolutions passed at a public meeting held in Leeds on the 27th Aug. 1869, at which the principal residents and proprietors of lands in the district through which the river Aire flowed were present, and at which meeting it was resolved, "That the pollution of the river Aire below Leeds, occasioned by the discharge of offensive matter from the sewage works of the Leeds corporation, has recently increased so rapidly, and has now become so serious, that the health of the inhabitants throughout the valley is seriously affected, and during the summer months it is unsafe to reside on its banks; and that the water itself has become so impure as to be totally unfit for cattle and destructive to fish."

The following cases were cited in the course of argument by counsel.

Cator v. Lewisham Board of Works, 5 B. & S. 115; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 235;

The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Halifax, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 52; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 115;

Hammersmith Railway v. Brand, L. Rep. 4 H. L. 171; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238;

Bolton v. Crowther, 2 B. & C. 703;

Attorney-General v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1 H. & M. 298;

Reg. v. Pease, 4 B. & Ad. 30;

Attorney-General v. Council of Borough of Birmingham, 4 K & J. 528.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, without hearing a reply, said:—I am of opinion that the case raised by the information is fully made out. It was scarcely denied by the defendants that a nuisance of a most offensive description, and one dangerous to health had been produced by the drainage operations of the defendants, who seem to have been under the same delusion as the corporations of several other large towns in England in supposing that the sewage of a large town could be turned into a river without thereby producing a nuisance. The resolution passed at the meeting held on the 27th Aug. 1869, at which the residents and proprietors of land in the neighbourhood of the river were present, was supported by the direct testimony of persons whose health had suffered in consequence of the unwholesome state of the river. The existence of this nuisance having been fully proved, the question then arises as to whether the corporation of Leeds had obtained by their Act of 1848 the privilege of draining into the river Aire, without regard to any nuisance which might be produced thereby, a privilege which, as far as I am aware, has not been granted to any town in England. It has been contended that the provisions of an Act of Parliament must be strictly interpreted, and that being so interpreted, the Special Act of 1848 enabled the corporation to drain all the sewage of the borough into the river, and that the sections in the Towns Improvement Act, which provide against the creation of a common law nuisance, were not incorporated in the private Act of 1848, else it would render the 6th section of that Act nugatory. The Act of 1848 must, however, be considered as emanating from the corporation of Leeds, and one which they had persuaded Parliament to sanction, its provisions must therefore to some extent be construed strictly against them. I am, therefore, of opinion that the powers given by the special Act were given subject to the general provisions contained in the 24th and 107th sections of the general Act; nor by adopting this construction do I render nugatory and inoperative the permission given to the corporation to drain into the river Aire. The probability is that by that clause the Legislature merely intended to adopt the plans of the board for drainage, and to dispense with the provisions of the public Act, so far as they related to the submitting of their plans to the inspector and finally obtaining his sanction. The plan of emptying the sewage of the town into the river Aire, suggested by the corporation, was sanctioned by the Legislature; but it is too much to say that, because this sanction has been obtained, the sewage is therefore to be allowed to be poured into the river wholly irrespective of, and uncontrolled by, any considerations of nuisance to the inhabitants. If the Legislature had intended anything so monstrous, they should have expressed it distinctly. It has also been urged upon me that the Attorney-General is bound to consider the health of a populous town before that of a few persons residing on the banks of the river; that, although in the case of a private right which an individual seeks to have protected against an infraction of the law, the question would merely be, had he those rights? yet, when the question was one which arose between two portions of the community the convenience of the one may be set-off against the inconvenience suffered by the other, especially when the former are a much more numerous body than the latter. I do not think that I can interfere with the discretion of the Attorney-General when he sanctions an information to restrain a clear wrong. I do not think much weight can be attached to the argument as to the danger which may arise from the restraining of this nuisance. Means will be found of dealing with this sewage in a way which will not be prejudicial to the health of the inhabitants; but at the same time I will give them a reasonable time, as has been done in other cases, to make the necessary arrangements, and, if the corporation are making bonâ fide efforts to abate the nuisance, this time may be hereafter extended. The injunction will be in the same terms as that granted in July last against the corporation of Halifax—viz., an immediate injunction against opening any further communications with the existing outfall, and an injunction from and after the last day of the session 1871 (so as to give the defendants time to apply to Parliament for the necessary powers to enable them to purify and deodorise the sewage) against pouring out sewage by the present outfalls in an unpurified state.

seller, unless introduced by some person known to the seller;" but none of the provisions of the section are to apply to "any medicine supplied by a legally qualified apothecary to his patient, nor apply to any article when forming part of the ingredients of any medicine dispensed by a person registered under this Act; provided such medicine be labelled in manner aforesaid, with the name and address of the seller, and the ingredients thereof be entered, with the name of the person to whom it is sold or delivered, in a book to be kept by the seller for that purpose;" and the section imposes a penalty on offenders against its provisions.

A duly registered chemist having made up from a prescription signed with the initials of a legally qualified medical practitioner, and purporting to be for "Mrs. Newton," produced by a person unknown to him, and not introduced by anyone known to him, a mixture of rose water and hydrocyanic acid, which is prussic acid, one of the poisons mentioned in the first part of schedule A., gave the mixture to the person producing the prescription without labelling it with the name of the article and the word 'poison,' and entered in his prescription book the name "Mrs. Newton," believing that the prescription had been given to Mrs. Newton for a lotion by a duly qualified medical man:

Held, on appeal from a conviction of the chemist by magistrates for infringing the provisions of the above section, that the mixture of rosewater and hydrocyanic acid was a "medicine" within the meaning of the latter part of the section; that the entry of the name of Mrs. Newton was an entry of the name of the person to whom the mixture was "sold or delivered;" and that the prescription book in which the entry was made sufficiently satisfied the provision of the section as to the "book to be kept by the seller for the purpose."

Cases stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

FIRST CASE.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, Worthing, in and for the Worthing division of Bramber Rape, in the county of Sussex, on the 18th Aug. 1869, an information was preferred under sect. 17 of the Pharmacy Act 1868, by Leonard Baldwin Henderson, the respondent, an inspector of police, against Henry Berry, the appellant, pharmaceutical chemist, duly registered under the Pharmacy Act 1868, charging that the said Henry Berry, on the 11th Aug. 1869, at Worthing, in the parish of Broad Water, in the said county, did unlawfully sell a certain poison of those which are in the first part of the schedule A. to the Pharmacy Act 1868, to wit, prussic acid, to a certain person unknown to the seller, and not introduced by some person known to the seller, to wit, to one Ansell Johnson.

2. The following facts were proved or admitted:

3. On the 11th Aug. 1869 one Ansell Johnson being a person unknown to the appellant, and not introduced to the appellant by any person known to him, came into the shop of the appellant, the appellant and his assistant being there, and asked to have made up a prescription which was written in pencil, and was as follows:

Py. Acid, Hydrocyan. Scheel's, $\frac{1}{2}$ drachm.
Aq. Rosa, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz.
M. ft. Lotio.
Ter die applico.

R. M. L.

Mrs. Newton,

August 11, 1869.

The original of this prescription is to be taken to form part of this case.

4. The meaning of the name Mrs. Newton in the prescription, was that the prescription was for the use of Mrs. Newton. There is a legal qualified medical practitioner having the initials R. M. L.

5. The appellant's assistant dispensed the prescription by putting 2 drachms of hydrocyanic acid into a 2oz. bottle, and filling up the bottle with rose water according to the meaning of the prescription.

6. The appellant made the following entry in his prescription book:

Newton, Mrs.—P. Acid.
Hydrocyan. Schls. $\frac{1}{2}$ drachms.
Aq. Rosa ad. $\frac{1}{2}$ oz.
M. ft. Lotio.
Ter die applicand,

August 11.

R. M. L.

He also indorsed the entry by inserting the name "Newton," and the page in the index contained in the book.

7. The prescription book is a book in which the appellant enters all prescriptions he makes up. This book is to be taken to form part of this case.

8. Ansell Johnson paid the appellant's claim and took the bottle and its contents away.

9. The bottle was labelled as follows: "Caution. For external use. The lotion to be used three times a day. Mrs. Newton. H. Berry, Dispensing Chemist, Member of the Pharmaceutical Society, 58, Montague-street, Worthing." The bottle and the label thereon are to be taken to form part of this case.

10. Hydrocyanic acid (Scheel's) is prussic acid. The prescription is one that might be ordered for lotion. Rosewater by itself is not a medicine.

11. No evidence was given that there was or was not any such person as Mrs. Newton. Ansell Johnson, a witness for the prosecution, refused to answer the two questions. Did he buy it for Mrs. Newton? Did he buy it for himself? on the ground that by answering he might tend to criminate himself on a charge of attempting to commit suicide, on which he at the time stood remanded.

12. The Pharmacy Act, 1869, received the Royal assent on the day of the alleged offence.

13. The following points were raised on behalf of the appellant.

14. That the appellant had not sold prussic acid pure and simple, but a mixture or compound of prussic acid and rosewater. That that mixture was a medicine and the prussic acid sold formed an ingredient of that medicine, and was therefore within the exception contained in the 17th section of the Pharmacy Act, 1868.

15. That the name Mrs. Newton indicated the name of the person to whom the medicine was sold or delivered.

16. The following points were raised on behalf of the respondent.

17. That the thing sold was not a medicine but a poison partially diluted.

18. That the name Mrs. Newton entered by the appellant was not the name of the person to whom the article was sold and delivered, but only the name of a person for whose use it was alleged to be required.

19. That the book on which the entry was made was not a book kept for that purpose, inasmuch as it was kept for the purpose of keeping therein prescriptions of all sorts.

20. We adjourned the further consideration of the matter until the 26th Aug. 1869.

21. On the last mentioned day we convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 10s., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the respondent the sum of 1½ ls. for his cost in this behalf.

22. The appellant being dissatisfied with our decision, duly applied to us to state this case, and entered into a recognisance, as required by the first-mentioned Act.

23. The questions of law are:—

24. Whether a mixture of prussic acid and rosewater is a poison within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Pharmacy Act 1868, and of schedule A., part thereto.

Q. B.]

BERRY (app.) v. HENDERSON (resp.)

[Q. B.]

25. Whether a mixture of prussic acid and rose-water is a medicine within the meaning of the said sect. 17.

26. Whether, according to the facts before stated, the appellant complied with the requirement of the proviso at the end of the 17th sect. of the Pharmacy Act 1868.

27. Whether, according to the facts herein stated, the defendant had committed the offence with which he was charged.

SECOND CASE.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, Worthing, in and for the Worthing division of Bramber Rape, in the county of Sussex, on the 18th Aug. 1869, an information was preferred under sect. 17 of the Pharmacy Act 1868, by Leonard Baldwin Henderson, the respondent and inspector of police, against Henry Berry, the appellant, a pharmaceutical chemist duly registered under the Pharmacy Act 1868, charging that the said Henry Berry, on the 11th Aug. 1869, at Worthing, in the parish of Broadwater, in the said county, did unlawfully sell a certain poison, to wit prussic acid, by retail, the bottle in which such poison was contained not being labelled with the word "poison."

The following facts were proved or admitted. [The case then set out all the facts stated in the first case.]

The appellant had been convicted in respect of the same sale of selling poison to a person unknown to him.

The following points were raised on behalf of the appellant:—

That the appellant had not sold a poison within the meaning of the Pharmaceutical Act 1868, but that the appellant being a person registered under that Act had dispensed a medicine, and that the appellant had complied with the provisions of the Pharmacy Act 1868:

That if the appellant had sold a poison it was an article forming part of the ingredients of a medicine, and that the proviso forming the end of the said section had been complied with:

That the appellant could not have committed two offences by one Act, and that he could not therefore be convicted for this offence.

The following points were raised on behalf of the respondent:—

That the thing sold was not a medicine, but a poison partially diluted:

That the name "Mrs. Newton," entered by the appellant, was not the name of the person to whom the article was sold or delivered, but only the name of a person for whose use it was alleged to be required.

That the book in which the entry was made was not a book kept for the purpose, inasmuch as it was kept for the purpose of copying therein prescriptions of all sorts.

That if by one act two laws were broken, two punishments might follow.

We adjourned the further consideration of the matter until the 25th Aug. 1869.

On the last-mentioned day we convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 10s., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the respondent the sum of 1l. 1s. for his costs in this behalf.

The appellant, being dissatisfied with our decision, duly applied to us to state this case, and entered into a recognisance as required by the first-mentioned Act.

The questions of law are:—

Whether a mixture of prussic acid and rosewater is a poison within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Pharmacy Act 1868?

Whether a mixture of prussic acid and rose-water, when dispensed by a person registered under the Pharmacy Act 1868 is a medicine within the meaning of sect. 17 of that Act?

Whether, according to the facts before stated, the appellant complied with the requirements of the proviso at the end of the 17th section of the Pharmacy Act 1868?

Whether a man can be twice convicted for one act?

Whether, upon the facts herein stated, and the law applicable thereto, the appellant was properly convicted?

Given under our hands this 16th Nov. 1869, at Worthing, in the county aforesaid.

J. S. WARREN.

Sect. 17 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, enacts that:—

It shall be unlawful to sell any poison, either by wholesale or by retail, unless the box, bottle, vessel, wrapper, or cover in which such poison is contained, be distinctly labelled with the name of the article and the word poison, and with the name and address of the seller of the poison; and it shall be unlawful to sell any poison of those which are in the first part of schedule (A) to this Act, or may hereafter be added thereto under sect. 2 of this Act, to any person unknown to the seller, unless introduced by some person known to the seller; and on every sale of any such article, the seller shall, before delivery, make or cause to be made an entry in a book to be kept for that purpose, stating, in the form set forth in the schedule (F) to this Act, the date of the sale, the name and address of the purchaser, the name and quantity of the article sold, and the purpose for which it is stated by the purchaser to be required, to which entry the signature of the purchaser and of the person, if any, who introduced him, shall be affixed; and any person selling poison otherwise than is herein provided shall, upon a summary conviction before two justices of the peace in England or the sheriff in Scotland, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for the first offence, and to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds for the second or any subsequent offence, and for the purposes of this section the person on whose behalf any sale is made by any apprentice or servant shall be deemed to be the seller; but the provisions of this section, which are solely applicable to poison in the first part of the schedule (A) to this Act, or which require that the label shall contain the name and address of the seller, shall not apply to articles to be exported from Great Britain by wholesale dealers, nor to sales by wholesale to retail dealers in the ordinary course of wholesale dealing, nor shall any of the provisions of this section apply to any medicine supplied by a legally qualified apothecary to his patient, nor apply to any articles when forming part of the ingredients of any medicine dispensed by a person registered under this Act; provided such medicine be retailed in the manner aforesaid, with the name and address of the seller, and the ingredients thereof be entered with the name of the person to whom it is sold or delivered, in a book to be kept by the seller for that purpose; and nothing in this Act contained shall repeal or affect any of the provisions of an Act of the Session holden in the 14th and 15th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to regulate the Sale of Arsenic."

Quain, Q.C. (with him Bullock) for the appellant. The mixture given by the appellant was not a poison within the meaning of the first part of sect. 17 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, but was a medicine within the meaning of the latter part of the section. It was made up from a prescription bearing the initials of a medical practitioner; and it is proved as a fact that such a mixture would be proper for a lotion; and a thing is as much a medicine which is to be applied externally, as if it were to be applied internally. [HANNEN, J.—Prussic acid is one of the poisons enumerated in the schedule (A) to the Act.] But if it is diluted with rosewater, as in the present case, it is no longer prussic acid. The intention of the statute was, that where poison was sold as poison, it should be so labelled; not that wherever any quantity, however small, of a poisonous ingredient was contained in a medicine, the medicine itself should be labelled as poisonous. If this mixture is a medicine within the meaning of the latter part of the section, the only other question is whether the appellant complied with the requisites of the section, which are that the medicine "be labelled in manner aforesaid, with the name and address of the seller, and the ingredients thereof be entered, with the name of the person to whom it is sold or delivered, in a book to be kept by the seller for that purpose." The name of Mrs. Newton was given as that of the person to whom the mixture was "sold," and that name was entered in a book kept for the entry of such prescriptions. As to the infliction of a second penalty for the same act, it is submitted that this was clearly wrong.

BERRY (app.) v. HENDERSON (resp.)

Lumley Smith for the respondent.—The present is one of those cases which the Act of Parliament was designed to meet, by preventing poisons being sold to improper persons, and by providing evidence of the persons to whom poisons have been supplied. It is submitted in the first place that the mixture sold by the appellant was a poison within the meaning of the first part of the section. Prussic acid is one of the poisons enumerated in the schedule, and rose water having no medicinal effect, the mixture of the two was merely a diluted poison, and therefore within the application of the section. Is it, then, a medicine? It is submitted that the proviso was intended to apply to medicines for internal use only, and not to lotions like that supplied by the appellant. [LUSH, J.—Suppose this lotion had been given by a legally qualified practitioner to a patient, would it be within the exemption?] It probably would. [LUSH, J.—Then may it not be argued that it is equally protected if "dispensed" by a person registered under the Act? In order to establish your contention must you not show that it would have been necessary to label it as poison if given by a legally qualified practitioner to his patient?] Where the poisonous mixture is to be applied externally as a lotion, it is submitted that it must in both cases be labelled as poisonous. The appellant was bound to prove that the lotion was a medicine; it is enough for the respondent to show the sale of the poisonous compound. The appellant, moreover, should have shown that the prescription was a real one, and that there was a really existing Mrs. Newton; if otherwise, any person who wishes to commit suicide by taking poison can accomplish his purpose by bringing a false prescription to the dispensing chemist. Again, it is submitted that the name of Mrs. Newton, which was entered in the appellant's book, was not the name of the person to whom the mixture was "sold or delivered." [HANNEN, J.—It was delivered to Johnson, but was it not "sold" to Mrs. Newton? What effect do you give to the word "sold" as distinguished from "delivered?"] "Delivered" applies to cases where medicines, as often happens, are given without being sold. Finally, the entry should have been in a book kept for the particular purpose, i. e., for prescriptions for poisonous medicines, which the book in which the entry was made by the appellant was not; and the magistrates were justified in inflicting a separate penalty for each kind of offence, though springing out of the same act.

Quain, Q. C., in reply.—It is for those who seek to inflict a penalty to make out their case strictly, especially where the appellant appears to have acted quite bona fide. [LUSH, J.—We find a difficulty in this, that there is no finding that the appellant reasonably believed that the prescription brought to him was given to Mrs. Newton by the practitioner whose initials it bore, the prescription being one for very poisonous materials, and written in pencil. On the other hand, I can hardly think that the proviso was intended to cast on the chemist the duty of finding out at the time the prescription is brought whether there is actually existing a medical practitioner bearing the initials on the prescription. As the case at present stands, I don't think we can satisfactorily answer the question of law put to us. No doubt if a prescription came to the shop of a dispensing chemist in such a shape that no reasonable man would act on it, such a case would come within the Act; but on that subject we are left in doubt as to the matter of fact.]

Lumley Smith said that the object of pressing the prosecution was to get a decision of the law relating to the subject. [LUSH, J.—Then I think we need not further trouble Mr. Quain.]

LUSH, J.—Assuming that we are to draw inferences, and taking the case as if it stood as the finding of the magistrates, in point of fact, that this gentleman did really believe that when he was dispensing this prescription he was making up a prescription which had been actually given by a medical man to Mrs. Newton for a lotion, as it purported to be, I am of opinion that he has brought himself within the proviso. The first part (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, s. 17), the enacting part, applies to the sale of poisons, and amongst the enumerated poisons is prussic acid. I observe that the Act seems to allude to poisons as being sold in their simple state, or in one form of preparation. It does not appear to contemplate their being mixed up with any other ingredients; they must be pure and simple. Then comes the proviso. Taking the general sweeping words of the enactment, they would, perhaps, have prohibited any medical man dispensing a prescription that contained a poison. It was supposed this might be so, in all probability; and then comes the proviso, which says that nothing in the Act contained shall "apply to any medicine supplied by a legally qualified apothecary to his patient, nor apply to any article when forming part of the ingredients of any medicine dispensed by a person registered under this Act." Is this a medicine? That is not disputed. The word "medicine" is comprehensive enough to embrace everything which is to be applied medicinally, whether externally or internally. According to the prescription, this was intended to be used as a lotion, and the case states as a fact, that the prescription was one which might be proper for a lotion. The proviso seems to put upon the same footing, in this respect, a duly qualified medical man, supplying this thing to his patient, and a registered chemist and druggist dispensing such a thing. If a duly qualified medical man had actually supplied, delivered himself, to his patient this compound of prussic acid and rosewater as a lotion, then he would be protected under the first part of the proviso. That being so, I think the same rules apply to a registered chemist and druggist making up that compound from a prescription, which, as I understand, is the making up something that is prescribed, and making it with directions how it is to be used. Then, did this prussic acid form part of the ingredients of a medicine dispensed by a duly registered person? It struck me on first reading the section that the word applied only to cases where the poisonous article is one of several ingredients, where perhaps its poisonous qualities are qualified in a more or less degree by the other ingredients; but then, I think, it would be very difficult to apply the Act with that interpretation of it. We cannot enter into the consideration whether the other ingredients are fewer or greater in number, or in what proportion they may be. This is of itself a compound, and is a medicine which might have been ordered by a medical man to be used as a lotion. Then, has he complied with the remaining part of the section, which requires that the medicine "should be labelled in the manner aforesaid," by which I understand, distinctly and legibly with the name and address of the seller, as stated in the section; and that the ingredients thereof be entered, with the name of the person to whom it is sold or delivered, in a book to be kept by the seller for that purpose? It is found that the ingredients were entered in what he called his prescription book, which, I think, satisfies the requirements of the Act, as a book kept for that purpose, a book kept for entering such medicines or prescriptions. Then he has entered, as the person to whom it was sold, Mrs. Newton. The statute, by saying the name of the person to whom it was sold, or for whom it was delivered, has, I think, meant to give him the option of putting down the name of the person to whom he actually gave it over the counter, or the name of the person whose agent that person was for whose use it was intended. Taking the fact to be found that he reasonably believed that this was duly prescribed for Mrs. Newton, Mrs. Newton must be taken to be the person to whom he sold it, and, therefore, he complied with the provisions of the Act. For these reasons I think the conviction is wrong.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we are able to pronounce our judgment upon the assumption which has been made, that it is to be taken that the magistrates would have found that the chemist in this case acted bona fide, believing that Mrs. Newton was the person to whom the medicine was sold. Without that, I should have thought it necessary that there should be a further inquiry, but upon that assumption I think we shall be putting a construction upon the Act which will not lead to the dangerous consequences which have been suggested, because it will only be where a chemist establishes that he has entered the name of the person to whom he delivers the medicine, or the person to whom it shall be found he has reasonably believed he had sold it, that he brings himself within the terms of this proviso.

REG. (on the prosecution of the Attorney-General)
v. HAMILTON KINGLAKE.

Witness—Evidence—Refusal of witness to give evidence on account of its criminating him—Objection overruled, and evidence given—Objection afterwards by defendant that the evidence was improperly received.

The privilege of refusing to answer questions on the ground that they tend to criminate, is, that of the witness alone, and neither party to the suit can take any advantage therefrom.

Where, therefore, a witness was called on the part of the Crown to prove bribery against the defendant, and he refused to give evidence on the ground that his evidence would tend to criminate himself, which objection was overruled by the judge, whereupon he gave his evidence:

Held, that the defendant could not afterwards object that such evidence was improperly received.

This was an application for a rule at the instance of the defendant, calling upon the Attorney-General to show cause why a new trial should not be had herein, and why a verdict should not be entered for the defendant upon the 2nd and 3rd counts of the information.

The facts were as follows:—The Attorney-General had filed an information against Dr.

Hamilton Kinglake and Mr. Henry Lovibond for certain misdemeanors connected with the last Parliamentary election for the borough of Bridgewater. The information contained four counts—1st, for bribery; 2nd, for a conspiracy to bribe; 3rd, for a conspiracy corruptly to expend 500*l.* in bribery; 4th, for a conspiracy to advance 500*l.* for the purposes of corruption.

As far as regarded Mr. Lovibond, the Attorney-General had, in consequence of the expression of the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Price and others, Ex parte Lovibond, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12, abstained from further proceeding against him, and the information stood for trial against Dr. Kinglake alone.

At the trial at the last assizes at Taunton, before Hannen, J., the Crown called Mr. Lovibond as a witness; but upon being sworn he declined to give evidence, on the ground that his name was still included in the information; and that two actions were pending against him for penalties for bribery at the said election. Upon this it was announced by the Solicitor-General that a nolle prosequi had been entered as to Mr. Lovibond, and a free pardon was at the same time handed to him. He still declined to give evidence, alleging that a pardon would be no protection to him against the actions. The question having been argued, and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 3, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, ss. 3, 14, 35, and the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, ss. 5 and 7, being referred to, the learned judge held that Mr. Lovibond was compellable to give evidence, and he gave his evidence accordingly, without which, as was admitted, no case could have been made out against Dr. Kinglake. The jury returned a general verdict of "guilty."

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C. (Charles and H. Kinglake with him) now moved accordingly, and argued that the objection of Mr. Lovibond to give evidence was well founded. (It is unnecessary to give the argument upon this point as the judgment did not turn upon it.) He contended also that as the evidence of Mr. Lovibond after his objection to give it was wrongly received Dr. Kinglake had a right to avail himself of the objection upon this point. The following cases were cited by counsel, or referred to by the court:

Dandridge v. Corden, 3 Car. & Pay. 11;
Roberts v. Allatt, 1 Mos. & Mal. 192;
Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Date, 3 Q. B. 609;
Reg. v. Boys, 1 Best & S. 311.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule in this case. An objection is taken by Sir John Karlake that Mr. Lovibond whose evidence was essential for a conviction was under the circumstances not bound to give evidence, but that having been compelled to do so his evidence was improperly received. Now in the first place I am not satisfied that he had any such privilege as he claimed, my strong opinion being that none such existed, and that he was compellable to give the evidence required of him. It is admitted that the pardon protected him against any criminal proceeding; but it is said that it affords him no protection against actions for penalties, and that there are actions now pending against him. I entertain very great doubt whether the privilege of a witness extends to not answering questions which may be used against him, not in a criminal proceeding but in an action for penalties. But it is not necessary for me to rest my judgment upon that ground, for I desire to place it upon a wider basis. I am of opinion that Mr. Lovibond was the only party who could take any exception to his answering; and that the privilege of refusing to be examined cannot be taken advantage of by any other party. By refusing to be examined the witness may have exposed himself to imprisonment for contempt, or to a fine. But that merely concerns the witness himself. If he chooses to give his evidence voluntarily it would be perfectly good evidence, and it would not be illegal evidence in any sense whatever, and there could be no cause of complaint. If so, what difference does it make that he has given his evidence in consequence of some coercion which has been put upon him? I can see no reason for saying that when the witness is compelled to answer, although he may have objected, that that is a ground of objection on the part of either of the litigants. .

Q. B.]

REG. v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE WHITBY UNION.

BLACKBURN, J., after referring to the section of the statute and expressing an opinion that the witness was bound to give evidence, said: But assuming that my brother Hannen was wrong and that some injustice was done to Mr. Lovibond, there was no injustice done to the defendant. The privilege is that of the witness, and if he waives it it is his own affair. But if instead of giving his evidence voluntarily he gives it under compulsion, what is the difference? The party in the suit is not injured. The only case cited upon this point is Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Date, 3 Q. B. 609. But granting that a wrong was done to the witness, it is a ground of complaint for him and no one else.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion upon the last ground. It is clear that if Mr. Lovibond had made no objection his evidence would have been receivable, and it really can make no difference that he objected and was compelled to give his evidence.

HANNEN, J. concurred.

REG. (on the prosecution of the Guardians of the Stepney Union) v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE WHITBY UNION, YORKSHIRE.

Re ESTHER MARSHALL (a pauper lunatic).

Poor law—Status of irremovability—Lunatic pauper—Removal of, without her assent to another union—Order of maintenance.

Where the status of irremovability by virtue of a year's residence is shown to have existed, it is for the party alleging that it has ceased to exist to prove that to be the case.

The leaving of a residence which has conferred the status of irremovability must be the voluntary act of the party.

Where, therefore, a pauper lunatic who had acquired the status of irremovability by residence in the union of R. as a domestic servant, whilst continuing in that same union became insane, whereupon her mother took her away into the union S., where an order was made for her maintenance upon her union of settlement at

Held, that the order was bad, for that she had not lost her status of irremovability in the union of R.

This was a case stated by the Quarter Sessions for the North Riding of Yorkshire as follows:—

At a general quarter session of the peace holden in and for the county of Middlesex, upon an appeal wherein the guardians of the poor of the Whitby union in the North Riding of the county of York were appellants, and the guardians of the poor of the Stepney union, in the county of Middlesex, were respondents, against an order dated 23rd Oct. 1868, made by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Middlesex, whereby the settlement of Esther Marshall, a pauper lunatic, was adjudged to be in the township of Whitby, in the said Whitby union, and the guardians of the said Whitby union were ordered to pay a certain sum of money therein mentioned, for the expenses incurred in and about the examination of the said lunatic and her removal to a lunatic asylum; also a certain sum for her maintenance, &c., therein, up to the date of the said order, and also a certain weekly sum therein also mentioned, for her future maintenance, &c., in the said asylum. It was ordered that the said order be confirmed, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following

CASE.

The said Esther Marshall is a single woman, aged twenty-eight years, legally settled in the township of Whitby, in the Whitby Union. For one year and three months immediately preceding the 17th Sept. 1868 she had been a domestic servant in the service of Mr. Dunn, of Richmond, in the Richmond Poor-law Union, in the county of Surrey, as a yearly servant, and had, during such period resided and slept at the house of her said master in Richmond aforesaid. On the night of Wednesday, the 16th Sept. 1868, the said Esther Marshall was seized with a severe attack of mania, and her master thereupon went to the workhouse of the said Richmond Union, and there informed the master of the said workhouse and the gate porter that the said Esther Marshall was insane, and that he was unable to keep her in his house, and he requested them to remove her to the said workhouse to be taken care of.

The master of the workhouse stated in reply that he could not interfere in any way, as the said Esther Marshall was still residing in her master's house, but he lent her master a strait waistcoat in case it should become necessary to restrain her. The next morning (the 17th Sept.) the master of the said Esther Marshall had an interview with the clerk to the guardians of the poor of the Richmond Union, and afterwards on the same day attended with his doctor before the board of guardians of the said union, who happened to be then sitting at the said workhouse, and informed them of the facts before mentioned relating to the said Esther Marshall, and requesting them to remove her to the workhouse in order that she might be properly taken care of. The board, however, stated in reply, that they had no power to interfere in any way, and the master then telegraphed to the parents of the lunatic, who were residing at Ratcliffe, in the Stepney Union (a distance of about fourteen miles), to come to Richmond to remove her. In the afternoon of this day (17th Sept. 1868) the said Esther Marshall's mother and her brother arrived at Richmond. The master thereupon paid the mother her daughter's wages up to that day, and having hired a fly at his own expense, the said Esther Marshall was removed in it by her said relations from the residence of her master at Richmond to the residence of her parents at Ratcliffe, in the Stepney Union. The master had not the slightest intention or expectation of receiving the said Esther Marshall back again into his house. The said Esther Marshall remained at the house of her parents, who were poor persons, and in receipt of out-door parochial relief from the township of Whitby, one night only, during which time she attempted to throw herself out of the window. The next morning (18th Sept.) the parents of the said Esther Marshall applied to the relieving officer of the Ratcliff district of the Stepney Union, who visited the lunatic, and had her removed in due course on the same day to the workhouse of that union. She remained in the Stepney Union Workhouse for seven days, and was then sent to the lunatic asylum for the county of Middlesex on the 26th Sept., where she has since remained confined as a pauper lunatic. On the 26th Oct. 1868, the order appealed against was made. The said Esther Marshall had, on the 16th Sept. 1868, acquired the status of irremovability from the Richmond Union, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1; and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8, by virtue of residence therein for more than a year. She has remained insane from the night of the 16th Sept. It was contended, on behalf of the appellants, that, as the said Esther Marshall had, on the said 16th Sept. 1868, acquired a status of irremovability by residence in the Richmond Union, the order for her past and future maintenance ought not to have been made upon the guardians of the place of her settlement, but ought to have been made upon the guardians of the Richmond Union, under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 102; and it was further contended that her removal under the circumstances mentioned did not constitute a breach of her residence in Richmond so as to destroy the status of irremovability,

(a) With reference to that part of the rule having reference to the third and fourth counts, it was arranged that the question should be referred to Hannen, J. at chambers, it being thought probable that the Attorney-General would consent to the verdict being confined to the first and second counts only.

It was contended, on behalf of the respondents, that the order was rightly made on the guardians of the place of settlement, and, further, that the removal of the said Esther Marshall under the circumstances mentioned did constitute a breach of residence so as to destroy her status of irremovability.

The Court of Quarter Sessions directed in favour of the respondents, and confirmed the said order appealed against.

The question for the opinion of this court is whether, under the circumstances above stated, the guardians of the Stepney Union were prevented from obtaining an order on the guardians of the Whitby Union for the maintenance of the said Esther Marshall, under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 97. If the court shall answer this question in the affirmative, then the order of sessions is to be quashed, but if in the negative, then the order of sessions is to be confirmed.

By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, it is enacted:

That from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for five years next before the application for the warrant.

The period of five years was, by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8, reduced to one year.

By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 97, it is enacted:

It shall be lawful for any two justices for the county or borough in which any asylum, registered hospital, or licensed house in which any pauper lunatic is or has been confined is situate, or to which such asylum wholly or in part belongs, or from any part of which any pauper lunatic is or has been sent for confinement at any time, to inquire into the last legal settlement of such pauper lunatic, and if satisfactory evidence can be obtained as to such settlement in any parish, such justices shall, by order under their hands and seals, adjudge such settlement accordingly, and order the guardians of the union to which the parish in which such lunatic is adjudged to be settled belongs, or of such parish in case such parish be in a union or be under a board of guardians, and if not, then the overseers of such parish to pay to the guardians of any union or parish, or the overseers of any parish, all expenses incurred in or on behalf of such union or parish in or about the examination of such lunatic, and the bringing him before a justice or justices, and his conveyance to the asylum, hospital, or house, and of all moneys paid by such last mentioned guardians or overseers, to the treasurer, officer or proprietor of the asylum, hospital, or house, for the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of such lunatic, and incurred within twelve months previous to the date of such order; and if such lunatic is still in confinement, also to pay to the treasurer, officer, or proprietor of the asylum, hospital, or house the reasonable charges of the future lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of such lunatic, &c.

By sect. 102, it is enacted:

Provided always that all the expenses incurred since the 29th Sept. 1853, or hereafter to be incurred in and about the examination, bringing before a justice or justices, removal, lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of a pauper lunatic heretofore or hereafter removed to an asylum, registered hospital, or licensed house under the authority of this or any other Act who would at the time of his being conveyed to such asylum, hospital, or house, have been exempt from removal to the parish of his settlement, or the country of his birth by reason of some provision in the Act of the session holden in the ninth and tenth years of Her Majesty, c. 66, shall be paid by the guardians of the parish wherein such lunatic shall have acquired such exemption if such parish be subject to a separate board of guardians, or by the overseers of such parish where the same is not subject to such separate board, and where such parish shall be comprised in any union, the same shall be paid by the guardians and be charged to the common fund of such union so long as the cost of the relief of paupers rendered irremovable by the last-mentioned Act shall continue to be chargeable upon the common funds of unions, &c.

Taylor appeared for the respondents.—The order was rightly made upon the Stepney Union, for the lunatic had under the circumstances lost her status of irremovability. The pauper at the time of the order, was in the Stepney Union, and as between Stepney and Whitby there was no irremovability the pauper had not acquired the status of irremovability in Stepney, and she had lost it in Richmond. She had left Richmond with no intention of returning. Her parents, who were her natural guardians, took her away to Stepney, and there was no intention, nor any ability or right to return. [BLACKBURN, J.—Has this taking away by her parents any greater effect upon her status than though she had voluntarily gone to them upon a visit?] If she had gone to them voluntarily upon a visit she would have had the intention to return. To prevent a break of residence there must be, first, a temporary absence; secondly, an intention to return; thirdly, a place to return to. In all the cases upon the subject there has been an actual return to the parish, and an order of removal from it. Here there was no return to Richmond, nor any intention to return, nor was the order made as from Richmond. It is sufficient for my purpose if I establish the fact that at the time the order was made the pauper lunatic was not residing in Richmond Union. [BLACKBURN, J.—The great difficulty is that the poor woman could have had no intention the one way or the other.] He cited the following cases:

- R. v. St. Giles*, 3 Ell. & Ell. 224;
- R. v. Whissendine*, 2 Q. B. 450; 11 L. J. 42, M. C.

- R. v. Tacolnstone*, 18 L. J. 44, M. C.;
- R. v. Brighton*, 24 L. J. 41, M. C.

Poland (Poynter with him) appeared for the appellants.—The pauper lunatic having acquired the status of irremovability, did not lose it; she could only have lost it, first, by some voluntary act of her own, or, secondly, by the operation of law, as by a lawful removal. She did no act indicating an intention to abandon her residence. The lunatic was a yearly servant; she had served one year, and was serving a portion of another, and she did no act showing an intention to determine her contract. There was no voluntary leaving on her part, and nothing to show that she did not intend to return. Had she recovered in a day or two's time, and gone back to her service, it would have been clear that there would have been no break of residence. She did nothing to terminate her service with her master; all that occurred was that she became in a state of insensibility, whereupon others took her away. Her parents had no legal right to act for her, nor were they under any legal obligation to support her, unless they were capable of so doing, and an order had been made upon them under the 43 Eliz. If she was not capable of exercising a judgment, it cannot be said that she voluntarily put an end to her residence in Richmond union. Her service was not determined; her contract to serve remained good for the residue of the second year, and on her recovery she would have had a right to have gone back. Had she been sent to a lunatic asylum at once, there would have been no difficulty. He cited the following cases:

BLACKBURN, J. (a)—I think that in this case our judgment should be that this order be quashed, inasmuch as it ought not to have been made upon the Stepney Union. The way in which the case arises is this: [His Lordship here stated the facts.] Now the proceedings pointed out by the Legislature are described in the 97th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, which throws the burthen of maintenance of a pauper lunatic upon the parish or union of settlement; but then there is the 102nd section, which enacts that the costs of pauper lunatics who are irremovable by virtue of the operation of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, are to be borne by the parish or union wherein they were exempt from removal, and not, therefore, on the parish of settlement. Here, then, comes the question whether, at the time the order was made, the lunatic had become irremovable on the ground that she had resided so long in the Richmond Union as to acquire the status of irremovability? I am of opinion upon the facts that she had not lost her status of irremovability. It must not be forgotten that this provision was enacted for the benefit of the paupers themselves; that they may not be removed from the place where they have been residing, and where they may have formed friendships and connections. Now, when once the status is acquired, how can it cease? It ceases when the residence has been broken; and the onus that it has been broken is upon the party who alleges it, which may be done by showing that the pauper has voluntarily left and obtained a residence elsewhere. If, though he may go away, he still retains the intention and ability of returning, it will be no break of his residence. Here, this unfortunate woman had no intention the one way or the other, as she was a lunatic. I think, however, that the status of irremovability ought to be considered as continuing until the contrary is shown. The mere fact of the mother of the lunatic taking her away for a single night, cannot be considered as a change of residence. It seems to me that Mr. Poland is right in his argument, and that if this woman had removed and had returned to Richmond, she would have retained her status of irremovability. I consider that the residence must be supposed to continue unless it is affirmatively found that she changed it. If the pauper had recovered and returned, there could have been nothing to have deprived her of her status.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the Legislature was to prevent the oppression of removing poor people from their old associates, and although as the present pauper is a lunatic, it may matter little to her whether she is removed to a distance or not, yet in the event of her recovery it may be otherwise. Now in this case the woman was serving a contract, and there is no evidence that she intended to break it by leaving her service. Her master may have discharged her from his house, but that would not have been a termination of her contract, and certainly he could not have turned her out of the parish; and although she was actually removed out of the parish, yet this was the act of her mother for a temporary purpose, and there is nothing in the removal to show a break of residence.

HANNEN, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The status of irremovability can only be put an end to by showing that the residence has ceased. When a place of residence is once established it can be abandoned by showing some act evincing an intention to abandon it. Here from her state of mind the woman was incapable of assenting to the abandonment of her residence, and having acquired the status of irremovability, I think it was not destroyed by anything which is shown to have taken place.

Order of sessions quashed.

GODWIN v. FRANCIS.

Damages—Breach of contract to sell real estate—Pretended agent—Costs of action against alleged principal.

The defendant, being part owner of an estate, and believing himself to have authority from the other owners to sell it, agreed to sell it for a stipulated price to the plaintiff. The other owners refused to be bound by the contract, and sold the estate, for a higher price than the plaintiff had agreed to give, to another person. On the owners of the estate refusing to convey to the plaintiff, the plaintiff applied to the defendant, who said he was sorry there had been a misunderstanding in the matter; that he thought that, subject to the preparation of a proper contract, he was authorised to sell; but that it then appeared that other parties interested took a different view of the matter. The solicitor to the other owners informed the plaintiff, in explicit terms, that the defendant had no authority to make the contract he had made. Nevertheless, the plaintiff brought an action against the owners of the estate for breach of contract. On his interrogating them, they, one and all, swore that the defendant had had no authority to sell the estate. Nevertheless, the plaintiff proceeded with his action, hoping to prove by other evidence the agency of the defendant. At the trial he was nonsuited, and had to pay costs on both sides:

Held, in an action against the defendant for wrongfully representing himself to have authority to sell the estate, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover first, the expenses of investigating the title to the estate; secondly, the costs of the first action up to the time of his receiving the answers to the interrogatories, with an allowance for reasonable costs incurred in submitting those answers to the consideration of his legal advisers; thirdly, damages for loss of bargain, the difference between the contract price of the estate and the price at which it was subsequently sold being prima facie evidence of the extent of the plaintiff's loss.

This case was reported on another point, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361.

GODWIN v. FRANCIS.

[C. P.]

The declaration stated that the defendant, by warranting the plaintiff that he was authorised by certain others, to wit, &c., who were interested, together with him, in a certain estate, known, &c., to sell the same to the plaintiff for a certain sum, to wit, &c., agreed with the plaintiff, as for himself and the said others, and procured the plaintiff to agree, as with himself (the defendant) and the said others, that the defendant and the said others should sell to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff should purchase from the defendant and the said others the said estate for the sum of 10,500*l.*, and the plaintiff did all things necessary, &c. Yet the defendant was not authorised by the said others to sell, &c., whereby, &c.—the plaintiff claiming, by way of special damage, compensation for loss of bargain, compensation for the expense he had been put to in bringing an action against the owners of the estate, compensation for money spent in investigating the title, and compensation for loss on the resale of animals and things bought for the purpose of stocking and cropping the said estate.

The defendant pleaded: 1. A traverse of the warranty. 2. A denial that he agreed, or procured the plaintiff to agree. And, 3. That at the time, &c., he had authority to sell.

At the trial at Salisbury, at the last summer assizes, before Lush, J., it appeared that the plaintiff was, with certain other persons of the name of Brind, owner of an estate called the Liddington estate. The defendant and the other owners issued an advertisement, which stated that the estate was to be sold, and that "to treat and view the property application was to be made" to certain persons, one of whom was the defendant. The plaintiff accordingly applied to the defendant. A correspondence ensued between them relative to the sale of the estate, for which the plaintiff offered the sum of 10,500*l.* On the 18th Oct. 1867, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff saying, that four out of the five owners of the estate agreed to his proposal, and that he should see the fifth the next day and had no doubt that he would accept it too. On the 20th Oct. the plaintiff wrote to the defendant to say that if he was to have the estate for 10,500*l.*, the matter must be settled at once, "as the season is going on for cropping the ground with wheat, and I find the entry very bad, as there are only thirty acres which can be sown this year." On the 22nd Oct. the defendant accepted the plaintiff's offer by telegraph, and on the 23rd plaintiff wrote to defendant acknowledging the receipt of the telegram, and saying that he considered himself the purchaser. The abstract of title was sent about the end of October. On the 8th Nov. the solicitors to the Brind family wrote to the plaintiff to say that one of the owners had not authorised the defendant to sell. On the 18th they wrote again, saying that it was clear that the defendant had no authority to sell the estate. On the 28th Nov. the defendant himself wrote to the plaintiff, saying, "I am sorry there has been any misunderstanding in the matter of the sale of the Liddington estate. I thought that, subject to the preparation of a proper contract, I was authorised to sell, but it now appears that other parties interested take a different view of the matter." The owners refused to complete the sale, and shortly afterwards sold the estate to another person for a larger sum than the plaintiff had agreed to give. The plaintiff then brought an action against them (the present defendant being one of them), and interrogated them as to whether they had not given Francis authority to sell the estate. Francis, in his answer to interrogatories, said that he had been under the impression that his co-owners would concur, if he could get an offer of the 10,500*l.*; but he had since discovered that there had been a misunderstanding on the point. The other owners denied that they had given any authority to Francis to sell the estate. Nevertheless, the plaintiff continued his action against them, hoping to prove by means of the before-mentioned advertisement that Francis had had the authority he represented. The case came on for trial at the Salisbury summer assizes 1868, before Mellor, J., who non-suited the plaintiff. The plaintiff subsequently moved for a rule to set aside the non-suit, but that was refused, and he had to pay not only his own costs but those of the defendants. He then commenced the present action, when he obtained a verdict for 726*l.* 9*s.* This sum included full compensation for (1) costs incurred in investigating the title, (2) his own costs and the taxed costs of the defendants in the previous action, (3) the difference between the price which he had agreed to give for the estate and the price at which it was subsequently sold, and (4) loss incurred by him in selling stock, horses, &c., which he had bought, after entering into the contract with the defendant, with a view to stocking the farm. Leave was reserved to move for a rule to reduce the damages.

Lopes, Q.C. (on Nov. 4, 1869), moved accordingly, and a rule was granted.

Cole, Q.C., (on Jan. 15 and Feb. 5), showed cause. All the cases show that the plaintiff is entitled to full compensation for the expense he was at in investigating the title. The next question that arises is up to what point the plaintiff ought to recover the costs of the previous action. The defendant's letter of the 28th Nov. 1868 is clearly not a distinct denial of authority. [BOVILL, C.J.—On the contrary, it looks rather as though he still thought he had authority.] Just so. The plaintiff then was at all events justified according to the rule laid down in Richardson v. Dunn, 8 C. B., N. S., 655; 30 L. J. 44, C. P.; Collen v. Wright, 7 E. & B. 301; 26 L. J. 147, Q. B.; 8 E. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q. B. 215; and Spedding v. Nevill, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 212; 38 L. J. 133, C. P. in commencing his action and in going on with it, at least until he had the answer of the defendant and the others on oath denying the defendant's authority. Until the plaintiff got this answer, he had every reason to believe that the defendant had authority to sell the estate, and, having got a valuable bargain, he was not bound to sit down and take no steps to enforce it. The question is what would a reasonable man have done under the circumstances? It is submitted that the plaintiff did nothing more than a reasonable and prudent man was bound to do. Even after he had the answers of the then defendants denying on oath that they gave the present defendant authority to sell, the defendant was justified in going on with the action. It is true he failed. Still it was a moot point whether the wording of the advertisement was not such as to hold out the present defendant as authorised to sell the estate. The plaintiff, knowing that the estate had been sold at a higher price than he had contracted to give, was justified in looking with suspicion at the answers of the then defendants, and in proceeding with the action. The next question is as to the damages for loss of bargain! Engel v. Fitch, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318; 37 L. J. 145, Q. B.; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 314, is a conclusive authority to show that the defendant having undertaken to sell what he had not secured command of, cannot claim the protection of a rule which has reference solely to the difficulty of making out a title to real property. The fact that the estate subsequently sold for more than 10,500*l.* is prima facie evidence that it was worth more than that sum, and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, must be taken as conclusive. As to the last question, the parties clearly contemplated that early possession would be given, and the plaintiff in one of his letters says, "I must be at great expense in stocking, &c."

GODWIN v. FRANCIS.

Lopes, Q.C., and Bowen, in support of the rule. We do not contest the plaintiff's right to recover the costs of investigating the title. With regard to the next point, the plaintiff is clearly not entitled to the costs of the previous action, after receiving the answers to the interrogatories. Moreover, he was not justified, after the warnings he had received from the vendors' solicitors, in commencing the action. No reasonable man, who thought he would have to bear the costs himself, would have commenced the action without further inquiry. The letters received from the defendant and the vendors' solicitors were, if not conclusive, at any rate such as ought to have made the plaintiff pause and make further inquiries before proceeding. [BOVILL, C.J.—The letter of the defendant is by no means clear. As for the other letters, they came from the Brinds not from the defendant.] How could the plaintiff possibly expect to prove his case, after receiving those letters? [BOVILL, C.J.—He was not then sure that he could not call Francis as a witness.] Would anyone have advised an action under the circumstances? [BOVILL, C.J.—Put it the other way. Would anyone at that stage of the case have advised an action against Francis for making wrongful representations of authority?] In all decided cases there has been a persistence in the wrongful representation, and in Spedding v. Newell (ubi sup.) there was a count in fraud and such misconduct on the part of the defendant that fraud might have well been expected. With regard to the next point, this case is distinguishable from Engel v. Fitch (ubi sup.), as that related to the loss of profit on the re-sale of a lease. The damages are too remote: they are not the natural consequences of the breach of contract and cannot be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties. In Sikes v. Wild, 4 B. & S. 421; 32 L. J. 375, Q.B.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 642, the misconduct of the defendant was the ground of the damages. In Engel v. Fitch the defendant was guilty of misconduct. [BRETT, J.—Can the motive of the defendant in a breach of contract be important?] That is the principle of the cases. They cited also

Hopkins v. Grazebrook, 6 B. & C. 31;

Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341; 23 L. J. 179, Ex.;

Walker v. Moore, 10 B. & C. 416.

As to the next point the damages are clearly too remote. The plaintiff began buying stock ten days after the contract was made, and before the abstract of title was investigated. The letters do not show that it was in the contemplation of the parties that the plaintiff should be in such a hurry: (Worthington v. Wallington, 18 L. J. 350, C. P.; 8 Q. B. 134.)

BOVILL, C.J.—The defendant having admitted that the verdict must stand as to the costs of investigating the title, three questions only are left for our consideration. The first question that arises is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant the costs of the action brought by him against the parties whose agent the defendant held himself out to be. That action failed, on the ground that the defendant had not been authorised by these parties to sell the estate. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and had to pay the costs of both sides. It seems to me that the present defendant, having contracted on behalf of the vendors, led the plaintiff to believe that he had the authority he warranted. The plaintiff, then, was justified as against him in acting on his representations, and in commencing proceedings against the vendors, on their refusing to convey. If he commenced these proceedings properly and reasonably, and was led to commence them by the act of the defendant, then, as he failed by reason of the defendant having had no authority to sell the estate, the defendant is responsible for all costs reasonably incurred. (The rule in these cases is that where a pretended agent in reality had no such authority as he pretended to have, he must pay all the costs which he, whom he has deceived, acting on his representations and conduct, has reasonably incurred. It is a question for a jury what costs are reasonably incurred. That was the rule laid down in Hughes v. Græme, 33 L. J. 335, Q. B.; and I am at a loss to see what other rule could be adopted. We, then, sitting as a jury, and looking at all the circumstances, think that the action was reasonably and properly brought, and that the plaintiff was led to bring the action by the representations of authority made by the defendant. As to any statement made by the defendant before action, I think that the defendant ought to have made a distinct and positive denial of his authority, to disentitle the plaintiff to the costs of commencing proceedings. The only step taken by the defendant was to write the letter of 28th Nov. 1867, in which he said, "It now appears that other parties interested take a different view of the matter." That is by no means a distinct denial of authority; on the contrary, the defendant seems to intimate that he is by no means sure that he had no authority. Other letters passed between the parties, and the plaintiff received one from the solicitor to the Messrs. Brind distinctly denying the authority. That, however, is a denial by the alleged principals and not by the defendant. In all these cases the question arises whether the plaintiff, as a reasonable man, was bound to act on such a representation. All the circumstances must be considered. The parties may have had the deepest interest in trying to repudiate the bargain made on their behalf. In other cases there may be fraud or collusion. I unhesitatingly think that the proceedings were reasonably commenced, the defendant having made no distinct denial of authority. The question then arises, whether and how far they were properly continued. After the then defendants, including the present defendant, had, in their answers to interrogatories, denied the authority on oath, I do not think that the plaintiff ought to have continued the proceedings against them, but to have gone at once against the present defendant. Instead of doing so, he continued the action and endeavoured to make out a case by means of the advertisement. In doing so he was, according to the decision of this court, wrong, as the advertisement gave the defendant no authority to sell on behalf of the vendors. The plaintiff failed then, and not on the ground of the defendant having represented himself as having an authority which he had not. I think that the plaintiff ought not reasonably to have continued the action, after getting the answers to the interrogatories, so that the damages he is entitled to under this head must be no greater than will cover the costs of the first action up to the time of receiving the answers to interrogatories and of submitting them to the consideration of the plaintiff's legal advisers. The next point is as to the damages for loss of bargain; and the plaintiff's claim on this head is not put on the ground that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the difference of price on the re-sale as such, but that that difference must be treated as a measure of the difference between the contract price and the actual value. Could he have recovered these damages from the vendors if they had been bound by the defendants' contract and had refused to convey the estate? If he could, then he can also recover them from the defendant. I assume that the vendors had a good title, and were in a position to convey. Why, then, did the contract go off?

C. P.]

GODWIN v. FRANCIS.

Not because of any defect in title, but by reason of a refusal to convey. If the defendant had had authority to bind the vendors, they would have had no justification for their refusal. If a purchase of real estate goes off by reason of a defect in the vendor's title, that is an exceptional case; but there is no decision limiting the damages in a case where a party, having a title, refuses to convey. Mr. Bowen has tried to distinguish Sikes v. Wild, and Engel v. Fitch (ubi sup.); yet the principle of these decisions is clear. If a person has a title and refuses to convey, he is entitled to no exceptional favour. In the case of Engel v. Fitch the defendant had it in his power to complete the purchase by ejecting the tenant. Let us apply the principle of that case to this. The purchase goes off, not through any defect in the vendors' title, but merely by reason of their refusal to carry out the contract. On this head, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for 100*l.*, that being the difference between the contract price and the price at which the estate was subsequently sold. The third point arises as to the loss incurred by the plaintiff in selling stock and farming implements which he had bought in contemplation of taking early possession of this estate. I do not think, however, that these damages can be said to naturally flow from the defendant's breach of contract. A party who makes a contract for the purchase of an estate, must know that considerable time necessarily elapses before the contract can be completed. It is impossible to say that damages like these are not too remote, the stock, &c., having been purchased before possession was given or the conveyance made. If the plaintiff could have shown that the immediate purchase of stock was clearly in the contemplation of the parties, he might have brought the case within the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.). It was no doubt in contemplation of the parties that early possession should be given, and the plaintiff no doubt let the defendant know that he intended purchasing stock for the farm. But there was nothing amounting to a year notice that the plaintiff intended to purchase stock before taking possession, so as to bring the case within the rule laid down in the case mentioned. I think we should be allowing a new head of damages if we allowed the plaintiff to recover on this head. The circumstances do not warrant it, and the damages cannot be considered as naturally flowing from the breach of contract, or to have been in the contemplation of the parties.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the costs of the previous action, the question arises what was the reasonable course for the plaintiff to have taken. The defendant had represented himself as authorised to sell the estate, and everything happened to lead the plaintiff to suppose that he had the authority which he said he had. The estate was publicly advertised for sale, and after the contract was made the plaintiff had a correspondence with the vendors' solicitors, in which the contract was treated as valid. The plaintiff went to some expense in investigating the title, and had every reason to believe that he had bought the estate. But it afterwards appeared that the defendant had no authority to sell; and he accordingly wrote a letter to the plaintiff throwing doubt upon the subject. It may have been that the defendant intended to say that he had had no authority; but the letter is equivocal. The plaintiff had a valuable bargain, and he was not bound, under the circumstances, to sit down and do nothing to enforce it. He might have proceeded against either the defendant or his principals. The plaintiff was in a position of some difficulty, but I cannot say that he did not do what a prudent man would have done under the circumstances. He knew of the subsequent sale at an advanced price, and he might have reasonably hoped to succeed against the vendors. Lots of things might have happened to give evidence of authority. It was a natural and prudent course for him to take to proceed against the vendors. But then, having commenced his action against them, he interrogated them as to the authority, which he contended they had given to the present defendant. They all answered that no such authority had been given. After that, there was no reason for him to doubt that such was the case, and the further prosecution of the action was imprudent. On these grounds I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the costs of the previous action up to his receiving the answers to the interrogatories and also any fair expenses incurred by him in considering those answers. The next question that arises is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the marketable value of the estate beyond the price he had agreed to give. I think that he is clearly entitled to such an amount as will recompense him for the loss of the contract which he had made. If the defendant had been authorised by the vendors to contract, the plaintiff could clearly have recovered these damages from them. If they had, under such circumstances, refused to carry out their contract, the plaintiff would have been entitled to the difference between the contract and the market price. This is clearly laid down in the case of Engel v. Fitch (ubi sup.), where Kelly, C. B., in giving the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said:—"I may add that I think this would be so in all cases of this kind, excepting those within the rule of Flureau v. Thornhill, which is confined to the single case of failure of title. We adopt the general rule as enunciated by Parke, B., in Robinson v. Harman, that "the rule of the common law is that when a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed. The case of Flureau v. Thornhill qualified the rule of the common law. It was there held that contracts for the sale of real estate are merely on condition that the vendor has a good title, so that when a person contracts to sell real property, there is an implied understanding that, if he fail to make a good title, the only damages recoverable are the expenses which the vendee may be put to in investigating the title." The measure taken here is the difference of price on the re-sale. That is prima facie evidence of the real value of the estate, and there being no evidence here to the contrary, it is on this head of damages conclusive. With regard to the third point, I do not think the plaintiff ought to succeed. If nothing had passed between the parties with regard to stocking the farm, the damages would be clearly too remote. It could not be in the contemplation of the parties that the plaintiff would lay out money in collateral purchases, which would only be necessary when the estate was in actual possession. If we were to hold otherwise, every man who contracted for the purchase of the lease of a house might, if the purchase went off, claim damages for loss incurred in purchasing furniture. Such damages are not naturally in the contemplation of the parties. But then the correspondence is relied on to show that the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he was about to purchase stock, and it is contended that, on this account, this particular matter must be treated as having been in the contemplation of the parties. But I do not think that the letters show that the plaintiff intended to buy stock before taking possession, so that on this head of damage the plaintiff fails.

BOWDEN v. ALLEN.

[C. P.]

BRETT, J.—I think that the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the previous action up to his receiving the answers to the interrogatories and for a reasonable time afterwards. I think that he was justified at first in thinking that he had a reasonable prospect of success, and that he might well have thought, until he received the answers to the interrogatories, that he might call the defendant as a witness to prove that he actually had had the authority which he had represented himself to have. As to the increased value of the estate, I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the price at which the estate was subsequently sold. If the defendant had had the authority which he represented himself to have, the plaintiff would have had an estate of this increased value, and if the principals had then refused to convey it, he might have recovered from them. The case of Engel v. Fitch is a good authority to show that he might, and if, under such circumstances, he might have recovered against them, he may now recover the same damages from the defendant. With regard to the third head of damage, I cannot think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The contract was for the sale and purchase of land, and horses and so forth were bought by the defendant before possession of the land was given or even the title investigated. The defendant was surely not bound to contemplate that the plaintiff would make such a purchase. But it is said that he had notice of his intention to do so. That depends on the construction we put upon the correspondence. I must say that the plaintiff does not seem to me to give the defendant any warning in his letters that, if the contract were made, he should at once commence buying stock before possession of the estate was given or the title had been investigated.

Rule accordingly.

BOWDEN v. ALLEN.

Practice—Interrogatories—Libel—Newspaper.

The 19th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, which was re-enacted by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24, sched. 2, does not compel an answer to interrogatories which the person interrogated swears would tend to criminate him.

This was an application to reverse an order of Bramwell B. at chambers.

An action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for a libel contained in a newspaper, of which the defendant was supposed to be the publisher. The plaintiff obtained an order from Willes, J., in chambers to interrogate the defendant as to whether he was the responsible publisher of the newspaper in question. The defendant, however, refused to answer the interrogatories, on the ground that his answers would tend to criminate him. Application was made to Bramwell, B., at chambers to compel the defendant to answer; the learned judge, however, made no order, and made the plaintiff pay the costs of the application. Against this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Foard for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has to prove that the defendant published the libel in question. The statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24, which did away with the necessity under which publishers of newspapers formerly lay of registering themselves, renders it difficult to prove who is the publisher of a newspaper. The only course for the plaintiff to take under the circumstances is to interrogate. Accordingly the Act (in sched. 2) re-enacts sect. 19 of 6 & 7

Will. 4, c. 76, which provides that "if any person shall file a bill in any court for the discovery of the name of any person concerned as printer, publisher, or proprietor of any newspaper, or of any matter relative to the printing or publishing of any newspaper, in order more effectually to bring or carry on any suit or action for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of any slanderous or libellous matter contained in any such newspaper respecting such person, it shall not be lawful for the defendant to plead or demur to such bill, but such defendant shall be compellable to make the discovery required; provided always that such discovery shall not be made use of as evidence or otherwise in any proceeding against the defendant, save only in that proceeding for which the discovery is made." [KEATING, J.—This seems to be a re-enactment of part of a statute passed before the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, without taking any notice of intervening legislation.] As a court of law has now just the same powers as a court of equity, with regard to discovery, the court will not allow a party to refuse to answer interrogatories, seeing that if the same questions were put to him through the medium of a bill of discovery, he would be compelled to answer. The objection, moreover, was taken at the wrong time. He cited:

Thorpe v. Macaulay, 5 Mad. 218.

Boyle v. Wiseman, 10 Ex. 647.

Tapling v. Ward, 6 H. & N. 30; 30 L. J. 222, Ex.

BOVILL, C.J.—It is certainly a great misfortune that parties who seek redress against wrongs done them in the columns of a newspaper should be met with this difficulty—that they cannot find out who is the responsible person against whom they ought to proceed. The difficulty is caused by the repeal of the statute, which required the responsible publisher of every newspaper to be registered. The Act of last year (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24) which effected this change, re-enacted 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 19, with a view to enabling persons aggrieved to discover the responsible parties, but it made no reference to legislation that had taken place since the passing of the latter Act. Under the circumstances, it appears to me that the decision of my brother Bramwell was right. As a rule, a man is not bound to answer a question if his answer would tend to criminate him. In some cases the presiding judge may require to be satisfied of the reasonableness of the objection, but he most frequently accepts the statement of the witness. It would, as a general rule, render the privilege worthless, if the person claiming it were bound to explain in what way his answer would criminate him. In the present case the interrogatories were framed expressly with the view of making the defendant criminate himself, and it is idle to say that, on claiming the privilege he must show how his answers would criminate him. The rule is established on grounds of public policy, and holds good in the courts both of law and equity. Ordinarily, the court will refuse to order a question to be answered, if the witness says his answer will criminate him. In some cases the court allows the question to be put, leaving it to the witness to claim his privilege if he likes; in other cases the court will refuse to allow the question at all. In the present case my brother Willes made an order requiring the defendant to answer; the defendant claimed his privilege and refused to do so. My brother Bramwell was asked to overrule the objection. He refused to do so, and, in so refusing, was, in my opinion, perfectly right. As a general rule a person may refuse to answer interrogatories administered under the Common Law Procedure Act, if his answers would criminate him. Mr. Foard, however, contends that, under sect. 19 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, re-enacted by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24, sched. 2, the court may compel an answer, even although it has that tendency, and that the person interrogated will be protected by that section from having his answer used against him in any other proceeding. That section is, however, limited in its terms. It is confined to the case of a bill of discovery. If we could give to the person interrogated that protection against the consequences of his answers to interrogatories that is provided in the case of a bill of discovery by the section in question, we should be disposed to make the order. But the statute does not enable us to do so. Thus, if we made the order, we might force the defendant to furnish the means of convicting himself of a criminal offence. The 19th sect. would not protect him, if his answers to these interrogatories were made evidence against him in a criminal prosecution. I think, therefore, that the decision of my brother Bramwell was right, and that this application must be refused.

MOULE v. GARRETT AND OTHERS.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is with great reluctance, however, that I feel myself compelled to refuse this application, as I think there has been an accidental omission in the statute, which takes away the means formerly given of finding out who is responsible for the statements in a newspaper. To supply this need, a section of an old Act is re-enacted, which provides that in an action for libel against the proprietor of a newspaper, if the plaintiff file a bill against the defendant with a view to discovering whether he is the responsible person, the defendant shall have no excuse for refusing to answer and shall answer. The plaintiff has no other means of discovering. It seems as though the Legislature had forgotten the powers of discovery now enjoyed by courts of law. We are now asked to supply the omissions of the Legislature; but we should exceed our powers if we did so. I think my brother Bramwell was right, as an answer to the interrogatories might have been used as evidence against the defendant on an indictment.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Independently of the 19th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, re-enacted by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24, sched. 2, the court certainly has no power to compel any further answers to these interrogatories. The interrogatories are framed with a view to getting the defendant to admit that he published a libel, and the defendant refuses to answer them on the ground that, by so doing, he would criminate himself. Under these circumstances, the court has no power to compel him to answer, unless the section that I have quoted is incorporated in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. I have endeavoured to see whether, if we compelled an answer, we could introduce the protection given by that section, and I do not think we have any right to compel, unless we are sure we can give the protection. I cannot at all think that we can give the defendant protection against the possible consequences of his answers, and therefore do not think we have any right to compel him to answer. It is not for us to put a forced construction on the Act; we should rather leave it to the Legislature to amend it where it is manifestly deficient.

BRETT, J.—The interrogatories have been administered to the defendant under the 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and the defendant is bound to answer them, unless he can show just cause to the contrary. He does show a just cause if he says that his answers would tend to criminate him. His answers to these interrogatories might be used as evidence against him on an indictment, unless the Legislature has protected him against such a consequence. It is contended that the 19th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, which was re-enacted last year, gives him such a protection. That section, however, applies to the case of answers to a bill of discovery, not to that of answers to interrogatories. I think, therefore, that the defendant does show just cause, and that he ought not to be compelled to answer. The plaintiff may file a bill of discovery, and the defendant will then be compelled to answer. It is clear, however, that a lamentable mistake has been made by the Legislature, and it would be well if it were rectified.

Application refused.

MOULE v. GARRETT AND OTHERS.

Lease—Assignment of—Breach of covenant—Liability of remote assignee to lessee.

A lease containing a covenant to repair was assigned by the lessee and assigned over by the assignee. The ultimate assignee committed a breach of the covenant, for which the lessor sued the lessee, and recovered damages. The lessee sued the ultimate assignee for an indemnity:

Held, that he was entitled to recover, on the ground that the relation of surety and principal exists between a lessee and a subsequent assignee of the lease, whether immediate or remote. Per Channell and Pigott, B.B., Cleasby, B. dissenting.

Declaration in substance stated that Godfrey Thurgood, by indenture bearing date 15th June 1845, demised to the plaintiff a certain messuage, &c., for a certain term, at a yearly rent of 69*l.*, by quarterly payments, and that the plaintiff by the said indenture covenanted to pay rent and to repair the demised premises during the term. That after the making of the said indenture, and the entering by the plaintiff into the occupation of the said messuage and premises, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendants on the 3rd May 1860, as follows, namely, that the plaintiff should sell, and the defendants should purchase, the said lease for the then unexpired term thereof, for the sum of 60*l.*, and that the plaintiff should pay all rent, rates, and taxes, to the 9th May thereafter following, and should on such day give up possession of the said messuage and premises to the defendants, or whom they might appoint; that the plaintiff did give up possession of the said messuage and premises; and that the defendants afterwards entered upon the said messuage and premises, and became and were assignees of the said lease, and subject to the payment of the rent and observance and performance of the covenants and conditions and agreements, by virtue of the said lease to be observed and performed, and were so possessed as such assignees for a long space of time, whereupon it became and was their duty as such assignees to pay the rent and perform the covenants of the said lease for and during the time during which they should so remain possessed as assignees. Yet the defendants did not pay the rent, but permitted two quarters to be in arrear, and did not repair the premises, by reason of which breaches the executors of Thurgood sued and obtained judgment against the plaintiff for the rent and dilapidations, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay the sum of 158*l.* 16*s.* for damages and costs, and also incurred costs in defending himself against such action.

Pleas: 1. To first count, not guilty. 2. To same, traverse of the alleged demise to the plaintiff and of the plaintiff's covenant. 3. To same, that it was not agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendants as alleged, nor did the plaintiff give up possession of, nor did the defendants enter upon the said messuages and premises, nor did they become, nor were they, assignees of the said alleged lease, or subject to the payment of the rent, or performance of the covenants, nor were they possessed as such assignees, nor was there such alleged duty of the defendants as such assignees, as in that behalf alleged. 4. To same, that before the alleged breaches of duty, the defendants, by deed, assigned the term to one Thomas Higgins, who then entered into the premises and was possessed thereof for the residue of the term. 5. To the money counts, never indebted.

Issues thereon.

The trial took place before Pigott, B. at the sittings in Middlesex, after Trinity Term, when the facts appeared to be as follows: By lease dated 16th June 1845, Godfrey Thurgood leased to the plaintiff the premises in question, for twenty-four and three-quarter years, less twenty-one days, subject to covenants to repair and leave in repair. On the 8th Jan. 1846, the plaintiff assigned to one E. Bagley. Various mesne assignments took place, and the lease was finally re-assigned to the plaintiff, by one J. Clark, on the 21st Feb. 1859. On the 3rd May 1860, the defendants agreed to purchase the lease of plaintiff for 60%, for one of their customers, and plaintiff undertook to assign to whomsoever they should appoint. The plaintiff agreed to pay rent, rates, and taxes, up to the 9th May, on which day he agreed to give up possession. The defendants named one Bartley, as assignee, and the plaintiff executed an assignment to him on May 7th, subject to the covenants of the original lease, and which contained a covenant by Bartley, to perform such covenants and indemnify the plaintiff. On the 14th July 1860, the defendants took from Bartley a mortgage, by way of underlease, to secure advances made by them to him. On the 23rd Nov. 1860, Bartley assigned the lease, for the residue of the term, to defendants free from his equity of redemption, subject to the payment of rent and performance of the covenants. The assignment contained a covenant by defendants to indemnify Bartley from all actions which should be prosecuted against him, and all costs which he should incur by reason of the non-payment of the rent, and non-performance of the covenants. The defendants took possession of the premises and remained in possession till Jan. 29th 1867, when they assigned the lease to T. Higgins, he covenanting to pay the rent and perform the covenants and indemnify the defendants. On the 4th July 1866, Godfrey Thurgood gave the plaintiff notice to do certain repairs, and in April 1867, his executors sued plaintiff for breach of covenant. The plaintiff gave immediate notice of the action to the defendants, who replied that they had no interest in the lease. In Nov. 1867, the ground landlord recovered possession of the premises, against Higgins, by action of ejectment. The plaintiff let judgment go by default in the action by Thurgood's executors, and paid 158*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* for damages and costs. It was agreed that the sum of 75*l.* represented the amount of the dilapidations, which occurred during the time when defendants were assignees of the term.

On these facts the judge directed a verdict for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter it for himself for 75*l.*

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained against it, when Munisty, Q. C. and R. D. Bennett showed cause.—The case of Burnett v. Lynch, 5 B. & C. 589, will be relied on in support of the rule, but that was an action between the original lessee and his immediate assignee. Here there is an intermediate assignee, which is an altogether different case, inasmuch as there is no privity of contract between the parties. The observations made by Lord Denman in Wolveridge v. Steward, 1 C. & M. 659, tend, no doubt, to support the plaintiff's contention as there it is suggested that the ultimate assignee is in the nature of a principal debtor, and the original lessee in the nature of a surety, and, therefore, the latter, if sued for breaches of contract, can recover over against the assignee. But this was merely obiter dictum, and not necessary for the decision of the case; it professes moreover to be founded on Burnett v. Lynch, which does not really bear it out. There is an express covenant by Bartley with plaintiff, and by defendants with Bartley to indemnify against breaches of covenant, which excludes any implied covenant. The plaintiff's remedy was against Bartley his own immediate assignee.

H. T. Cole, Q. C. and Merewether, supported the rule.—The plaintiff is clearly entitled to recover according to the principle laid down in Burnett v. Lynch, and Wolveridge v. Steward. The assignee, whether immediate or not, being the person in enjoyment of the property which was the original consideration for the covenant, and having the control of it is bound to perform the covenants during his holding, and is primarily liable to the lessor for non-performance of them. The lessee, therefore, on the general principles of law, if compelled by law to pay damages for which another is primarily liable, is entitled to recover them from that other. He is in the nature of a surety, and the assignee in that of a principal. The existence of an express covenant between Bartley and defendants or between plaintiff and Bartley cannot affect or exclude any contract or duty arising between plaintiff and defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—CHANNELL, B.—This case came on for trial before my brother Pigott at the Middlesex sittings after last Trinity Term. There was no dispute as to the facts. A verdict pro formâ was directed for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him for the sum of 75*l.* This sum was agreed upon between the parties as the amount of the damage which, if any, the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the defendants, being the damages in respect of breaches of covenant by the defendants whilst they were assignees of the lease as hereinafter mentioned. In Michaelmas Term a rule to show cause was obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff. This rule was, in the absence of the Lord Chief Baron, argued before my brothers Pigott, Cleasby and myself; by Mr. Manisty on the part of the defendant, and Mr. H. T. Cole for the plaintiff. We took time to consider. I now proceed to deliver the judgments of my brother Pigott and myself. The facts are shortly these: The plaintiff was the lessee of certain premises under a lease containing covenants by him usual in leases. He assigned to one Bartley, who assigned to defendants. The defendants afterwards assigned over, but they had, during the time they were assignees, committed breaches of the covenants in the original lease. For these breaches of covenant the plaintiff, as lessee, was sued by the lessor, and he paid to him the before-mentioned sum of 76*l.* He now seeks to recover from the defendants the amount so paid by him to the lessor. The assignment to Bartley was made to him as the nominee of the defendants under a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants; but that does not appear to us to be material. It might be that by that contract the defendants expressly indemnified the plaintiff against all future breaches of covenant; such, however, does not appear from the contract as recited in the declaration. On the other hand, it would rather appear, from the fact that the assignment was not to be made direct to the defendants but to their nominee, that the intention was that the defendants should not be liable at all upon the covenants of the lease. It is therefore by the subsequent assignment by Bartley to the defendants that they become liable if at all. On the part of the plaintiff it was insisted that the case came within the principle of Burnett v. Lynch, 5 B. & C. 589. There the plaintiff, the lessee, had assigned directly to the defendants, whereas in the present case there is an intermediate assignee, and the question we have now to decide is whether this makes a material distinction between the cases. In Burnett v. Lynch, the liability of the defendant was based upon a duty on his part to perform the covenants upon which it was held the plaintiff could sue. This duty, however, appears to arise out of contract, and it has been held that where this is the case a stranger to the contract cannot sue for the breach of duty any more than he can for a breach of the contract: (Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109.) If, then, there is no contract, either expressed or implied, between the parties, no action can be maintained upon any duty as founded upon any contract by the defendants, either with Bartley or with any person other than the plaintiff. In Burnett v. Lynch, the judges appear to have thought there was a contract between the parties, though not a covenant, the assignment there having been by deed poll. The contract, then, must be considered to have arisen from the defendant's acceptance of the estate assigned to him by the deed poll. In subsequent cases, however, the principle upon which Burnett v. Lynch was decided has been further explained. In Humble v. Langston, 7 M. & W. 530, Baron Parke says, in reference to Burnett v. Lynch, "The assignee of a lease becomes liable to the lessor for the performance of all the covenants which run with the land, and the lessee is also liable in the nature of a surety as between himself and the assignee for the performance of the same covenant." In the case of Wolveridge v. Steward, 1 C. & M. 644, in the Exchequer Chamber, Lord Denman, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, after time taken to consider, said, "Burnett v. Lynch proceeds on the ground that during the continuance of the interest of the assignee there is a duty on his part to pay the rent and perform the covenants. . . . This duty, we think, would arise from the relation between the parties without any such words as are now under consideration (viz., subject to the performance of the same covenant, &c.), for the effect of the assignment is that the lessee becomes a surety to the lessor for the assignee who, as between himself and the lessor, is the principal bound whilst he is assignee to pay the rent. . . . And the surety, after paying the debt, or discharging the obligation to which he is liable, has his remedy over against the principal." He then goes on to add, "And he, that is the lessee, after discharging the obligation to which he is liable, would also, in all probability, have the same remedy over against each subsequent assignee in respect of breaches committed during the continuance of the interest of each of them, for the lessee is, in effect, a surety for each of them to the lessor. If that view be correct the plaintiff in this case is entitled to succeed. On the whole, we think it is correct. It is true there is no express contract between the parties, but they are each liable to the lessor for the performance of the covenants. They are each directly liable, and the lessor may sue either at his option, but the assignee having at the time the estate which has been the consideration for the covenants, ought as between himself and the lessee to perform them. Then it is only reasonable to hold, as was suggested in the cases quoted, that the liability of the lessee is as a surety for the assignee, and that there is an implied promise on the part of each assignee to indemnify the lessee against liability for breaches of covenant whilst he is assignee. If there is any implied promise on the part of any subsequent assignee after the first to indemnify any one in respect of breaches of covenant whilst he is assignee, it must be a promise to the original lessee, for none else is liable, except for breaches committed whilst he is assignee. It would of course require an express covenant to make an assignee liable for breaches after he had assigned over. In the present case there were such express covenants on the part of Bartley to Moule, and on the part of the defendants to Bartley, by which they both became liable to indemnify their immediate assignees for all breaches during the remainder of the term. These express covenants clearly create a greater liability than under the implied promise which was in Wolveridge v. Steward suggested, and which we think exists between assignee and original lessee. It does not seem to us that the fact that there is a liability on the part of the defendants towards their assignees upon an express covenant to indemnify him against all breaches not only in their own time, but subsequently, ought to induce us to hold that there can be no liability to the plaintiff upon an implied promise of indemnity not so extensive. In the present case there is a count for a breach of duty, and also a count for money paid. We think the plaintiff is entitled to recover on one of those counts. If there is such an implied promise, and such a duty arising upon it as we have described, the circumstances would be such that the law would infer a request so as to support the count for money paid. We do not think it any objection to this that the plaintiff paid to discharge his own liability, and not solely on behalf of the defendants. It is true that the plaintiff was directly liable to the lessor, but the defendants were so also, and as between the two, the defendants, having had the whole consideration for which this liability was undertaken in the enjoyment of the estate during the time that the breaches were committed, ought to have paid. The question involved in this case is one which may not unfrequently arise. We have not been able to find any decision directly in point. We have had the advantage of considering fully the views entertained by my brother Cleasby on the subject. We regret to find that there is a difference between us upon the point, and we are not unmindful of the doubts which his views suggest as to the correctness of our judgment. We admit that the passage we have quoted from Wolveridge v. Steward was only a dictum not necessary for the decision of the particular case before the court, but it was a dictum contained in a written judgment of the Exchequer Chamber. The view it suggests is, we think, in accordance with the justice of the case, and it is not, as far as we can find, opposed to any direct decision on the point. We are therefore of opinion that the rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiff should be made absolute.

MOULE v. GARRETT AND OTHERS.

CLEASBY, B.—In this case the plaintiff is lessee by deed of certain premises, which he covenanted to repair. He assigned to one Bartley, and Bartley assigned to the defendants. Both of these assignments contain covenants by the assignee with his assignor to perform the covenants in the lease, and indemnify his assignor against breaches of covenant.

MOULE v. GARRETT AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

The defendants afterwards assigned the lease, but while they were assignees there were breaches of the covenant to repair. The assignment by them was dated the 23rd Nov. 1860, and the breaches of the covenant to repair continued afterwards, and the premises became more dilapidated. Some time after the assignment by the defendants the lessor brought an action against the plaintiff as lessee for the breach of the covenant in the lease, and may be taken to have recovered a considerable sum in respect of the dilapidated condition of the premises, including the dilapidations while the defendants were assignees. The present action is brought to recover over against the defendants in respect of the dilapidations during their time. There is no doubt that the defendants were liable in that respect to the lessor, and were also liable to their assignor upon their covenant to repair, and to indemnify, to what extent as regards damages would depend on circumstances which it is unnecessary to consider. But the question in the present case is whether they are liable to the present plaintiff. In the first place it seems clear that the claim in the present case is one for unliquidated damages. The foundation and the sole foundation for the claim is the dilapidated condition of the premises during the time when the defendants were assignees, and whatever the plaintiff has been compelled to pay, the defendants were entitled to prove that during their time they properly repaired, or that the dilapidations were trifling. The count for money paid to the use of the plaintiff cannot, therefore, I think, be sustained. There is also another objection to that count being sustainable, viz., that the money was paid by the plaintiff in discharge of his own covenant as lessee when sued upon it; and he did not incur that liability at the request, express or implied, of the defendants; he incurred it for his own purposes when he became lessee, and before the defendants had or could have any interest in the matter. But another question of more difficulty arises, viz., whether as between the present plaintiff and defendants there is any legal liability by reason of the plaintiff having been compelled to pay under his covenant damages attributable in part to the time while the defendants were assignees. In the first place let us consider the contracts entered into. The plaintiff by the lease covenants with the lessor to repair, and that is the only contract entered into by him. He afterwards assigns his interest; and as he cannot get rid of his liability he protects himself by taking from his assignee, Bartley, an absolute covenant to perform the several covenants in the lease, and to indemnify him, the plaintiff, from all breaches. This is the only contract entered into with the plaintiff. As regards the defendants the only contracts entered into by them are those which result from the deed of assignment to them which they execute, and the effect of this deed is to make them covenant with the lessor to perform the covenants in the lease, and covenant to the same effect with their assignor. The first covenant is founded on the privity of estate between them and the lessor, and the second upon the express contract contained in the deed. It cannot be contended that there is any covenant with the lessee, and the express contracts by deed exclude any implied contract. But a question remains whether by virtue of the relation between the parties, viz., the one being lessee and the other assignees of the lease, there arose a duty, independent of contract, to perform the covenants, and it was contended that there was such a duty, upon the authority of the case of Burnett v. Lynch and what was said by Lord Denman in giving judgment in the case of Wolveridge v. Stewart. In the first cited case it was held that upon the assignment of a lease by the plaintiff to the defendant by deed poll, the defendant not executing the assignment or entering into an express covenant, yet as the assignee took the estates from the lessee, subject to the covenants, there was a duty on his part of the assignment to perform the covenants, in respect of a breach of which the plaintiff could maintain his action. This decision has never been questioned; but it is to be observed in that case the transaction was between those two parties, and there was a clear privity between them, the one taking the estate from the other. In the case secondly referred to, of Wolveridge v. Stewart, it was in substance decided that the assignee of a lease is, in the absence of an express covenant, liable to his assignee only in respect of breaches of covenant which occur before he assigns over. At the close of the judgment it is said:—"For the effect of the assignment is that the lessee becomes a surety to the lessor for the assignee, who between himself and the lessor is the principal bound, while he is assignee, to pay the rent and perform the covenants running with the estate and the surety after paying the debt, or discharging the obligations to which he is liable, has his remedy over against the principal. And he would also in all probability have the like remedy over against each subsequent assignee in respect of breaches committed during the continuance of the interest of each." It is entirely upon the authority of this dictum that it is contended that the present action is maintainable. It is to be observed with reference to this case that the learned judge had just before referred to Burnett v. Lynch, and is certainly not speaking of cases in which the several assignees had entered into covenants by deed. It may also, I think, be questioned whether the terms principal and surety are properly applied in this dictum to remote assignee and lessee. In the case of Humble v. Langston, which was an action for indemnity against calls, Parke, B. said that the relation between lessee and his assignee was in the nature of that of surety and principal. This must not be read as a decision that they really stood in that legal relation, but the idea is adopted and extended in the dictum referred to in Wolveridge v. Stewart. It is there, however, introduced by the words "in all probability." There is some resemblance no doubt between the two relations, because it is the duty in the first instance of the assignee who is in possession, to repair, and his neglect to do so causes the liability of the lessee; but when we consider on what the lessor's claim against him is founded, it is not as surety, but as the person contracting as principal, and in fact, the only person contracting, and it would rather seem that the contract or duty between the lessee and his assignee, if implied, is of the same nature as is generally expressed between them and expressed in this case, viz., one of indemnity, and not of suretyship. The contract of a surety on behalf of his principal is of a special nature with peculiar incidents attached to it; for instance, the giving of time to the principal discharges the surety. But it could hardly be contended that the covenant of the lessee would be discharged by giving time to the assignee. I cannot help thinking that the word surety in the passages referred to is rather used by way of illustration than of defining the legal relationship of the parties, and that any conclusion founded upon the use of the word could not be safely relied on. It appears to me that between such remote parties there is an entire absence of that privity which is required to raise any implied contract between them or any duty in respect of which an action can be brought. No attempt has, up to the present time, been made to enforce such a liability. The question is, does any duty arise out of the relation of the parties independent of contract? It may be tested thus: Suppose upon the sale of a lease near the end of a term, with a prospect of heavy dilapidations, the contract to be that the assignee shall pay a certain premium, and the assignee take upon himself all the repairs for the residue of the term, and this was afterwards carried into effect by the assignment, the assignor covenanting with the assignee to do all requisite repairs and pay for the dilapidations. The assignee would, of course, be liable to the lessor by virtue of the privity of estate; but could it be said that in such a case there was any duty or obligation to indemnify the lessee arising from the relation between the parties? I think not; and if that be correct, it appears decisive of the present question. But further, it seems a very strong objection against implying any such duty as is relied on, that if the plaintiff were to recover against the defendants in the present case, that recovery would not be a bar to a subsequent action in respect of the breach at the suit of Bartley against the defendants upon their express covenant. The question of damages would be a complicated one, but the right to recover can hardly be questioned, and in case the recovery in the present action was not productive of satisfaction, and damages were afterwards recovered against Bartley by the present plaintiff in respect of the non-repair during Bartley's term, the defendants would be liable to Bartley upon their covenant in respect of a portion of the damages recovered in the present action. This difficulty does not exist in the case of Burnett v. Lynch, and it forms a real distinction between the two cases. It may further be noticed, in considering the general question whether such a duty arose that premises might be assigned in parts by an assignor to several assignees, one building to one, land to another, and other buildings to others, with particular covenants as between the assignor and assignees as to each, to all which the lessee is an entire stranger; and this increases the difficulty of holding that there is any privity or duty as between the lessee and the several remote assignees. Upon the whole matter, it certainly appears to me that the doctrine of Burnett v. Lynch cannot be properly extended to the present case, and that the rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff ought to be discharged.

POTTER v. RANKIN.Marine insurance—Policy on freight—Notice of abandonment.

The ship Sir Wm. Eyre, on her voyage out to New Zealand, got aground in a harbour at which she stopped; she completed her voyage, but had received great injury, the extent of which, however, could not be discovered at her destination, as there was no dry dock in which to examine her. The master had to wait in New Zealand nine months for remittances from home, being unable to obtain there a sufficient sum to discharge liabilities which had been incurred through his default. The ship then proceeded to Calcutta, where a charter awaited her, and it was there found that the cost of her repairs from the injury sustained on her voyage out would exceed her value. Notice of abandonment was then given by the owners to the underwriters of policies on the outward voyage, amongst which was one upon freight chartered homeward from Calcutta, the subject of this action. About three months after the notice of abandonment was given, the ship was totally lost during a cyclone in the Hooghly, and about a month afterwards the charterer from Calcutta stopped payment:

Held, by the Exchequer Chamber (dissentiente Cleasby, B.), reversing the decision of the Common Pleas, that the notice of abandonment having been given as soon as the state of the vessel was ascertained, was sufficient to render the loss of both ship and freight constructively total; and further that the rule requiring notice of abandonment with respect to freight attaches only when there is something of appreciable value to relinquish, and that in this case it was not necessary:

Held (by Kelly, C.B., Channell, B., and Lush, J.), that the notice of abandonment of freight was unnecessary for another reason also—viz., because the notice of abandonment of ship was sufficient to make the loss of ship constructively total, and therefore between the parties to this action, the shipowners and the underwriters of the above-mentioned policy on freight, the total loss of freight was actual and absolute.

This was an action between mortgagees in possession of the ship Sir William Eyre, and an underwriter of Lloyd's, upon a policy of insurance to cover the outward voyage from Great Britain to New Zealand, commenced at the time the policy was made, upon the freight chartered homeward from Calcutta.

The Court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J., Willes and Keating, JJ.), on the 3rd June 1868, discharged a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The pleadings and the judgments of that court are reported L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562; 18 L. T. Rep. 712. This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from that decision.

The following are the material dates and short facts of the case; the details and the correspondence are sufficiently stated in the judgments.

Dec. 1862.—Ship sailed from Glasgow for Otago, New Zealand.

April 24, 1863.—Arrived at Bluff Harbour, New Zealand.

May 16.—Got aground in Bluff Harbour.

July 1.—Finally got off the ground, greatly damaged.

July 4.—Arrived at Otago, where she was detained for nine months, the master having to wait for remittances to satisfy the claims of passengers and owners of cargo, incurred partly through his default. The extent of the damage done to the ship was not discovered at Otago, as there was no dry dock in which to examine her.

April 14, 1864.—Ship sailed from Otago for Calcutta, where a charter was awaiting her.

June 5.—Arrived at Calcutta, where she was subsequently surveyed. The surveyors estimated the value of the ship, after the repairs rendered necessary by the damage sustained in Bluff Harbour had been carried out, at 5264*l*. The smallest tender for repairs was more than 6000*l*., and the highest was 7500*l*.

Aug. 2.—Notice of abandonment was given by the owners to the underwriters of policies entered into for the voyage to New Zealand.

Oct. 4.—Ship totally lost during a cyclone in the Hooghly.

Oct. 30.—Wreck sold for 1430*l*.

Dec. 8.—The charterer from Calcutta stopped payment.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. (with him Lanjon), argued for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 11.—The following judgments were delivered :

CLEASBY, B.—This is an action on a policy of insurance on freight. For the purpose of the present case the facts may be shortly stated thus: The vessel, Sir William Eyre, was chartered on the 9th Feb., 1863, for a voyage to New Zealand, thence to Calcutta, and from Calcutta to London. The insurance in question was effected two days afterwards, and was for the voyage to New Zealand, and the subject matter insured was freight to be earned under the charter from Calcutta to London. The insurance, therefore, is for the earlier part of the voyage out, and the thing insured is the freight home, so that the perils insured against are at an end long before the cargo by which the freight is to be earned is on board. This is not a usual transaction, because in general the whole voyage is insured by the same underwriters; but there is no valid objection to it. The vessel, before the termination of the voyage insured, got aground, and was with great difficulty got off; and she sustained such damage that, on her arrival at New Zealand, she was in such a state as to make her necessary repairs cost more than she would have been worth when repaired. This was not known at New Zealand, there being no means there of ascertaining the real condition of the vessel. After a great delay, during which the vessel was used as a store ship for coals at a considerable rent, some repairs were done, so as to enable her to proceed to Calcutta, and on April 14, 1864, she proceeded there, and arrived in safety. Upon her arrival she was properly overhauled, and her real condition was ascertained. Thereupon, the vessel itself, as well as the freight being insured, notice of abandonment was, on Aug. 2, 1864, given to the underwriters both on ship and on freight. The ship was, in fact, totally lost while lying at Calcutta, in the cyclone of Oct. 4, 1864; but this loss has nothing to do with the present claim. This action is brought to recover the freight insured as before mentioned; and the question is whether the facts stated entitle the plaintiff to recover for a total loss of the chartered freight. It was not contended that there was any case to recover for a partial loss, and, indeed, upon such a policy no such claim could possibly arise. The Court of Common Pleas had decided in a previous action, Potter v. Campbell, 17 L. T. Rep. N.S. 474 (note), brought to recover upon a policy on the ship in respect of the same voyage and damage, that there was no sufficient notice of abandonment, and therefore the plaintiff in that action could not recover as for a total loss of the ship; and they held in the present case, as I understand the judgment, that, there being no absolute total loss of the ship, there was no total loss of the freight; and, therefore, that the plaintiff could not in that way complete his title to recover; and they gave judgment for the defendant. From this judgment error has been brought into the Exchequer Chamber. Two questions have been argued: first, whether there is such a total loss of the freight as to entitle the plaintiff to recover independently of any notice of abandonment; and, secondly, supposing such notice to be necessary, whether the notice given on Aug. 2, 1864, was a sufficient one. In considering the question of total loss, it is necessary in the first place to examine what is the real nature of the interest which is said to be totally lost. It is not, as is usually the case, an interest in anything which exists, and of which possession can be had; as, for instance, a ship, or cargo, or even freight of cargo on board, of which the lien on the cargo gives a qualified possession; but, in such a case of chartered freight as the present, the interest is only a right to have cargo provided; it can only be enforced by action, and is in the nature of a chose in action. It is a right which may be of considerable or of little value. If, for instance, the chartered freight is high in relation to the current rate at the port of loading, and the charterer is a solvent person, then the right is of considerable value; but if the current rate is higher than the freight, or the charterer has become bankrupt or insolvent, it is of no value. It appears as a fact in the present case that Mr. De Mattos, the charterer, stopped payment in December, 1864, and that no cargo would have been provided under the charter after that month. In such a case as the present, that fact, from the form of the policy, would have no effect upon the amount to be recovered in the action, if the perils insured against caused a total inability to earn the freight; it is only adverted to for the purpose of showing how peculiar the subject matter of insurance is when the perils insured against terminate before there is any interest in possession. The first question then for consideration in this case is whether, the damage done being such as to make the cost of repairs exceed the value of the ship when repaired, this of itself has the same effect as the actual loss of the ship, and makes the freight recoverable as totally lost. I am of opinion that it has not. I may observe that this is the proper question to be considered, though the question chiefly argued was whether an abandonment was necessary or not—a mode of argument which assumes that such damage to the ship must, with abandonment of the freight, amount to a total loss of the freight; whereas, in so peculiar a policy as this, the interest may be such as not to admit of abandonment, and so the policy only covers an actual total loss. We are dealing at present with the mere fact of damages to the extent mentioned, and not with the knowledge of that fact by the assured, and any election which he may make thereupon. All other cases of total loss of freight by loss of the ship are necessary consequences of the facts themselves, and this, if it be a case of total loss of the freight by what has happened, must be so too. If the ship goes to the bottom, or becomes a mere wreck, incapable of repair, or is justifiably sold, in each of these cases the total loss of freight is a necessary consequence of the facts themselves. But how can it be said that the necessary consequence of the ship being so damaged is that the freight is totally lost? The utmost that can be said is that the earning it is made very expensive; and this would depend upon the extent to which the repairs would exceed the value, and the amount of freight which would probably be earned by repairing. The general rule is that there is no actual total loss while the thing remains in specie, however much it may be damaged. It must either be destroyed, or its recovery be made irretrievably hopeless. This is the rule laid down in the text books (Arnould, sect. 364), and is the effect of all the authorities. The case of Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N.C. 266, relied upon in the argument for the plaintiff, seems at first sight at variance with it, because in that case, which was an insurance on cargo, it was held that hides were totally lost, which, though they existed at the time as hides, were damaged in such a manner and to such an extent that they could not be carried to their destination so as to be there delivered as hides. But that decision is placed upon a satisfactory ground by the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Knight v. Faith, 15 Q. B. 649; where it is explained that the decision proceeded upon the ground of the hides being virtually destroyed. The judgment in that case, which appears to me a most convincing one, corrects some erroneous opinions on the subject of abandonment, which were gaining ground; and the authorities which are fully considered in it justify the rule above laid down. What is said by Lord Abinger in Roux v. Salvador is there adopted—viz.: “If he elect to do this” (that is to treat damage as a total loss), “as the thing insured, or a portion of it still exists, and is vested in him, the very principle of insurance requires that he should make a cession of all his right to the recovery of it, that the underwriters may be entitled to the full benefit of what may be still of any value.” In the present case the thing insured is the right to earn the freight, and this is neither destroyed nor irretrievably lost because the ship is damaged to the extent alleged. The condition of realising it, viz., repairing the vessel, is not made impossible, but expensive, and therefore difficult of performance. But this expense and difficulty form the equivalent in such a case to damage to the thing, where the thing exists in specie, and mere damage to any extent does not constitute a total loss. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the damaged condition of the ship in such a case was a commercial total loss of the freight. There are two answers to this, if it has any definite meaning—first, that it might be said with equal force that such damaged condition of a ship was commercially an actual total loss thereof because the vessel was not worth repairing, yet still, without abandonment, there is no total loss; and secondly, that, in point of fact, though the damaged condition of the ship may in some cases make it a losing affair, and therefore not commercial to repair and earn the freight, yet the contrary might be the case, and the commercial result of repairing would depend upon a variety of considerations. It is true that, upon such damage to the ship, if the shipowner elects, as he is entitled to do, to proceed no further with the voyage, and makes this known to the charterer, and so discharges the charterer and the charter is put an end to, there is then absolutely nothing to abandon. What the effect of such election would be upon the policy on freight is another question; but, as long as the charter continues in force, it can hardly be said that there is absolutely nothing to abandon. It often happens that the captain has made considerable progress in repairing the ship before the real extent of the damage is ascertained, and it is only when the owners receive the final survey and accounts that it is made known to them to be a case justifying an abandonment. Now, suppose this to occur, and the master to complete the repairs, and to proceed on the voyage with the ship, acting, as he is bound to do, for the benefit of all concerned. The owners at the proper time abandoned the freight to the underwriters. Would not the effect of this be that they would be entitled to recover upon their policy on freight, and the underwriters would be entitled as assignees—for the abandonment has the effect of an assignment—to the freight earned? And if the ship was lost, either in proceeding to the port of loading, or from thence to the port of discharge, and so no freight earned, would not the owner have completed his title to recover against the underwriters, and the underwriters lose what may be called their salvage? This is not a fanciful case, but abandonments have again and again taken place, not only after the repairs are completed, but after the freight has been earned. This was so in the leading cases on the subject of abandonment to underwriters on freight: Benson v. Chapman, 6 M. and G. 792; Scottish Marine Insurance Company v. Turner, 3 H. L. Cas. 312n. Thus, such damage as has been mentioned does not necessarily involve as a consequence the loss of a prospective freight; and it seems to me to follow from this that, as there ought to be a clear and definite rule of abandonment, and not one depending upon the accidental circumstances of each case, and since there must be an abandonment in some cases to entitle the assured to recover, there ought to be in all. Notice was given in this case in conformity with the usage, and the usage makes it the right of the underwriter. Convenience also is in favour of it. For if the notice of abandonment is given, the underwriter knows his position; whereas, if not, he may not know for years whether he is to be held responsible or not. He cannot know the exact extent of damage or the probability of the owner repairing in each particular case; and the rule seems to be a reasonable and convenient one, that the owner should inform him of his determination in the usual way, viz., by notice of abandonment. Another consequence may be noticed. If the notice be given, and freight be afterwards earned under such circumstances as I have mentioned, the underwriter has acquired a title to the freight, and the underwriter who has the benefit of the abandonment as assignee of the freight has also liabilities as shipowner cast upon him, and there are settled rules apportioning the expenses of earning the freight between the owner and underwriter. In applying what has been said to the present case, it must be borne in mind that the captain proceeded from Dunedin to Calcutta, under the charter. In his letter from Calcutta of June 8, 1864, he says, “I have at last arrived at my chartered port, where I find freights low and charterers so scarce, the sole cause of all my stopping at New Zealand;” and he afterwards says that he on that day advertised per charterer’s agent, so that his lay days might begin. Up to that time, therefore, he was sailing under the charter party, and there was no total loss of the freight; and the question seems fairly raised, whether, by reason of any unjustified delay of the plaintiff’s, which had thus taken place, the abandonment of the freight which came afterwards was not too late. I must, therefore, give some opinion upon the sufficiency of the abandonment. The rule appears to be correctly laid down in Arnould, vol. 2, p. 1164, that as soon as the owner has all the requisite information he must abandon immediately, but that in the case of stranding or partial wreck he may wait “a reasonable time, in order that he may have the opportunity of ascertaining with more precision the real extent of the damage.” In the present case it may be taken that as soon as he had the requisite information he abandoned immediately. The question is whether the time taken in obtaining the information was not unreasonable, being attributable in a great measure to the default of the owner and his agents. It is very much a question of fact, and, under ordinary circumstances, if I found my learned brothers had all arrived at a clear conclusion, it is very unlikely that I should differ from them; but in this case the judges of the Court of Common Pleas have arrived at an opposite conclusion, and I am, therefore, bound to form my own opinion. In endeavouring to apply the rule above given, we meet with the following facts: The disaster occurred in May and June 1863, and the extent of damage was ascertained in August 1864, when the abandonment took place. It may be taken that, between the damage and Sept. 4, 1863, there was no delay, and also that between April 14, 1864, and the abandonment there was no delay; and the question comes to this, whether the plaintiffs can justify the delay between Sept. 4, 1863, and April 14, 1864, during which time the vessel was detained at Dunedin for want of funds. The materials for accounting for this want of funds are very imperfect. A long correspondence is given, but important letters are omitted. For instance, the plaintiffs in their letter of Dec. 24, 1863, to Dalgetty and Co., say: "We trust that on receipt of our August letter you will have arranged to advance the money requisite, and allow the ship to proceed." The January letter also refers to the August letter as having been sufficiently explicit; but the August letter is not given, and we could have judged from it whether it was the fault of the plaintiffs in giving insufficient instructions, or of Messrs. Dalgetty in not attending to them. Another omission is in not giving the accounts which were inclosed in the letters. The letter of Dalgetty and Co. of Feb. 16, 1864, incloses an account showing a balance of 2116*l.* due to them for disbursements, subsequent to Jan. 17, 1863, on which day a letter inclosed another account, showing a balance of 450*l.*, which was drawn for. Neither of these accounts is given, and they would have shown exactly what payments had been made, and what money received for freight and passage; in their absence this was left to contradictory statements and argument. These documents should have come from the plaintiffs, as they have to account for the delay. We know that the expenses of getting the ship off were 1378*l.* 14*s.* (letter of Dalgetty and Co. July 17, 1863), and we know by another letter of the same date that this was liquidated by means of money received for passage money or freight, and the bill for 450*l.*; but how the immense subsequent expenses, viz., 2116*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* and 351*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, in addition to what was received for freight, and the sum of 758*l.* received for hire of the ship, arose—how much for the temporary repairs, how much for claims against the ship for damage to cargo, and other defaults of the master, we do not know, as far as I can collect, except the breach of the Emigration Act, amounting to 150*l.* The conclusion at which I have arrived is that, for the delay between Sept. 4 and April 14, the master, the plaintiffs, and Messrs. Dalgetty were all to some extent to blame. The correspondence of the plaintiffs contained complaints of Messrs. Dalgetty, for not making advances according to instructions, and the latter were always complaining that they had insufficient instructions. Such a delay could not have occurred without someone being in fault, and it is accounted for in this way: either the plaintiffs did not authorise Messrs. Dalgetty to clear the ship, or if they did, then the latter were backward in doing so. It appears to me that, from whichever of these causes the delay originated, it cannot be justified as against the underwriters. It is a fair inference that if the instructions contained in the letter of August 26 had been as explicit as the plaintiffs thought they were, and as they ought to have been, the ship would have been cleared and despatched in Nov. 1863, instead of April 1864; and in that way this very long delay was the fault of the plaintiffs themselves. The captain was to blame for increasing the charges on the ship by his own default and misconduct to a large amount, though, in the absence of the accounts, we cannot say how much. It may have been so large as to have increased the difficulty of clearing the ship, and so have contributed to the delay. He was also in fault for not acquainting his owners with the extent of damage. They complain in their letter to him of Dec. 1, 1863, that he had never sent them the surveys. The ship had either been actually aground, or from time to time taking the ground from some day in May, previous to the 22nd, when she first floated, until July 1; and her weight being of course very great, the burthen being 1316 tons, serious damage was probable. Accordingly, it appears by the survey of July 10 that "she was much strained fore and aft; cast of mainmast seven inches down from its proper place; all the iron knees between deck strained." This appears to me to indicate the probability of damage to the framework of the ship; but it certainly appears that, though the captain wrote on July 17, ten days after the survey, he gives them no idea of the effect of this survey, and their letters of Sept. 24 to him and to Messrs. Dalgetty show that they had a very imperfect idea of what had happened, and they made no provision accordingly. The final survey at Port Chalmers of Sept. 4 agrees with what we should expect from the first, recommending that the ship should proceed in ballast on the intended voyage, and that she should "be put in a dry dock or patent slip for further examination"—not for repairs, but for further examination. It strikes me that, as soon as it is made out that such a damaged vessel cannot be made a seaworthy vessel for a cargo without going into a dry dock for examination, it becomes a case in which no delay can be justified as against the underwriters in procuring that examination. It is only necessary to add upon this part of the case that the letter of plaintiffs of Oct. 24, with directions to clear the ship, would be received at the end of Dec. 1863 or the beginning of Jan. 1864. I can find no excuse whatever for the delay between this time and the 14th April, when the vessel sailed for Calcutta. In their January letter of the 18th, Messrs. Dalgetty make no reference to the ship starting. In their February letter of the 16th they only express their regret at having been blamed for the detention of the ship. In their March letter of the 18th all they say is, "This vessel is still in port discharging her coals, but we expect her to get away by the end of the month;" and she did sail on the 14th April. There may have been some reason for this, so as to excuse the apparent neglect of Messrs. Dalgetty, but that could not excuse the delay as against the underwriters. When the assured has all the necessary information, he must abandon at once; and five days, though in a somewhat peculiar case, have been held too long an interval. But he has a reasonable time for acquiring the information, and there must be no delay in doing so. It certainly appears to me for the reasons given, that in this case the very long interval between the disaster and the abandonment is not properly accounted for; that the delay between September, 1863, and April, 1864, or some substantial part of it, was the fault of the plaintiffs or their agents, and that in that way the abandonment was out of time. I very much question whether in any case, where the further survey of a damaged vessel is ordered, the assured can be guilty of unreasonable delay, and afterwards, if the survey leads to abandonment, excuse themselves by saying we did not contemplate and had no reason to contemplate the abandonment during the delay. I rather think not. But, in the present case it appears to me that there was enough in the nature of the accident, and in the surveys at Port Chalmers, to prevent the plaintiffs from recovering for a total loss if they were guilty of delay in ascertaining the real extent of damage. The foregoing conclusions are sufficient for the decision of this case, viz., (1) that the alleged damage to the ship did not of itself constitute a total loss of the freight; and (2) that the owner has by unreasonable delay lost the opportunity of making it into a total loss. The case has been so far considered with reference to the grounds discussed in the argument. But before concluding, I wish to add the following: I have endeavoured to show that in such a case as the present an abandonment is not necessarily inoperative, and therefore inapplicable. The conclusion arrived at may be a doubtful one. If it was clearly established that, in so peculiar a case as this, the transaction was such as not to admit of abandonment at all, then another question would arise—viz., whether such a policy covered anything but an actual total loss of the freight by actual total loss of the ship. The judgment of the Court of

Common Pleas puts the decision upon two alternatives, and this is one of them; and it may, I think, be well contended that, if there cannot be an abandonment, there cannot be a constructive total loss. The conclusion may not appear to meet the justice of the case; but, if the matter is examined, it is accounted for by this—viz., that under such a policy there cannot be a partial loss. In the case of an insurance on ship or cargo, if there is damage to any extent, the assured may treat it as a partial loss, and recover his damages; or he has the option, if the damage is sufficient, of converting the partial loss into a constructive total loss by abandonment. But in a policy on prospective freight, like this, where, when the risk terminates, there is no interest except in contract, the case is different. There cannot be a partial loss; and, therefore, it may be contended that there cannot be a turning of a partial loss into a constructive total loss, and that the policy only covers an actual total loss of freight by total loss of ship. There is only one other matter which was particularly noticed during the argument, and I can hardly pass it over. Up to this time the case has been considered as if the owner had only insured the freight, and there was no insurance on the ship. But it occurred to me that, as there was also an insurance on the ship in this case, and an abandonment of the ship to the underwriters, the abandonment of the ship, if sufficient, might have a bearing upon the case. It seems contrary to principle that what is done under one contract should affect the rights acquired under another distinct one; but the answer is given in the judgment of the court below. The objection referred to is discussed in Phillips on Insurance, s. 1649; and, after giving a full answer to it, and showing what the rule was in England from the cases on the subject, he adds (s. 1650): "The fact that the underwriters on freight may be affected by the circumstances of the ship being insured and abandoned is an irregularity in jurisprudence. The doctrine adopted in the United States is preferable, as it makes the irregularity less than it is under the English doctrine." In the present case, the only interest in freight which the owner possessed was the right to have cargo provided, and he was under a corresponding obligation to be at the port of loading to receive the cargo, subject of course to the usual exception of perils of the seas. Now, by abandoning to the underwriters on ship, he avails himself of this exception in the charter party, and elects not to be bound to receive a cargo, and discharges himself from it; and, as he cannot transfer to the underwriters on ship any obligation to complete the voyage, it follows that the charterer has no person bound under the charter party to take his cargo, and he is of course discharged from it himself. The consequence is that the assured, by his own act abandoning to the underwriters on ship, destroys the right which was his only interest in the subject matter of insurance—freight; and, having done this for his own interest, and to complete his demand against the underwriters, and so destroyed the right to earn freight at all, can he come against the underwriters on freight upon this contract of indemnity? It is obvious that, in such a case, the interest in the freight being destroyed, there could be, by the act of the owner, nothing to abandon to the underwriters on freight. It certainly appears unreasonable that a man who, in consequence of sea damage, properly abandons the ship, should be prejudiced by doing so as against the underwriters on freight. But it has been so adjudged. It is only necessary to refer to the case of The Scottish Marine Insurance Company v. Turner in the House of Lords, 1 McQ. 234. In that case the assured abandoned to the respective underwriters on ship and freight. The ship had been repaired, and proceeded on her voyage, and it was not known that the damage was such as to justify an abandonment until after the arrival of the ship with her cargo on board at the port of discharge. The effect of the abandonment of the ship was to transfer to the underwriters not only the ship, but also the freight; and the freight was thus lost in consequence of the perils insured against to the assured, and he brought his action in Scotland upon his insurance on freight. The Court of Session held, with apparent reason, that he was entitled to recover, the real cause of the loss to him being the perils insured against, and the abandonment of the ship being a proper act superinduced by those perils; and they thought it made no difference that the freight was earned by the captain, who became agent for the ship underwriters, as it was lost to the plaintiff. But the House of Lords reversed this decision, and held that the freight was lost to the assured by his own election in abandoning to the underwriters on ship, and not by the perils which caused that election, and that he could not recover. If the loss of freight in this case be regarded as the consequence of the owner's election to abandon the ship, then if the abandonment of the freight at Calcutta was sufficient, so was the abandonment of the ship; and the latter may have had the effect of destroying the plaintiff's right to recover. My brother Lush, in the course of the argument, gave a conclusive answer to this objection, if the fact was as he supposed—viz., that, at the time of the abandonment of the ship at Calcutta, the charter was gone, and there was no existing interest under it whatever. I had rather considered the case generally, as if the abandonment had taken place at Port Chalmers. At the same time, after the captain's letter from Calcutta before referred to, I do not see how the charter can be said to have been at an end. I know this view, founded upon the effect of the abandonment of the ship, finds no favour with my learned brothers; and I therefore advance it with diffidence, and leave it with what has been already said. If the sufficiency of the abandonment had not been argued, it might have been necessary to consider it further; and, I may add, that, as soon as an admitted irregularity in jurisprudence is introduced, we must not be surprised if we are led to conclusions which are apparently unsatisfactory. But the reasons before given are those upon which I rely, and which lead me to the conclusion that there is no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment of the court below, and that it ought to be affirmed.

COCKBURN, C. J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance on freight, to be earned by a ship named the Sir William Eyre, under a charter party with one De Mattos, wherein the ship was described as then on a voyage to New Zealand, and whereby it was agreed that she was to sail to New Zealand with cargo for owner's benefit, and, having discharged, should proceed to Calcutta, and there load from the freighters a full and complete cargo, and proceed therewith to London. The policy applied only to the chartered freight from Calcutta to London, and attached only on the preliminary voyage from London to New Zealand. It described the interest as "on homeward chartered freight," and the voyage insured as "from the Clyde to Southland, New Zealand, while there, and thence to Otago, New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival." The ship arrived at Bluff Harbour, Southland, on 20th April, 1863. Whilst there she took the ground and sustained damage but was got off and floated on the 22nd May. On the 29th May, a violent gale coming on, she again grounded, and was not got afloat again till the 6th June; and before she could be got into the Channel she grounded a third time, and was not finally got off till the 1st July. She then left for Port Chalmers, the port of Dunedin, where she arrived on the 4th July. A survey was held on her at Bluff Harbour, and others were held on her at Port Chalmers, and it was found that she had sustained much damage; but the extent of the damage could not be there ascertained, as it was necessary for that purpose that she should be taken into a dry dock or put on a patent slip, neither of which existed in New Zealand, or were to be found anywhere nearer than Sydney. In point of fact, as the sequel showed, the amount of damage, though not sufficient to prevent the vessel, after having undergone partial repair at New Zealand, from proceeding in ballast on her voyage to Calcutta, was such as to necessitate such an amount of repair in order to render her seaworthy to carry cargo, as to warrant the owner, had he then been aware of the actual extent of the damage, in treating the loss as a constructive total loss. There was nothing, however, in the extent of damage discovered at New Zealand to lead the master to apprehend that such was the state of the vessel. In a survey held on her at Bluff Harbour, dated May 27, 1863, though the surveyors report that the vessel "has strained in some degree aft," and that "the mainmast appears to have settled below its original sheathing about two inches," and recommended that, "as they are unable to ascertain if any damage is done to the vessel below water, she should be resurveyed and her bottom examined at the first convenient port she arrives at," they go on to state that, "so far as they can see, she has sustained no damage which will prevent her from proceeding on her voyage," and that they "are of opinion that she may with safety proceed to her final destination." Further surveys were held on the ship at Port Chalmers on July 10, and on Aug. 25 and 29. The surveyors, having ascertained, as far as could be done, the injuries the vessel had sustained, while they recommended certain specified repairs, and further advised "that the vessel's top-sides, decks, waterways, and stanchions shall be thoroughly caulked, and that she shall be docked at the first port of arrival," expressly stated that "on each survey they examined the pumps, and found that the ship was making but an inch of water per day," and further, that having been under the ship's bottom, they found that on the starboard side only a narrow strip of copper, about four feet long, by two inches broad, was wanting; that her stern had a little copper off, and that on her port side and bottom they found nothing whatever the matter, except a narrow strip two inches wide and fourteen feet long. The cargo having in the meantime been discharged, a further survey was held on Sept. 14, 1863, and the surveyors having, as they state, "had bilge planks out on both sides in the hold abreast of the mainmast,"—while they recommend that certain things shall be done to the ship, and further, that at the next port available at which the vessel may call, she should be put in a dry dock or on a patent slip for further examination, and also that on such occasion certain other things should be done—expressly declare that they "find the vessel perfectly tight, and have no hesitation in recommending the captain to proceed in ballast on his intended voyage as soon as the necessary repairs recommended have been completed." On none of these surveys does the real state of the ship, as afterwards disclosed, appear to have been even surmised; and the recommendation that she should be put in a dry dock or on a slip at some future port, seems rather to have been suggested as a matter of proper precaution, to see if any other repairs should be necessary to make her perfectly seaworthy and safe, than from any apprehension of extensive damage beyond that which had been already ascertained. I see no reason to doubt that the master participated in this view, and entertained a full belief of being able, after the repairs recommended by the surveyors had been effected at Port Chalmers, to prosecute his voyage and bring his cargo home, even though a further examination should be had at Calcutta, and further repairs might, on such examination, be found to be necessary. The master would have proceeded to get the necessary repairs done, but found himself in difficulty for want of funds. The freight receivable in respect of the outward cargo was to be received by the master at New Zealand, and would have been sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses of the ship; but considerable expenses had been incurred in getting the ship off on the different occasions when she took the ground at Bluff Harbour, and, in consequence of her detention there, it became necessary to hire a steamer to take on the passengers; and it further appears that numerous claims had been made by passengers, who had come out in the ship as emigrants, on account of breaches of the provisions of the Passengers Act, and legal proceedings having been instituted to enforce such claims, the master had found himself compelled, as a matter of prudence, to compromise with the claimants at a considerable sacrifice. Claims were also made by consignees of cargo in respect of damage and short delivery, which the master was in like manner compelled to settle. Through the expenses thus incurred, not only were the proceeds received by the master in respect of freight exhausted, but considerable advances had been made to him by the plaintiff's agents at Dunedin, Messrs. Dalgetty, Rattray, and Co., the consignees of the ship. Further funds being required for the repairs found by the surveyors to be necessary, Dalgetty, Rattray, and Co. being aware that the plaintiffs were not the owners, but only the mortgagees of the ship, declined to advance the funds required to pay for these repairs and to clear the ship, without specific directions from the plaintiffs, and wrote to them to that effect by letter of August 17. The master thereupon advertised for a loan of 2400*l.* on bottomry, but, finding it impossible to obtain it at lower interest than 65 per cent., abandoned that course, and resolved to wait for instructions from home. The plaintiffs do not appear to have received the letter of Messrs. Dalgetty, Rattray, and Co. till November. On the 25th of that month they wrote them a strong letter of remonstrance and complaint, on account of their not having advanced to the master the necessary funds, desiring them at once to do so, taking the master's draft on them for the amount. On receipt of this letter on Feb. 16, 1864, Messrs. Dalgetty, Rattray, and Co. advanced the necessary funds to the master, amounting to 2116*l.*, to pay for the repairs and release the ship, taking the master's draft on the plaintiffs, which was honoured in due course. Here, again, I cannot doubt that the plaintiffs entertained the full expectation which the communications of the master, transmitting his protest, and of the surveyors would be calculated to produce—that the ship, having been repaired at Port Chalmers, would proceed to complete her voyage, and, though possibly some further repairs might prove to be necessary at Calcutta, would bring the cargo from thence home, according to the charter. Thus far it does not appear to have occurred to anyone to imagine that the ship had sustained such an amount of damage as would make her not worth the expense of repairing. Funds having been furnished, the master proceeded to get the repairs done; and, so far as I can see, without any undue delay, though some time was consumed in getting the vessel cleared of coals which had been stored in her, the captain having let her out as a coal hulk, with a view of turning her to some use and account for the benefit of his owners until funds should be found to enable the repairs to be done—a proceeding which appears to me not to have been unreasonable or improper. On April 14, 1864, the necessary repairs having been completed, the Sir William Eyre left Port Chalmers, and proceeded to Calcutta, and, on her arrival there, was placed in a dry dock, when it was discovered that the injuries she had sustained were far more extensive than the surveyors at New Zealand had supposed, and that it would cost more to repair her than it was worth while to lay out on her. This being communicated to the plaintiffs, notice of abandonment was forthwith given to the underwriters on freight. The Court of Common Pleas has held that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, on the grounds—(1) that, in order to recover as for a total loss on the insurance on freight, notice of abandonment was necessary; and (2) that, though notice of abandonment was given on the discovery of the state of the vessel at Calcutta, such notice was too late. I find myself unable to concur in the view of the Court of Common Pleas on either of these points. It is no doubt true that the rule that, in order to claim as for a constructive total loss, the assured must give notice of abandonment, applies to insurance on freight as it does to insurance on ship or goods; but the rule, to whatever species of insurance it is applied, must always be subject to this limitation, that it attaches only where there is something of appreciable value, however small that value may be, to relinquish to the underwriter. Thus, where goods are on board, and the ship becomes a constructive total loss, the shipowner, in order to claim for a constructive total loss on freight, must abandon to the underwriter the right to hire another vessel, and carry the cargo to its destination, and so earn the freight. But where the interest to be made over to the insurer is of so shadowy and unsubstantial a character that it cannot be supposed that it could have been of any benefit whatever to the underwriters, or that the latter, as reasonable men, would have thought of availing themselves of it, so that for all practical purposes abandonment would have been a merely idle and useless formality, the assured ought not, in my opinion, to be tied down to the necessity of giving notice of it, especially in these times when it is notorious that the practice of underwriters is never to accept the notice. Now, it is difficult in the present case to discover any possible advantage which could have accrued to the insurer on freight from notice of abandonment. By the state to which the vessel had been reduced by sea damage, the plaintiffs, not being bound to repair her, were released from the obligations of the charter-party; there being, in my opinion, an implied condition in such charter-party that, if the ship, on her way to fetch the cargo, perished, the owner is released from his obligation to fulfil his contract with the freighter, while, on the other hand, the latter, being bound only to load a cargo by chartered ship, was under no obligation to accept another vessel. There was therefore no right or interest in the owners in respect of freight which they could abandon to the underwriters. The only effect of notice of abandonment under such circumstances would have been that the underwriters might, if so minded, have themselves chartered a ship, and proposed to De Mattos to let them bring home the cargo, taking their chance of his accepting their offer in preference to that of anyone else. But I am clearly of opinion that so speculative and remote a possibility cannot afford a ground for holding notice of abandonment to be necessary in such a case. Moreover, we know that, in point of fact, De Mattos, to whom the vessel was chartered, was on the eve of insolvency, and that his agents at Calcutta would not have loaded a cargo on his account, even if less delay had occurred in the arrival of the Sir William Eyre at Calcutta. It is difficult to imagine that, the contract between the freighter and the shipowner being at an end, and the underwriters on freight, who on notice of abandonment would have stood in the shoes of the owner, having no right whatever to call on the freighter to send cargo by another ship, the underwriters, even if notice of abandonment had been given them when first the ship arrived at Dunedin, would, under such circumstances, have engaged another ship at Calcutta, in order to bring home the cargo, and earn the freight, upon the empty speculation of a balance in their favour between the chartered freight and the actual freight, in case the freighter should find a cargo and suffer them to carry it. It is, in my opinion, enough to say that, to necessitate notice of abandonment to the underwriters, there must be an actual, tangible, and appreciable right or interest capable of being transferred; as, for instance, in the case of freight, where the cargo is already on board, and the shipowner would have the right of sending it on to its destination in another ship, and so earning the freight. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue this subject further, as the majority of the court are of opinion that, if notice of abandonment was necessary, sufficient notice was given. The authorities on the subject of the time within which notice of abandonment must be given, no doubt establish that, so soon as the circumstances which justify the treating the loss as constructively a total one are brought to the knowledge of the assured, notice of abandonment must be given without loss of time. And if this be the full extent of the obligation of the assured, as I think it is, the requirement was in this instance satisfied, inasmuch as it is undoubted, that the true condition of the ship was only first discovered on her being docked and examined at Calcutta, and that, as soon as the extent of damage and of the repairs consequently necessary were made known to the plaintiffs, they forthwith gave notice of abandonment to both underwriters on ship and on freight. The Court of Common Pleas have, however, engrafted on the general rule just referred to this further extension, viz., that, if the subject-matter of the insurance has sustained injury, and there is reason to believe that upon a more complete examination, the extent of damage may prove such as to entitle the assured to treat the case as one of total loss, such examination must be made at the earliest practicable moment; whereas, in this case, according to the view taken by the Court of Common Pleas, the final examination of the vessel was delayed for an unreasonable period. It may be doubtful whether a delay in proceeding to such final examination, occasioned by a bona fide endeavour to perform a further portion of the voyage would be a delay which would deprive the assured of his right to abandon when the actual state of the vessel is afterwards discovered. But, accepting the rule laid down by the Court of Common Pleas, I think it can only be applied to a case where the assured believes, or has reason to believe, in the existence of unascertained injury which may prove sufficient to warrant an abandonment, and contemplates the further examination of the vessel with a view to ascertain whether he may claim as for a constructive total loss. Now this essential element is wanting in the present case. The surveys to which I have referred lead, as has already been stated, satisfactorily to the conclusion that the recommendation that the vessel should undergo a further examination had no reference to any expectation of the discovery of such further damage as would justify abandonment; and that such examination was contemplated only with the view of securing the seaworthiness of the vessel for the homeward voyage. The conduct of the master in endeavouring to procure funds to repair and release the ship, and that of the assured in adopting the large outlay required to be made on her immediately after receiving the communication from the master transmitting the protest and surveys, equally show that there was no expectation in their minds of the existence of ulterior damage sufficient to create a constructive total loss. The decision of the Court of Common Pleas is erroneous by reason of this distinction having been overlooked, or from its having been assumed that the possibility of claiming as for a constructive total loss, and of a further examination of the vessel with a view to that result, was present to the minds of the plaintiffs at the time of the delay complained of. I am of opinion that such was not the case, and that the circumstances were not such as to call upon the assured to make a further examination of the vessel with a view to ascertain whether a constructive total loss could be claimed for or not; and that notice of abandonment having been given as soon as the true state of the vessel was ascertained and known, such notice, if any notice of abandonment were necessary, was sufficient. I have dealt thus far with the two propositions on which the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas proceeded. It has, however, been suggested that there is a further ground on which the plaintiff's claim ought to be rejected, viz., that a shipowner who, having insured both ship and freight, abandons the ship to the underwriters on ship in order to claim for a constructive total loss, loses the right to claim on the policy on freight, inasmuch as by his own act he incapacitates himself from carrying on the cargo, and so earning the freight. This position appears to me to be altogether untenable in principle, and one which would lead to very inconvenient consequences. If correct, it would obviously be applicable to a case where the cargo on which freight was to be earned was already on board. It would equally apply to the case where the ship was not insured, but the owner, as a prudent man, declined to repair. It would tend to put an end to policies on freight altogether, as in every case of constructive total loss of the ship the policy on freight would be inoperative, unless the assured elected to repair the ship, which, on the hypothesis, he ought not, as a prudent owner, to do. But the conclusive answer appears to me to be that the ship having been incapacitated from earning the freight by the peril insured against, and the owner not being under any obligation to repair her in order to earn the freight, but, on the contrary, as a prudent man, being justified in abandoning her, the loss of the freight in such a case does not arise from the act of the party, but from the sea peril insured against. There being then, so far as I am aware, no authority for this novel position—I say novel, because though there must have been numerous instances of policies on freight as well as on ship, in which the ship has been abandoned to the underwriters on ship, without the latter taking to the ship and earning the freight, one has never heard of the underwriters on freight resisting the claim of the assured on that ground—and as it seems to me untenable in principle, I see no ground for adopting it. The decision of the Court of Common Pleas, must therefore be overruled, and the verdict entered for the plaintiffs.

POTTER v. RANKIN.

LUSH, J.—Two questions were argued before us in this case; the one, whether notice of abandonment was necessary; the other, whether, if so, it was given in reasonable time. Having come to the conclusion satisfactory, to my own mind, that no notice of abandonment was necessary, I do not propose to discuss the second question, nor to say more upon it than that I concur in the opinions of my learned brethren, the majority of whom base their judgments on that ground. The object and effect of a notice of abandonment are nowhere more clearly stated than in the judgment of Lord Abinger in Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 286:—"If," said he, "in the progress of the voyage the subject of insurance becomes totally destroyed or annihilated, or if it be placed, by reason of the perils against which he insures, in such a position that it is wholly out of the power of the assured or of the underwriter to procure its arrival, he is bound by the very letter of the contract to pay the sum insured. But there are intermediate cases. There may be a capture, which, though prima facie a total loss, may be followed by a recapture, which would revert the property in the assured. There may be a forcible detention, which may speedily terminate, or may last so long as to end in the impossibility of bringing the ship or the goods to their destination. There may be some other peril which renders the ship unnavigable without any hope of repair, or by which the goods are partly lost or so damaged, that they are not worth the expense of bringing them, or what remains of them, to their destination. In all these or similar cases, if a prudent man, not insured, would decline any further expense in prosecuting an adventure, the termination of which will probably never be successfully accomplished, a party insured may for his own benefit, as well as for that of his underwriter, treat the case as one of a total loss, and demand the full sum insured. But if he elects to do this, as the thing insured or a portion of it still exists and is vested in him, the very principle of indemnity requires that he should make a cession of all his right to the recovery of it, and that too within a reasonable time after he receives the intelligence of the accident, that the underwriter may be entitled to all the benefit of what may still be of any value; and that he may, if he pleases, take measures at his own cost for realising or increasing that value. In all these cases, not only the thing insured, or part of it, is supposed to exist in specie, but there is a possibility, however remote, of its arriving at the port of destination, or at least of its value being in some way affected by the measures that may be adopted for the recovery or preservation of it." The subject of insurance in the present case is the sum contracted to be paid by the charterer for the carriage of a cargo from Calcutta to Europe, and which cargo he engaged to ship on the arrival of the vessel at Calcutta in a fit condition to receive it. The risk undertaken was sea peril on the outward voyage to New Zealand. It is an admitted fact that the vessel did, in the outward voyage to New Zealand, receive such damage by sea peril as necessitated repairs to an amount exceeding her value when repaired, and that upon the discovery of the extent of damage (which was not made for many months afterwards, nor until she arrived at Calcutta), the plaintiffs elected not to repair. That they had a right so to elect is not denied. It is clear that an owner is not, under such circumstances, bound to repair, in the interest either of the underwriter on ship or of the underwriter on freight. It is true that if the ship is insured, he must, in order to recover for a total loss against that underwriter, give him notice of abandonment; but that is a duty springing out of that particular contract, or rather a condition of his right to claim the whole insurance. The underwriter on freight is entitled in like manner to the salvage of that which he has insured, upon paying a total loss, but he has nothing to do with what remains of the ship. His obligation is the same whether the ship is insured or not insured, or whether the owner, being insured, chooses to abandon and claims for a total loss, or to retain the wreck, and claim for partial loss. That which, in the language of maritime commerce, constitutes the loss of a ship is damage to an extent not worth repairing, followed by a determination not to repair. As respects her capacity to save freight, a ship in such a condition is as much lost to the owner as if she had sunk or broken up. In the argument it was contended for the defendant that the election not to repair was deferred for an unreasonably long time, and that the owners might and ought to have ascertained the state of the vessel, and made their election at an earlier period. Assuming this argument to be well founded, it appears to me that it has no bearing on the case. What might have been the consequence if the owners, with knowledge of the extent of the damage, had delayed making up their minds whether or not they would repair till the time for loading had gone by, it is not necessary to inquire; for as soon as they knew the extent of the damage they made up their minds, and it is assumed in the case that if at the time the ship had been sound they might have claimed from the charterer the fulfilment of the charter. What benefit would the defendants have derived from an earlier decision? Suppose the plaintiffs had known of the extent of the damage while the ship remained at Bluff Harbour, and had then elected not to repair. If there was nothing of the subject of insurance to abandon, the defendant's position would have been neither better nor worse than if the ship had sunk or gone to pieces in Bluff Harbour. He could not in that case have complained that no notice of the loss had been given him. However inconvenient, or even prejudicial, it may sometimes be to an underwriter not to receive early notice of a loss, the assured is under no obligation to give it. A notice of abandonment must be given within a reasonable time, but notice of loss is no part of the contract either express or implied. If the underwriter wishes to have notice of a loss he must stipulate for it in the policy. There being then what, as between these parties, was a total loss of the ship, the question is, did that loss, having regard to the state of things existing at the time when the owner elected not to repair, entail as a consequence a total loss of the chartered freight? If the cargo had been on board, so that there was a possibility of earning the freight by sending it on by another vessel, the case would have admitted of other considerations. It is however, needless to inquire whether in the events which happened the defendant would in such case have been entitled to notice of abandonment or not; for no part of the cargo was on board. The ship was never in a condition to receive it, and for that reason the owner was never entitled to call upon the charterer to load. Under these circumstances what was there at any time to abandon of the subject matter of the insurance? No power of earning the chartered freight could have been thereby transferred by the assured to the defendant; not being the underwriter on ship he had no right to have her abandoned to him in order to repair her himself, nor could he have called upon the charterer to load his cargo in another ship of his providing. He could not by an abandonment have been subrogated into the place of the assured, for he would not have had thereby either the ship or the charter, either the means of earning or the right to earn the freight in question. It had, therefore, become impossible for either the assured or the underwriter to save the subject of insurance or any part of it. The assured could not, unless he did repairs which he was not bound to do, and had decided not to do; and the underwriter could not, because he could not take the ship and repair her, nor compel the charterer to substitute another ship. The loss, therefore, was total and absolute. For these reasons I am opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

EX. CH.

MCGAREL v. MOON.

[V.C. M.]

KELLY, C. B. (delivering the judgment of himself and Channell, B.)—I have only to add, on behalf of my brother Channell and myself, that, concurring as we do substantially in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, we also think that, supposing it doubtful whether, if no notice of abandonment of either ship or freight had been given, the underwriters upon freight would have been liable; yet, inasmuch as notice of abandonment was in fact given to the underwriters upon the ship, and, as we are clearly of opinion, given in time, all that remained of the ship itself, or the proceeds of the ship if it had been sold, belonged to the underwriters on the ship, and it became impossible for the owners to earn the chartered freight, of which, therefore, there was then an actual, and not a constructive, total loss. With respect to the delay in the notice of abandonment, the cause of that delay having been the refusal of the plaintiff's agents in New Zealand to supply the funds required to repair and clear the ship, which could not have been anticipated by the plaintiffs, who, as soon as it became known to them, instructed them to make the necessary advances, which were made accordingly; and the ship having sailed for Calcutta as soon as the repairs were completed, we think the delay satisfactorily accounted for, and the notice of abandonment in time. Then as to The Scottish Marine Insurance Company v. Turner, 1 Macq. 2; H. of L. Cas. 334; and Stewart v. The Greenock Marine Insurance Company, 1b. 328 (upon the authority of which Turner's case was decided): there the freight alleged to have been totally lost had been, in fact, earned, and the underwriters on ship, to whom the ship had been abandoned, had become entitled to it; whereas the freight in the present case, being prospective chartered freight, never was and never could be earned, and was as totally lost to the owners when the ship had passed to the underwriters on ship, as if it had been actually sunk in the sea upon the voyage to New Zealand.

MCGAREL v. MOON.

Practice—Exceptions to answer—Fictitious allegations.

It is not necessary to state imaginary facts to found an interrogatory; therefore where a bill alleged that an advance had been made by the directors of one company to another, but did not allege that such advance had been made with the sanction of the shareholders, the fact being unknown to the plaintiff, an interrogatory "whether such advance was sanctioned by the shareholders" was allowed.

This case came on to be heard on exceptions to the answer for insufficiency. The plaintiff in the suit was a shareholder in the Central Wales and Central Wales Extension Railway Companies, now amalgamated with the London and North-Western Railway Company, and this bill was filed by him to obtain a re-transfer of 2600 shares in the Central

MCGAREL v. MOON.

[V.C. M.]

Wales Railway Company, and 20,000*l.* Central Wales Extension stock, which, through the intervention of his stockbrokers were transferred by him in July or Aug. 1865, into the names of the defendants, Moon, Westhead, and Stewart, directors of and representing the London and North-Western Railway Company, who had agreed to make an advance of 100,000*l.* to the Central Wales Extension Railway Company, and as a security for which advance these shares and stock were to be held by the London and North-Western Railway Company. It appeared that in the year 1865 the Central Wales Extension Railway Company and the Neath and Brecon Railway Company, which is also now amalgamated with the London and North-Western Railway Company, being in want of money, proposed applying to the London and North-Western Railway Company for a loan; an application for that purpose was first made by the Central Wales Extension Railway Company, upon which a sum of 100,000*l.* was advanced, as the bill alleged, to such company, upon the security above-mentioned. It appeared, however, to be doubtful whether the advance was in fact made to the Central Wales Extension Railway Company or to the Neath and Brecon Railway Company.

As to the first exception—

The bill alleged that a special committee had been appointed by the London and North-Western Railway Company to manage the transaction with the Central Wales Extension Railway Company, and the interrogatory asked the defendants to set forth the names of the members of that committee, or any other committee appointed for the purpose. The defendants in their answer stated that it was not the fact that a special or any other committee was appointed to manage the transaction. In another part of the answer it was stated that in 1865 a general committee was appointed to review all matters which had been referred to the special committees, before laying them before the board of directors, but the names of the persons forming this general committee were not stated.

The plaintiff excepted to the answer for insufficiency.

Pearson, Q. C. and Methold, for the exception contended that it was necessary for the plaintiff's case that he should know who were the members of any committee to which the transaction had been in any way referred.

Bristowe, Q. C. and Speed, for the answer—We have completely traversed the allegation in the bill. No special or any other committee was appointed to manage the transaction, and therefore it is idle to be told to set forth the names of parties who had no existence. We are not bound to do more than answer the questions put to us. The general committee is not the committee referred to in the bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR thought the answer was sufficient, and disallowed the exception.

As to the second exception. The 20th paragraph of the bill alleged that on the 2nd Aug. 1865 the defendants Moon, Westhead, and Stewart, as the trustees of the London and North-Western Railway Company, advanced and paid out of the corporate funds of such company to the defendant Woolley, as agent for the Central Wales Extension Railway Company, the sum of 50,000*l.* (being part of the 100,000*l.* agreed to be advanced). The interrogatory founded on that allegation asked, "Was not the said sum of 50,000*l.* advanced and paid under the authority and with the sanction of the directors of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and whether or not by the shareholders in such last-mentioned company, as an advance to the Central Wales Extension Railway Company?" The answer stated that the advance was sanctioned by the directors of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and set forth the minutes and memoranda of the meetings of the directors with reference to the loan of the 100,000*l.*, but stated nothing as to the sanction of the shareholders.

The plaintiff excepted to the answer to this interrogatory as insufficient, on the ground that the defendants Moon and Westhead and the London and North-Western Railway Company had not set forth "whether the advance and payment of the 50,000*l.* were sanctioned by the shareholders of the last-mentioned company as an advance to the Central Wales Extension Railway Company, or in some other and what manner."

J. Pearson, Q. C. and Methold for the exception.—It is material to our case to ascertain whether the advance was made to the Central Wales Extension Railway Company or to the Neath and Brecon Railway Company; and, therefore, we want to know what was done at the time of the advance, and especially what communication was made on the subject by the directors of the London and North-Western Railway Company to its shareholders, without whose consent no advance could be made. The answer does not say one word as to the shareholders, but only as to the directors.

Bristowe, Q. C. and Speed for the answer.—We object to answer the interrogatory in question on the following grounds: First, there is no allegation in the bill as to the sanction of the shareholders upon which to support the interrogatory; secondly, the question as to their sanction is wholly immaterial and irrelevant, because the shareholders have nothing whatever to do with the subject; thirdly, this is a mere fishing interrogatory, an answer to which would not be material to the relief sought by the bill, and might be used for some other purpose in some other suit. There is nothing in this bill to warrant this interrogatory, and where this is the case a defendant is not obliged to answer the interrogatory. This has been the uniform practice.

Mitford on Pleading, 5th edit., pp. 53, 54;

Daniell's Ch. Pr. 4th edit., p. 441.

If the matter interrogated upon is material, it should be alleged in the bill.

Methold in reply.—This interrogatory is pertinent to the case made by the bill, and therefore the defendants must answer it. We are not bound to introduce fictitious statements into the bill on which to found our interrogatories. He cited,

Hudson v. Grenfell, 3 Giff. 388;

Daniell's Ch. Pr., 4th edit., 363.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a bill to impeach a transaction, and it may be important for the plaintiff to know whether the London and North-Western Railway Company did concur in that transaction. The plaintiff did not know the fact, and therefore he could not with propriety or safety make any allegation either one way or the other. But it was said that if the information sought by the interrogatory was material to the plaintiff's case, he should have made some allegation in his bill upon which to found his interrogatory, and I was at first inclined to think there was some force in the observation, but on further consideration I think that if a fact of which the plaintiff knows nothing may prove material to the relief he seeks, as in Marsh v. Keith, 1 Dr. & Sm. 342, he is entitled to ask for information as to the fact without alleging pure fictions in his bill. In the present case it seems to me the ininterrogatory is justified by the allegation in the bill, and that the defendants are bound to answer it. There can be no difficulty in answering whether the transaction in question was or was not done with the sanction of the shareholders. I am of opinion, therefore, that the interrogatory is proper, and ought to be allowed.

THE IMPERIAL MERCANTILE CREDIT ASSOCIATION
v. COLEMAN.

Company—Contract by director—Disclosure of interest.

C., a director of a joint-stock company, purchased certain railway debentures at 95 per cent. Subsequently, while still a director, he proposed to the company that they should purchase these debentures at 98½ per cent., but he did not disclose to them the nature and extent of his interest in the debentures. The company accordingly purchased the debentures at that price, the result of the transaction being that C. realised a considerable profit on them, being the difference between 95 and 98½ per cent.

Held, that C., not having disclosed his interest in the debentures to the company, was not justified in deriving any profit for himself from the transaction, and must, consequently, pay over to the company the whole amount of his profit, with interest at 5 per cent.

The Imperial Mercantile Credit Association was registered on the 24th June 1864, for the objects (amongst others) of negotiating loans of all descriptions, and of transacting the business of a capitalist. On the 11th May 1866 the association stopped payment, and is now being wound-up voluntarily under the supervision of the court, pursuant to a special resolution passed on the 28th May 1866, and confirmed on the 24th June 1866, and to an order made on the 26th June 1866. The defendants Coleman and Knight were stockbrokers, carrying on business under the firm of Knight, Coleman, and Co., and Coleman was a director of the association during the whole period from its incorporation to the commencement of the winding-up.

The association was virtually an amalgamation of the Imperial Financial Company (Limited), and the Mercantile Credit Association (Limited), and its incorporation was provided for by an agreement between the two companies dated the 3rd June 1864, in pursuance of which each of those companies duly passed and confirmed a special resolution for its own voluntary winding-up, and the association took over the business of both of them as from the 31st May 1864. The joint business of the amalgamated companies during the interval between the date of the agreement and the registration of the association, was conducted by a temporary board styled the board of the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association (Limited), and composed of certain of the directors of each of the said companies, who became also the first directors of the association. The defendant Coleman was a member of such temporary board, and was also a director of the Imperial Financial Company. While the association was in course of construction, the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company were seeking to exercise certain powers for the increase of its capital, and for borrowing, which had been given to it by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Act 1863, and also the powers which it was contemplated to obtain by the London, Chatham, and Dover (New Lines) Act 1864, which last-mentioned Act was passed on the 14th July 1864. The Chatham Company was, by the former of the said Acts, authorised to construct certain railways called the Metropolitan Extension (Eastern section), and for the purposes of those extensions to raise a certain amount of share capital, and to borrow 283,000*l.* on mortgage of the same extensions, and was by the latter of the said Acts authorised to construct certain railways called the Kent Works which were thereby constituted a portion of the said Metropolitan Extensions (Eastern Section), and for the purposes of such works to raise a certain sum by new shares in the said Metropolitan Extensions (Eastern Section), and to borrow 73,300*l.* on mortgage of the same section, which afterwards became, in its thus enlarged dimensions, known as the Greenwich and Woolwich line. Messrs. Peto and Co. were the contractors for the new lines, as they had been for other lines of the Chatham Company.

On the 4th Jan. 1864, the defendant Coleman, on behalf of his firm, who were the brokers and agents of Peto and Co., wrote to Sir Morton Peto a letter, in which he stated he could arrange to place the whole of the B shares and the debentures above referred to for a commission of 5 per cent. in cash and 5 per cent. in A shares, and he thought that it would probably take about two months to place the B shares. In reply to such letter, Sir Morton Peto, on the 5th Jan. 1864, wrote to the defendant Coleman, accepting his proposal. On the 7th June 1864, a meeting was held by a committee of the temporary board of the association, at which a proposal was submitted from Messrs. Knight, Coleman, and Co., that the association should undertake to place 356,300*l.* (the aggregate of the said sums of 283,000*l.* and 73,300*l.* authorised to be borrowed on mortgage) 6 per cent. debentures, five years to run, Metropolitan Extensions, Greenwich and Woolwich, Eastern Section, London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, at a commission on the debentures of 1½ per cent., and it was resolved to recommend the proposal to the board for acceptance. Accordingly the proposal was submitted to a meeting of the board held on the 10th June 1864, at which the defendant Coleman was present, but previously to the proposal being submitted, Coleman stated to the meeting that he was interested in the sale of these debentures, and offered to leave the room whilst the proposal for their sale to the association was being dismissed, but the chairman said this was unnecessary.

The question then arose as to whether the association could enter into the transaction, upon which Mr. Morris, the solicitor of the association, who was present, referred to the articles of association, and advised the meeting that provided a director declared at the time of any business being submitted to the board that he was interested therein, the association could enter into the business, and he referred particularly to the 83rd article, which provided as follows:

The office of a director shall be vacated if he contracts with the company, or is concerned in or participates in the profits of any contract with the company or participates in the profits of any work done for the company, without declaring his interest at the meeting of the directors at which such contract is determined on or work ordered, if his interest then exists, or, in any other case, at the first meeting of the directors after the acquisition of his interest; and no director so interested shall vote at any meeting, or on any committee of the directors, or any question relating to such contract or work.

It did not appear, however, that Coleman explained to the meeting the actual nature of his interest, though he stated in his answer to the bill that in the month of May previous to the committee meeting above mentioned, he submitted the proposal to Messrs. Barker and Sandeman, the managers of the association, and discussed the matter with them; also that in the course of that discussion and with a view to the proposal being submitted to the committee meeting, he showed Messrs Barker and Sandeman the correspondence between his firm and Peto and Co. above referred to. This, however, Messrs. Barker and Sandeman positively denied. The board then passed a resolution accepting the proposal, but Coleman did not vote on the occasion, or take any part in the discussion. Eventually the whole of the debentures were issued, and various sums, amounting in the whole to 305,705*l.*, were paid by the association to the defendants, Coleman and Knight, or to the Chatham Company, on account of such debentures, the association taking credit for 5344*l.* 10*s.*, as commission at 1½ per cent. on the sum of 356,300*l.*, the amount of the debentures. Of these sums so paid by the association to the defendants, a sum of 64,655*l.* 10*s.* was paid to the defendants on the 5th July 1864, and out of this sum they paid over to the Chatham Company 52,185*l.* only, and carried the difference, viz., 12,470*l.*, to their profit and loss account in their own books as the amount of their commission under their alleged agreement with Peto and Co., contained in the letters of the 4th and 5th Jan. 1864.

The association maintained that although they had undertaken to place the 356,300*l.* debentures for a commission of 1½ per cent., or, in other words, to purchase them at 98½ per cent, yet that the defendants had arranged with the Chatham Company to place them at 5 per cent, or in other words, to purchase them at 95 per cent., and that accordingly the sum of 12,470*l.* 10*s.*, the amount of the difference, ought to be handed over by the defendants. On the other hand, the defendants maintained that they were entitled to the benefit of their agreement with Peto and Co.; and alleged that they acted solely on behalf of Peto and Co., and denied that they had anything whatever to do with the Chatham Company.

This bill was then filed by the liquidators of the association, praying that the defendants might be declared liable, and decreed jointly and severally to pay over to the association the said sum of 12,470*l.* 10*s.*, with interest at 5 per cent.

Cole, Q. C. and Jackson, for the plaintiffs, argued that, inasmuch as the defendant Coleman was a director of the association, and therefore stood in a fiduciary relation towards them, he was bound to give them the full benefit of the transaction, and not to retain it for himself. That in fact the case was governed by the general principles of equity as to persons in a fiduciary position purchasing the property of their cestuis que trust. Coleman did not declare his interest within the meaning of the 83rd article of association. They cited

8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, ss. 86, 87.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Mellish, Q.C., and James Kaye, for the defendants.—The defendants, in submitting the proposal for the sale of the debentures to the association, only acted in the ordinary course of their business as stockbrokers. The association were desirous of having Coleman on their board, in consequence of his being a member of a firm of stockbrokers in large practice. Their object was to secure the services as directors of persons who thoroughly understood the business of the association, and the 83rd article of association was framed especially as an inducement to such persons to act. There is nothing in the Companies Act 1862, prohibiting contracts by directors, which are left to the general law; the Act merely disqualifies directors who contract from acting as directors (1st Sched. Table A. 57), but under this 83rd article of association, a director is expressly allowed to contract, provided he discloses his interest and does not vote. Accordingly, Coleman stated at the meeting of the directors, that he had an interest in the debentures, and he also explained his position to the managers of the association prior to the committee meeting, with a view to its being brought under the notice of the committee. The association have no right to alter their contract with the defendants, having deliberately entered into it with full knowledge of the facts of the case. There is no agency or trusteeship in the present case. The defendants were the owners of the debentures, and had acquired their interest in them months before the association came into existence. They cited:

Cole, Q.C., in reply, cited:

Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 337.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts and arguments).—The question is, whether the defendants were owners of these debentures. The ownership is attempted to be made out by a correspondence between the defendant Coleman and Sir Morton Peto, in which Coleman said he would arrange to place the whole of the B. shares and debentures about to be issued by the Chatham Company for a commission of 5*l.* per cent. in cash, and 5*l.* per cent. in A shares; and he supposed that it would probably take about two months to place the B shares. His proposal was accepted by Sir Morton Peto on the 5th Jan. 1864. I cannot, however, accede to the argument that this correspondence made the defendants the owners of the debentures. There was no contract whatever with the Chatham Company, to whom they belonged, to take them, and I cannot consider that Mr. Coleman's letter amounts to anything more than an engagement with Sir Morton Peto to use his best exertions to place the debentures for the commission named, and my opinion is that an action even could not have been sustained against Coleman for a breach of that undertaking. Much importance was also attached to the fact that this correspondence was shown to Barker and Sandeman, the managers of the association, long before the contract was entered into. The fact is positively denied by Barker and Sandeman; but whether it was so or not, is, in my opinion, wholly unimportant, as it is quite clear that they had no authority whatever to bind the company to waive any rights arising out of any irregular or unjustifiable conduct on the part of its directors. It was also contended that the defendants acted in this transaction merely as the brokers of Peto and Co., but that circumstance would not, in my opinion, afford any justification to Coleman for charging the company, of which he was a director, a larger price for the debentures than he himself had paid for them. Much reliance has been placed by the defendants' counsel on the 83rd clause of the articles of association, which prescribed what acts should be a disqualification of a director. It is provided that he shall vacate his office "if he contracts with the company, or is concerned in a participation of the profits of any contract with the company, without declaring his interest at the meeting of the directors at which such contract is determined on." It was urged that this clause was intended to supersede the rules of the court which preclude a director from deriving profit from any transaction with the company of which he is a director, but I am of opinion that it had not that effect, but was merely intended to describe what acts should vacate the office of director; and even if it had the effect ascribed to it, I think it was incumbent upon Mr. Coleman not only to have stated at the meeting of the 10th June 1864 that he had an interest in these debentures, but also to state accurately what that interest was. He would, in fact, have been bound to state that he was offering the company at 98½ per cent., that which he was purchasing at 95 per cent., but this he did not do. That his co-directors knew or suspected that he was getting some greater advantage by the transaction than the ordinary broker's commission I think highly probable; but no such knowledge on their part could absolve him from his duty to the shareholders, as was expressly decided by Knight Bruce, V.C., in Benson v. Heathorn, 1 Y. & C. Ch. 326. I cannot, therefore, see anything in the transaction to relieve Mr. Coleman from the ordinary obligations of a director towards the company, whose interests were committed to his charge. When he proposed that the company should take the debentures at 98½ per cent. he knew that he should procure them at 95 per cent. I am clearly of opinion that he was not justified in charging the higher price, and putting the difference in his own pocket. It is of the highest importance that it should be distinctly understood that it is the duty of directors of companies to use their best exertions for the benefit of those whose interests are committed to their charge, and that they are bound to disregard their own private interests whenever a regard to them conflict with a proper discharge of such duties. These are the principles which were acted upon in the cases relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiffs. [His Honour then referred to the cases, and continued:] Upon the principle of these authorities, and upon what I consider to be the soundest principles of justice, I think I am bound to treat the acquisition of these debentures by Mr. Coleman as a purchase of them on behalf of the company of which he was a director, and that it was consequently his duty to procure them at the lowest possible price, without any private advantage to himself. In violation of the obligation which was thus imposed upon him, he conducted the purchase in such a manner as to make a profit of 12,470l. 10s. for himself and his partner, and that sum he is bound to restore. There must, therefore, be a decree for the payment of that amount with interest at 5 per cent. from the 5th July 1864, the day on which it was received by Knight, Coleman, and Co., and carried to their joint account. Mr. Coleman must also pay the costs of the suit. The counsel for the defendants did not make any distinction between the two defendants, but as Mr. Knight did not occupy any fiduciary position with regard to the company, I do not see any ground for making the decree against him. He does not appear, however, to have incurred any separate costs, and I think, therefore, that the bill should be dismissed as against him without costs.

V.C. M.]

STONE v. THOMAS.

[CHAN.]

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by T. BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

Friday, Jan. 28.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).

STONE v. THOMAS.

Bankruptcy Act 1861—Creditors'-deed—Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery—Special circumstances.

Bill filed by a creditor of J. Hayward against the trustees of a creditors'-deed, which had been executed by him, and had been duly registered under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. The bill charged that part of the property had been sold to one of the trustees at an undervalue, and prayed that the trusts of the deed might be administered by the court, and the trustees made responsible for the loss.

Case brought before the Lord Chancellor in the first instance at the request of Stuart, V.C., in consequence of a supposed discrepancy between Riches v. Owen, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 8290, and Martin v. Powning, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 356, as to the jurisdiction of the court:

Held, that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was not ousted by the Bankruptcy Act 1861 in cases of this description. But as the administration of the trusts of creditors'-deeds had been handed over to the Court of Bankruptcy, this court would not exercise its concurrent jurisdiction, unless there were special circumstances which rendered the relief that could be obtained in the Court of Bankruptcy inadequate to meet the justice of the case. In the present instance there were no such special circumstances. On the contrary, the relief sought could be obtained in bankruptcy with much less expense and delay. The bill was dismissed with costs.

This was a motion for decree, under the following circumstances; J. Hayward, on the 7th of June, 1867, executed a composition-deed under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and thereby conveyed all his real and personal estate to the defendants, William Thomas, Edward Miller, and George Wilton, upon the usual trusts for sale, and for division of the proceeds among his creditors. The deed was of the ordinary character of such documents, and there was nothing remarkable in it, except that all the three trustees were creditors of Hayward, and the deed contained a power in the event of any question arising between any one of the trustees and the estate, for the two other trustees to enter into any agreement, or take any measures for adjusting such claim, as effectually as if the trustee interested in the question had not been nominated a trustee. J. Hayward was, at the time of the execution of the composition-deed, carrying on the business of a coal merchant; and the trustees, shortly after entering on their duties, sold the stock-in-trade and goodwill of it to William Thomas, one of themselves; and in April 1866, William Thomas, with some other persons, formed themselves into an incorporated company under the Companies Act 1862, and the stock-in-trade and business were transferred to the company. The company were not made parties to this suit. The same year the trustees paid to the creditors two dividends, amounting to 9s. in the pound. At the time when the dividends were paid, it was a question between the plaintiff and the trustees whether the plaintiff, who had had considerable business transactions with Hayward, was a creditor of, or a debtor to the estate. Much correspondence ensued between them, and ultimately the trustees acknowledged that the plaintiff was a creditor of the estate, but no agreement could be come to between them as to what was the amount of the debt, and no dividend was paid to him.

STONE v. THOMAS.

In this state of things the plaintiff filed his bill on the 7th Aug. 1867, on behalf of himself and the other creditors under the deed, except the defendants, to have the trusts of the composition-deed executed under the direction of the court, and also to have the sale of the coal business set aside on the ground that it had been purchased at an undervalue by one trustee from his colleagues. The question of the jurisdiction of the court was not raised by the defendant on the pleadings in any manner, and the cause came on to be heard, on motion for decree, before Stuart, V.C. but at his Honour's request, application was made to the Lord Chancellor to allow the cause to be heard before his Lordship in the first instance, his Honour being of opinion that, having regard to the decisions in the Court of Appeal in Riches v. Owen, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 820; and in Martin v. Powning, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 356; and of Lord Justice Giffard in Bell v. Bird, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 635; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 901; it was expedient that this course should be adopted.

Dickenson, Q.C., and Begg, for the plaintiff, submitted that this was a suit not merely to administer a trust-deed and take accounts, but also to set aside a sale by trustees to one of their own body, which, by their own acknowledgment, was at an undervalue, and therefore fraudulent. There could be no doubt of the original jurisdiction of this court in suits of this description, and it was not the habit or duty of the court to abandon or delegate the exercise of its original jurisdiction, on the ground that another court was competent to deal with the case. The Act of 1861 did not oust expressly the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and they would not import negative words into the Act so as to take away the jurisdiction. Riches v. Owen distinctly showed that the court still had jurisdiction, and the judgment in Martin v. Powning did not deny—indeed it asserted—the concurrent jurisdiction of the court, and the result of that decision was that, in cases of mere administration, the Court of Chancery would leave the matter to be dealt with by the Court of Bankruptcy, but that if there were anything extraordinary in the case with which this court could deal more conveniently than a court of bankruptcy, this court would entertain the suit. That was the case here, and even if this question had been raised in the Court of Bankruptcy in the first instance, that court, if it had been of opinion that the sale complained of might be set aside, would have directed a suit to be instituted in this court, for the purpose of trying the point. Moreover, in Martin v. Powning and in Bell v. Bird, the question of jurisdiction was raised, on demurrer or plea; that was the proper way of taking the objection. The defendant had allowed this case to come to a hearing on motion for decree, and this court would not now, after all the expense of the suit had been incurred, refuse to exercise its concurrent, and, in this case, beneficial jurisdiction. They quoted:—

Athenæum Life Assurance Society v. Pooley, 3 De G. & J. 294; 28 L. J., N. S., 119; Galsworthy v. Durrant, 2 De G. F. & J. 466.

Greene, Q.C., and Hadden for the defendants, the trustees of the deed, contended that Bell v. Bird distinctly affirmed that in matters of this description the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy was exclusive; and if it were not exclusive that was no reason why the Court of Chancery should interfere here. The case of ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 625, showed that under the old practice the Court of Bankruptcy could set aside a sale by an assignee, and that court had now the same powers under the Act of 1861 with regard to these composition-deeds as it had before in cases of bankruptcy. They further submitted that it was not necessary the objection to the jurisdiction should be taken by demurrer. They referred to Mitford on Pleading, p. 176.

Dickinson, Q.C., in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—This case has been brought before me on the original hearing because of a supposed discrepancy in the decisions of the various branches of this court. The deed in the present case is in the common form, except that as all the three trustees were creditors, there is a proviso empowering two of them to settle the debt of the third trustee. But certain circumstances have taken place which are said to be so special as to justify this suit. One of the trustees has purchased a part of the property, and it is charged against him that he bought it at an undervalue, and that this being a purchase by a trustee from himself, the plaintiff ought to have the ordinary remedy in this court of setting the purchase aside and having the property resold, and the trustee fixed with the loss if there should be any. That is the principal speciality. As regards the jurisdiction of this court three questions arise; first, whether the court has any jurisdiction in the case of a creditor's deed; secondly, what special circumstances are required to show that the Court of Bankruptcy cannot give adequate relief before the court will exercise its jurisdiction; and thirdly, whether it is not too late in this case to take an objection to the jurisdiction of the court after the answers have been put in and the witnesses examined. As to the first question, I feel no doubt that there is jurisdiction in this court if it thinks fit to exercise it. I do not think that Martin v. Powning, or any other case has decided that the jurisdiction of this court is ousted by the Court of Bankruptcy. But the case has declared that in the case of a creditor's deed jurisdiction over the whole matter has been given to the Court of Bankruptcy, and that it is more convenient that the trusts should be administered there, and that this court will not interfere unless there are some special circumstances to call for such interference. I take it that the rule as to the jurisdiction is this: that the jurisdiction of this court is not ousted unless there is an express enactment in the statute which provides a new jurisdiction. This has been exemplified in many cases in which the courts of common law have had jurisdiction given them, as in the case of discovery, which was formerly exclusively within the jurisdiction of this court. The difference between a trust-deed and the bankruptcy of a debtor is, that where there is a bankruptcy the whole machinery is in the Court of Bankruptcy, and the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is put an end to. The assignees are officers of another jurisdiction. But with respect to trust-deeds, the question may arise whether the Court of Bankruptcy has power to give adequate relief in all cases. I take it that in ordinary cases the Court of Bankruptcy is fully adequate to carry into execution the trusts of these deeds, and that the Legislature has given it power to deal with the trustees as with assignees, and the debtor as with a bankrupt; but the Legislature has not thought proper in express terms to oust the jurisdiction of this court. Where, as in Martin v. Powning, the whole object is to deal with the assets, the Commissioner is perfectly competent, and this court will refuse to grant relief. But if there is anything dehors the administration of the assets in which the Commissioner cannot give adequate relief, recourse may be had to this court. The head note of Martin v. Powning is perfectly accurate when it says that "the court will not in ordinary circumstances entertain a suit for the administration of the trusts of a deed registered under the Bankruptcy Act 1861." In that case the court made these observations: "With respect to the first question, it has been correctly stated by the respondent's counsel that before the Bankruptcy Act 1861, this court habitually exercised jurisdiction over composition-deeds and trust-deeds for the benefit of creditors in the same manner as over other trusts; and in Riches v. Owen, which was a case of a deed registered under the Act of 1861, the court appointed a receiver, but in that case the deed was a deed of inspectorship, the plaintiffs were the trustees of the deed, and were suing the insolvent debtor for the purpose of enforcing the deed against him, and the interference of the court was limited to the appointment of a receiver for the protection of the property, and we have not been referred to any case, nor do we think that any case can be found in which the court has entertained a suit for the administration of the trusts of a deed registered under the Act, and in Bell v. Bird, the court refused to entertain such a suit. The Act of 1861, has placed the trust-deeds registered under its provisions in a position widely differing from that occupied by composition-deeds and trust-deeds for the benefit of creditors under the old law; for by the Act of 1861, if the proper majority of creditors be obtained, and the other requisites be observed, the deed becomes binding on the minority in the same manner as if they had executed the deed (sect. 192); and the 197th section gives to the deed effects similar to those of an adjudication of bankruptcy, and provides that the debtor, the creditors who execute, assent to, or are bound by the deed, and the trustees, shall in all matters relating to the estate and effects of the debtor be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and have the benefit of and be liable to all the provisions of the Act, and that the creditors and trustees shall have the same powers, rights, and remedies as creditors or assignees in bankruptcy, and that except where the deed shall expressly provide otherwise, the Court of Bankruptcy shall determine all questions arising under the deed according to the law and practice of bankruptcy, and shall have power to make and enforce all such orders as it might have made if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, and his estate were administered in bankruptcy. Is there then, anything in this case which would render the relief in Chancery more effectual than in bankruptcy? I have no hesitation in saying there is not. The facts are simply these: Two years before the filing of the bill, one of the trustees bought part of the assets, and immediately afterwards sold it to a company. The whole matter resolves itself into a question of account. If it shall turn out that the property was sold at an under-value, the trustees can be made to account; but there can be no resale, for the company which bought the property are not before the court. There is no pretence for saying that there is anything in this case which cannot be set right in bankruptcy. But it is said that it is too late for the defendants now to take the objection. I cannot, however, say that the defendants were entirely wrong in the course they have pursued. The case of Martin v. Powning was not decided at the time of the filing of the bill, so that it was not clear that a demurrer would lie. There were also personal charges against the defendants, which they might think proper to answer. On the other hand, the plaintiff himself might have stopped the suit when Martin v. Powning was decided. I have said that there is nothing to justify the court in interfering, but I may add that there is much in this case to show how mischievous its interference would be, and it is clear that the creditors would get no benefit from the suit. The deed in this case was an honest one. Except the present charge, no fault has been found with the trustees. The plaintiff admits that there is only a balance of about 167*l.* due to him. When the account was sent to him, making him out a debtor to the estate, he did not discover the error in the account for a whole year, and then found out that some items had been charged twice over. In the meantime 9*s.* in the pound had been distributed. Two days before the bill was filed a distinct offer was made to pay him 9*s.* in the pound on what should turn out to be due to him; but without taking the trouble to settle the amount payable, the bill was at once filed. There has been a great deal of controversy about the valuation. The correctness of Foote's valuation is not questioned, and it turns out that the difference of the value put upon the property when the defendant bought it, arose principally from the fact that some of the stock had been sold, so that the under-value complained of cannot be more than 160*l.* The plaintiff wishes all this gone into his chambers, when a single application to the judge in Bankruptcy would have answered all the purpose. I do not deny that there may be cases in which it would be right to apply to this court for relief—the appointment of a receiver is such a case—but I think that in general, application should first be made to the commissioner in bankruptcy, and if full relief cannot be obtained, recourse may be had to this court. The bill is quite unnecessary, and must be dismissed; and as there has been an offer made to pay a dividend on the plaintiff's debt before the bill was filed, I shall dismiss it with costs, which I should not otherwise have done.

Bankruptcy — Injunction — Jurisdiction to grant — Stranger to the bankruptcy — Sale of property assigned to him by the bankrupt — Alleged fraud — Undertaking as to damages — Undertaking to institute proceedings to set aside assignment — Practice — Appeal — The Bankruptcy Act 1869, sects. 13, 65, 66, 71, 72.

*Under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, sects. 65, 66, 72, the Court of Bankruptcy has jurisdiction in a summary way to grant an injunction to restrain a stranger to the bankruptcy from selling property assigned to him by the bankrupt when the assignee under the bankruptcy alleges that the assignment to the stranger was fraudulent, and makes out a prima facie case such as would have induced the Court of Chancery upon bill filed to grant an interim injunction to restrain the sale till the hearing of the cause; and such an injunction may even be granted ex parte, and may be granted in a bankruptcy which originated under the B. A. 1861. But when such an injunction is granted, the assignee under the bankruptcy ought to give an unqualified undertaking to be answerable in damages to the person* whose dealing with the property is restrained, and ought also to undertake at once to institute proceedings to set aside the assignment by the bankrupt to him.

The order granting such an injunction, even though made in a bankruptcy which originated under the B. A. 1861, is an order made entirely under the B. A. 1869, and if made by a County Court must, if appealed from, be appealed from in the first instance to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and not directly to the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

Re Palmer, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323, distinguished.

*A., a few days before he was adjudicated a bankrupt, assigned a number of pictures to C. in consideration of a sum of money. C. paid the money, and the pictures were delivered over to him, and he placed them with an auctioneer to be sold, and they were advertised for sale accordingly. The assignee under the bankruptcy, upon an allegation that the sale to C. was fraudulent and at an undervalue, obtained ex parte from the County Court an injunction to restrain the sale which had been advertised. By the order of the County Court the assignee under the bankruptcy was made to undertake to be answerable in damages to C. out of any moneys which might come to him in the bankruptcy.*

On appeal, this order for an injunction was affirmed, but the assignee in the bankruptcy was compelled to give an unqualified undertaking to be answerable to C. in damages, and also to undertake forthwith to institute proceedings to set aside the sale to C.

This was an appeal by Mr. Charles King Anderson, from an order made by the registrar of the County Court at Walsall, granting an injunction to restrain him, his servants and agents, and in particular, Messrs. Christie and Manson, auctioneers, of London, from selling certain pictures which he had deposited with Messrs. Christie and Manson to be sold, and which had been advertised by them for sale accordingly.

The pictures in question had belonged to Mr. Matthew Anderson, who was the uncle of Mr. C. K. Anderson, and had been, with other property, assigned by him by a deed dated the 18th Dec. 1869, to C. K. Anderson absolutely in consideration of a sum of money which was calculated as enough to pay to the creditors of Mr. Anderson a composition of 6s. 8d. in the pound upon the respective amounts of their debts. The money was paid by Mr. C. K. Anderson, and the composition was paid to the majority in number of Mr. Anderson's creditors, but two of the largest creditors refused to receive it, alleging that the sale was fraudulent and at an undervalue. In consequence of their opposition, Mr. Anderson was, on the 24th Dec. 1869, adjudicated a bankrupt upon his own petition. When the Bankruptcy Act 1869, came into operation, the proceedings under the bankruptcy were by an order of the Lord Chancellor transferred to the County Court at Walsall. C. K. Anderson at once took possession of the pictures under the assignment to him, and sent them to London, and instructed Messrs. Christie and Manson to sell them, and they advertised them for sale accordingly, on the 18th March 1870. The assignee in the bankruptcy, who was the largest creditor, and one of those whose opposition had led to the bankruptcy, knew of the proposed sale, but did not at once take steps to prevent it. But on the 11th March 1869, upon an ex parte application by the assignee to the registrar of the County Court, which was supported by evidence to show that the assignment to C. K. Anderson was fraudulent and ought to be set aside, an order was made granting an injunction to restrain C. K. Anderson, his servants and agents, and in particular Messrs. Christie and Manson, from selling the pictures. By this order the creditors' assignee was compelled to undertake to abide by any order which the court might make as to payment (out of any moneys received or to be hereafter received by him in this matter) of damages, in case the court should be hereafter of opinion that C. K. Anderson had sustained any loss by reason of the order which the assignee ought to pay out of such moneys. From this order C. K. Anderson appealed.

Roxburgh, Q. C., and Bagley on behalf of the appellant, argued (1) that there was no ground for granting the injunction upon the merits of the case; (2) that the undertaking as to damages was insufficient; (3), that there was no jurisdiction under the Act of 1869 to grant an injunction against a person outside the bankruptcy, at any rate in a bankruptcy the proceedings in which originated under the Bankruptcy Act 1861. Certainly such an order ought not to have been made ex parte. They referred to and commented upon

The Bankruptcy Act 1869, ss. 13, 65, 66, 71, 72;

Caldecott v. Cook, Moo. & Mal. 522.

Lee v. Hart, 11 Ex. 880.

De Gex, Q. C., and Ernest Reed on behalf of the creditors' assignee, objected that the order appealed from was made under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and that, therefore, by virtue of sect. 71 of that Act the appeal ought to have been taken in the first instance to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. On this point they distinguished Re Palmer, 22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 323. This objection was, however, not insisted upon, as the court suggested that it would save expense to have the matter decided upon at once by the Court of Appeal. They then argued that the Act of 1869 gave ample jurisdiction to make the order under appeal, and that a sufficient case was shown for granting the injunction. They relied in particular on the difference in the language of sect. 72 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, as compared with that of sect. 12 of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act 1849, as showing that the Court of Bankruptcy has now power to deal with third parties. They cite Roxburgh, Q. C. was heard in reply.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—The question of jurisdiction in this case, no doubt, is of considerable importance. But, as I have had an opportunity of considering that question, not only antecedently, but for some time yesterday, I am prepared to dispose of this case at once. Now the first question that arises upon it is whether the appeal is brought in the right court, and although Mr. De Gex has very properly waived that question, of course it is necessary I should give an opinion upon the subject. The case of Re Palmer, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323, before me the other day, was an appeal in respect of an order of discharge, and, in consequence, it was an appeal in respect of an order which was made under the Act of 1861. The only operation that the Act of 1869 had upon that Act of 1861 was that that which gave jurisdiction was the fact of there having been a transfer. But the order was made under, and the discharge depended completely and entirely on, the Act of 1861; and, besides that, under the Act of 1861 the bankrupt had thirty days for the purpose of appeal, and had a right to appeal direct to this court. I was of opinion that under those circumstances the right of direct appeal to this court was not taken away, and accordingly I entertained the appeal and varied the order that was made. If this order can be sustained (upon which I will state my opinion presently), it is quite clear that it is an order dependent entirely on the Act of 1869; it is an order which the court can make, because the proceedings were transferred, but the power giving the court authority to make any such order, if power there be, emanates entirely from the Act of 1869. Therefore this case is in no way concluded by the case which I decided the other day.

CHAN.]

Ex parte ANDERSON; Re ANDERSON.

That being so, if we come to look at the Act of Parliament itself, the matter I think is reasonably clear. First of all there is the 20th section of the repealing Act, and that in substance really provides that the Act of 1861 shall be repealed, but that, as regards pending proceedings, and all proceedings which originated under the Act of 1861, so far as the powers of the Act of 1861 are concerned, the Act shall not be considered as having been repealed, and it is enacted that the repeal shall take away none of the rights which were conferred by the Act of 1861. Therefore where the proceedings have originated under the Act of 1861, I take it you have to consider the Act of 1861 and the Act of 1869 together, for the purpose of determining what is the proper court for the appeal, and the moment you come to the conclusion that the proceeding is a proceeding dependent absolutely and entirely on the Act of 1869, and has nothing to do with the bankrupt's discharge or the like, that moment you have in point of fact an order which is dependent on the Act of 1869. And besides the 71st section, the 72nd section is distinct in terms "that no such court as aforesaid shall be subject to be restrained in the execution of its powers under this Act by the order of any other court, nor shall any appeal lie from its decisions except in manner directed by this Act." Then the manner directed is an appeal first of all to the Chief Judge, and then an appeal from the Chief Judge here. Therefore, if the question had not been waived, I should have been obliged to have dismissed the application on the ground that the appeal was not brought to the proper court.

It will therefore be proper to preface this order by stating in terms that the assignee waived the fact of there not having been an intermediate appeal to the Chief Judge of bankruptcy. Upon that waiver, of course, I can deal with the case, and the first question that I have to consider is a question of jurisdiction. I quite agree that it is an important one. As regards the facts which raise the question of jurisdiction, I do not at all propose to enter into them; it is enough for me to say that it is alleged on the part of the assignee that there is certain property which belongs to the estate of the bankrupt. It is alleged on the part of the appellant, as controverting the case made by the assignee, that that property is taken by virtue of a purchase and by virtue of a deed, which he says is a valid purchase and a valid deed, and to that the assignee rejoins that that is a deed and that that is a purchase which ought to be set aside and cannot be valid as against him as representing the creditors.

Now, without going into the facts at all, it is quite enough for me to say that there is a question to try, at what (if there was a suit in Chancery) would have been the hearing of the cause, as to the validity of this deed, and that, if the facts which appear in this examination had been detailed in a bill and supported by evidence, a case would have been made upon which an interim injunction would have been granted. That being so, the next thing I have to look to is the question of jurisdiction. Now this bankruptcy did not originate under the Act of 1869, but preceded the Act of 1869; it originated under the Act of 1861. But under the 130th section of the Act of 1869, the Lord Chancellor has power to transfer, and he has transferred, amongst other things, this particular business, the particular proceedings in bankruptcy, to the local district Bankruptcy Court, being the County Court. Well, that being so, my opinion is, that where proceedings have been so transferred, the Bankruptcy Court to which they have been transferred has just the same jurisdiction (of course subject to what the provisions of the Act of 1861 in many respects may be), as regards the 71st and 72nd sections of the Act, and the 65th and 66th sections of the Act, as if the proceedings had originated under the Act of 1869. Those provisions apply to modes of procedure, and modes of procedure only; they take away, as far as I can see, no right. I can see no sort of inconvenience that would arise from saying that they are to be construed retrospectively, and it is quite in accordance with principle, it is quite in accordance with convenience, and it is quite in accordance with the terms used, that they should be construed retrospectively, and should be construed as applying to bankruptcies which have preceded the Act of 1869, but of which the court has seisin by reason of the transfer made by the Lord Chancellor.

That being so, the mode in which I have to consider the case is whether there would be jurisdiction or not assuming that the proceedings had commenced under the Act of 1869. Now the 13th section I quite agree is not a section, which, as I think, has a retrospective effect, nor do I think it has any operation whatever on the present case. The 13th section is in these terms:—"The court may at any time after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition against the debtor, restrain further proceedings in any action, suit, execution, or other legal process against the debtor in respect of any debt proveable in bankruptcy, or it may allow such proceedings, whether in progress at the commencement of the bankruptcy, or commenced during its continuance, to proceed upon such terms as the court may think just. The court may also at any time after the presentation of such petition appoint a receiver or manager of the property or business of the debtor against whom the petition is presented, or any part thereof, and may direct immediate possession to be taken of such property or business, or any part thereof."

Well now I take it that the object of this section was really to preserve the property pending the petition. It was, in fact, giving the Court of Bankruptcy power to intervene, although there should not be before it a person who could in the ordinary sense of the term be plaintiff in an action at law, or plaintiff in a suit in equity. Its object was, that the moment the petition was presented there might be a receiver, there might be a manager, at the instance, we will say, of the creditor who presented the petition, or at the instance of the bankrupt who presented the petition, so that there might be some interim management under which the property might be preserved up to the time when there should be an adjudication in bankruptcy.

I believe I said just now that I did not think the 13th section had any retrospective effect. I should correct myself in one respect as regards that, because if there should have happened to have been any such case as a petition presented and no adjudication made under the Act of 1861, yet when the Act of 1869 came into operation I apprehend then the 13th section might have been brought to bear upon such a state of circumstances; but what I meant to say, and what I mean, is, that the 13th section has no application whatever to such a case as this, where there has been a complete adjudication, and where you have before the court an assignee who, if there was an action at law, could be plaintiff, or, if there was a suit in equity, could be plaintiff. And it is the absence of a proper plaintiff which renders the 13th section necessary, and rendered it necessary that there should be special powers conferred by that 13th section. But I cannot at all construe it as cutting down the extent of the jurisdiction given by the subsequent sections of the Act. It is, in fact, a distinct enactment standing by itself, for the mere purpose of preserving property until there is an adjudication, and until there is a person before the court who can stand in the position of a real plaintiff.

Ex parte ANDERSON; Re ANDERSON.

Then we come to the 65th, 66th, and 72nd sections of the Act. The 65th is in these terms. "The London Court of Bankruptcy shall continue to be a court of law and of equity, and principal court of record, and the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy shall have all the powers, jurisdiction, and privileges possessed by any judge of Her Majesty's Courts of Common Law at Westminster, or by any judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, and the orders of such judge shall be of the same force as if they were judgments in the Superior Courts of Law, or decrees in the High Court of Chancery." Then it provides that the chief judge may sit in chambers. Well, I think that very clearly gives the chief judge complete jurisdiction, and gives at least as extensive a jurisdiction as if he were sitting in the Court of Chancery, and as if, having proper plaintiffs before him, a bill had been filed.

So much for the 65th section. Of course in this case the matter being in a local court of bankruptcy, we must turn to the 66th section. The 66th section is this: "Every judge of a local court of bankruptcy shall, for the purposes of this Act, in addition to his proper powers as a County Court judge, have all the powers and jurisdiction of a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, and the orders of such judge may be enforced accordingly in manner prescribed."

Well, that certainly in its language is as plain as anything possibly can be. It says in so many words that a judge of the Court of Bankruptcy shall have all the powers of a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, and that the orders of such judge may be enforced accordingly in manner prescribed.

But the matter does not rest there, because there is the 72nd section. But before going to that I think it may be well to turn to the 12th section of the Act of 1849, because that will show how very different the terms of the 72nd section are from the terms of the 12th section of the Act of 1849, the 12th section of the Act of 1849 being that in reality which laid down and defined the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court as it existed under that Act. The 12th section is this: "That the court in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction by virtue of this Act shall have superintendence and control in all matters of bankruptcy, and shall hear, determine, and make orders in any matter of bankruptcy whatever, so far as the assignees are concerned, relating to the disposition of the estate and effects of the bankrupt, or of any estate or effects taken under the bankruptcy and claimed by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors, or relating to any acts done or sought to be done by the assignees in their character of assignees by virtue or under colour of the bankruptcy, and also in any matter of bankruptcy whatever as between the assignees and any creditor or other person appearing and submitting to the jurisdiction of the court," and then as to certificates of conformity, and so on. That in terms confines the jurisdiction to persons actually within the bankruptcy, or coming and submitting to the jurisdiction.

Well, if we turn to the 72nd section of the Act of 1869, the contrast in the terms is very strong indeed. The terms of the 72nd section are these, "Subject to the provisions of this Act, every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act, shall have full power to decide all questions of priorities, and all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, arising in any case of bankruptcy coming within the cognisance of such court, or which the court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice, or making a complete distribution of property in any case; and no such court as aforesaid shall be subject to be restrained in the execution of its powers under the Act by the order of any other court, nor shall any appeal lie from its decisions except in manner directed by this Act; and if in any proceeding in bankruptcy there arises any question of fact which the parties" (with respect to the word "parties" there, Mr. Roxburgh argued that it meant parties to the bankruptcy—in my opinion it means parties to the litigation) "which the parties desire to be tried before a jury instead of by the court itself, or which the court thinks ought to be tried before a jury, the court may direct such trial to be had, and such trial may be had, accordingly in the London Court of Bankruptcy in the same manner as if it were the trial of an issue in one of the Superior Courts of Common Law, and in the County Court in the manner in which jury trials in ordinary cases are by law held in such court."

Those words, in my opinion, give the court complete jurisdiction in all cases such as this to decide everything that may be considered necessary, with a view to the distribution of the bankrupt's estate. Well, is or is not a question such as this a question which ought to be decided with a view to the distribution of the bankrupt's estate? I am clearly of opinion that it is a question which it is essential should be so settled, and with reference to questions of this kind I have no doubt it was the intention of the Legislature that the bankruptcy courts should be complete and sufficient in themselves, and that they should for the purpose of everything included in the 72nd section exercise, at least, all the powers conferred upon any judge of the Court of Chancery. Of course, if the assignee had come here and filed a bill, beyond all doubt the Court of Chancery might first of all have granted an injunction, and afterwards have taken upon itself to decide the question whether the purchase was valid or the deed was valid—to decide the title to the property, and to decide how it should be dealt with. That being so I am of opinion that in this case there was jurisdiction to make this order.

Well, I do not think there are grounds for discharging the ex parte injunction, although I should have been better pleased if it had been applied for at some earlier period. These matters are very much within the discretion of the court, and seeing that the court had before it the examination of all these persons, that is not a discretion with which I should be disposed to interfere. Of course, all courts must be perfectly well aware that this is a jurisdiction which is of a very delicate nature, which ought not to be hastily exercised and with respect to which, except in cases of great necessity, these ex parte applications ought by no means to be encouraged. Then there come two other points upon the order which I think are material. The first is as to the form of the undertaking. I have no hesitation in saying that the court ought to follow the forms which have been universally adopted in the Court of Chancery. In the Court of Chancery it is at a somewhat recent date that these undertakings have been introduced, but they are quite essential for the ends of justice. They form the only means by which if from misrepresentation or otherwise an ex parte or any other interim injunction is improperly granted, the person prejudiced by that interim injunction, if it has been wrongly granted, can have redress. And whether it be assignee in bankruptcy or executor or liquidator, or be it who it may, the court has invariably adopted the rule of taking an unlimited undertaking not to pay out of the assets of the bankrupt, or the testator or the estate, but an unlimited undertaking to pay personally, and I think there ought to be inserted in this order an unlimited undertaking in precisely the form which is adopted by the Court of Chancery in all orders of the kind.

SHIP v. CROSSKILL.

Then I think there is a precaution which ought to have been taken which is not necessary in the Court of Chancery, because when you get into Chancery a bill is filed, and you necessarily make the whole of your case, and if the injunction is obtained there are means by which you can compel the prosecution of the suit, which, of course, must rest for its foundation, in a case such as this, upon the case made for the purpose of setting aside the deed and setting aside the sale. Now, of course, where you go without pleadings upon an ex parte application, or even not ex parte, but on notice of motion, it does not follow that in that notice or in that order there should be upon the face of it anything actually stated about the setting aside of the deed or about the setting aside of the purchase. But I do think it essential for the ends of justice that where there is an interim injunction, it should be on the assumption not only of an undertaking as to damages, but that the party who obtains the interim injunction should undertake to prosecute the proceedings which are requisite for the purpose of determining that question on the footing of which the injunction has been granted, and therefore this order ought unquestionably to have contained an undertaking on the part of the assignee, to take proceedings in the local Bankruptcy Court within some limited period (we may mention what limited time presently, but it ought to be within some limited time), for the purpose of setting aside the deed, and for the purpose of setting aside the purchase and recovering the property.

Subject to those two alterations, I think the order ought to stand, and the course which I propose to take is this. The assignee of course must have his costs out of the estate. If the assignee had insisted on the objection of the notice not being in the proper court, I should not have dismissed this application with costs, for I think very likely the parties were misled by the case in this court the other day, besides which it is a new proceeding under this Act of Parliament, and the practice has not been at present settled; but what I think will do justice between the parties is this, that the deposit shall be returned, but that, if the assignees fail in setting aside the deed and the purchase, then the appellant shall have his costs of this appeal. On the other hand, if the assignee succeeds in setting aside the deed and the purchase, the appellant shall pay all the costs of the appeal. I think that will be right and just between the parties, and therefore that will be the order I shall make. It will be like making the costs costs in the cause. The real truth is, that the courts below, when they become habituated to it, will follow as nearly as possible the precedents of the Court of Chancery. They must adapt their practice to the procedure on motion, and not on the filing of a bill, but the most unreserved undertaking as to damages must be given, and an injunction when granted must also be on the condition that there is an undertaking to institute proceedings forthwith for raising the question which is to determine the right to the property. For I do not think it at all fair to a respondent to a proceeding such as this that it should be put upon him, whether he likes it or not, to go at once at his own risk to dissolve an ex parte injunction. With these observations I think we may consider the case disposed of. If you have any doubt as to the exact terms of the order you can mention it to me.

SHIP v. CROSSKILL.

Company—Bill against directors for recovery of money paid on shares—Principal and agent—Breach of trust—Fraud.

The prospectus of a company, of which the capital was to be one million in 20,000 shares of 50l. each whereof the first issue was to be 10,000 shares, stated that more than half the capital being already subscribed for, the list would remain open only a few days and the remaining shares would be allotted in strict order of application. Relying on the prospectus, S. applied for shares, which were duly allotted to him. His name was afterwards struck off the list on the ground that the objects of the company indicated by the memorandum of association (which was registered after S. took the shares) exceeded those stated in the prospectus. The company was afterwards ordered to be wound-up.

S. then filed a bill against the former directors and the company alleging that he had been deceived by false representations in the prospectus, and that the defendants having received his money for the purposes specified in the prospectus, and having wilfully applied it to other purposes, were guilty of a breach of trust; and the bill prayed that they might be declared jointly and severally liable to make good the amount paid to them by S.:

Held that, S. having failed to establish a case of misrepresentation against the directors, the bill must be dismissed.

The fact that the memorandum of association of a company extends the objects indicated by the prospectus does not render the directors personally liable to repay money paid in respect of shares by a person who has taken shares on the faith of the prospectus, unless they have been guilty of a distinct fraud.

In May 1864, certain persons being desirous of founding a company to be called the Scotch and Universal Finance Bank, under the Limited Liability Act, issued a prospectus, in which it was stated that the capital of the projected company was to be 1,000,000l. (with power to increase to 5,000,000l.) in 20,000 shares of 50l. each. The first issue was to be 10,000 shares, on which 1l. was to be paid on application, 4l. on allotment, and 5l. in three months. The prospectus contained the following words:—“More than half of the capital being already subscribed for, the list will remain open only a few days, and by a resolution of the board, the whole of the remaining shares will be allotted in strict order of application pro rata.” The prospectus then stated the objects proposed to be effected by the company, which, in addition to the usual business of banking, comprised the purchase and sale of the precious metals in all their forms, and the importing and exporting of bullion, &c. The prospectus was followed by the usual form of application for shares.

In May 1864, James Ship, the plaintiff, received through the post a copy of the prospectus, &c., and on the faith of the representations therein contained, he, on the 28th May 1864, signed the form of application for fifty shares, and paid to the company's bankers the sum of 50*l.*, being the deposit money of 1*l.* per share required by the terms of the prospectus to be paid upon application for shares.

The company was registered on the 1st June 1864, and on the same day a letter of allotment was sent to Ship, informing him that the fifty shares for which he had applied had been allotted to him, and that the sum of 200*l.*, making up 5*l.* per share payable on allotment, must be paid on or before the 15th inst. Accordingly, on the 13th June, he paid the sum of 200*l.* to the company's bankers.

In Dec. 1864, a petition was presented to wind-up the company. Ship, whose name was upon the register, moved, before the winding-up order was made, under the 35th section of the Companies Act 1862, for an order to have the register altered by striking out his name. Wood, V.C., before whom the motion was made ordered his name to be struck out of the register (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256). The official liquidator appealed, and the Vice-Chancellor's order was affirmed by the Lords Justices. An appeal was then made to the House of Lords, who substantially affirmed the decision of the courts below: (Downes v. Ship, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; L. Rep. 8 E. & I. App. 343.)

The present bill was filed by Ship in June 1865, after the Lords Justices had affirmed the Vice-Chancellor's decision in his favour. The object of the suit and the other circumstances of the case are stated in the judgment.

Jessel, Q. C., and Locock Webb appeared for the plaintiff.

The Lord Advocate for Scotland (Young, Q. C., Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Mackeson, Q. C., Ferrers, C. T. Simpson, Nalder, F. A. Lewin, and Fooks appeared for the several defendants.

The following cases were referred to:—

Henderson v. Lacon, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 527; L. Rep. 5 Eq. 249;

Stewart v. Austin, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 299;

Green v. Barrett, 1 Sim. 45.

March 21.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit praying that, under the circumstances which are stated in the bill, the defendants, who were the directors of a company called the Scottish and Universal Finance Bank (Limited), have constituted themselves trustees for the plaintiff of the sums of 50*l.* and 200*l.* paid by him, and that they are jointly and severally liable to make good to the plaintiff these two sums, together with interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent.; that an account may be taken, and that they may be decreed to pay the amount within a short time. The facts of the case it is unnecessary to recapitulate, for they are very notorious and well-known to everybody, through Ship's case, which was decided originally by the present Lord Chancellor, when Vice-Chancellor, affirmed by the Lords Justices, and afterwards in substance affirmed by the House of Lords. The facts, as far as they are material to the decision of this case, are these: In May 1864 certain persons decided to found a company called the Scottish and Universal Finance Bank. They issued a prospectus, and registered the company, but I think it unnecessary to refer to the fact that there was a company originally registered on the 3rd May with a different memorandum of association, which was afterwards withdrawn, and another substituted, which the registrar could only have registered in the event of the other not being in existence, and which second one was issued on the 1st June, with an enlarged memorandum of association. The prospectus represented that they were going to do certain things. The memorandum of association very much extended the objects of the company, and gave it power to do things which would not have been anticipated from the representations made by the prospectus. The result of this was that when Mr. Ship heard of it, in the month of December following, at a time when an application was about to be made to wind-up the company, he made a motion under the 35th section of the Companies' Act 1862, for the purpose of having his name withdrawn from the list. [His Lordship stated the result of Ship's case, and of the appeals in that case, and continued.] In June 1865 Mr. Ship filed this Bill for the purpose I have already mentioned, to make all the directors personally, severally, and individually liable to pay him the amount which he had paid to the company. I expressed an opinion at the time when this case was argued, and I repeat that expression of my conviction, that for that purpose it must be established that there was by the prospectus a misrepresentation made by the persons sought to be made answerable, knowingly false, made by them with a view to deceive, and which did deceive, the plaintiff. Ship's case unquestionably is one of the highest authority, it has been always followed, and has regularly formed the principles of the court in these cases since. But what was decided in that case has, in my opinion, nothing at all to do, as I stated at the time, with what has to be decided in the present case. All that that case decided was this—that if you issue a prospectus undertaking to do certain things, and by the memorandum of association you found a company doing things much more extensive, and of much wider application, then a person who has taken shares upon the faith of the prospectus cannot be compelled to remain a member of the society, but may have his name taken off the list of shareholders, or, if the company is being wound-up, off the list of contributories. And though it is not so stated, I apprehend that it would follow from that that the person who has his name so taken off the list would be entitled to be repaid by the company the amount that he had paid to the company under that misapprehension. But in that respect he would only be a creditor of the company, and could only prove in case the company was being wound-up; or, in case the company was a going concern, he could only bring an action for the amount. For that purpose it would not be at all necessary to file a bill; but that would not affect in the slightest degree the individual directors of the company. To make them personally liable they must have been guilty of a distinct fraud. I think that is established in all the cases. I fully adopt the distinction expressed by Lord Redesdale, with reference to what is called constructive fraud, where persons have really been guilty of no moral fraud, but by a species of construction of equity, they are said to be guilty of a fraud, in which case Lord Redesdale was of opinion that the Statute of Limitations would run, and would bar the remedy against them. However I have nothing to do with that at present. I am of opinion that it is quite established, and I think the two cases which were cited to me, and which were endeavoured to be explained away—one of them at least—by Mr. Jessel, clearly establish the view of the case that I am now taking. They are the case of Henderson v. Lacon (sup.), and the case of Stewart v. Austin (sup.), both of which cases I have brought into court with me for the purpose of considering. Lord Hatherley lays down very distinctly in Henderson v. Lacon, that if the directors make a false representation, knowing it to be false, and if that deceives a person, they are answerable for it, and that accordingly they must be made liable for the consequences; it must, however, be a material representation. In Henderson v. Lacon, the false representation was this—they stated in the prospectus that the directors and their friends had taken a very large number of the shares. On referring to the case I find that the words are these: “The directors and their friends have subscribed a large portion of the capital.” That is the expression; and it appeared that so far from having subscribed a large portion of the capital, even calling every person who had subscribed their friend, there were only about 144 shares subscribed for. It would be absurd to say that that was a correct representation. This is very material with a view to considering what is the false representation complained of in the present case. Then what does the Lord Chancellor—then the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood—say with respect to that? In the first place he connects them all with the issuing of the prospectus. He says:—“Now as to the issuing of the prospectus, I have the admission of all the directors that it was issued by their authority; as to three who were present at the meeting of the 15th March, the case is perfectly clear;” and then the other admitted that he knew of it and that he sanctioned it. It was a statement of what they themselves had done; therefore they knowingly made a representation to the public that they themselves and their friends had subscribed a large portion of the capital, knowing well that at the time they made that statement the fact was not so, and that they had in fact subscribed nothing but what was merely sufficient to enable them to hold the office of directors; and accordingly Lord Hatherley, if I may be allowed to say so, very properly held that they were all guilty of a fraud, that they had made a false representation which had deceived the plaintiff, and that they were all liable. The case of Stewart v. Austin is perfectly distinct from that. The case there was that the directors had made no representation at all. The plaintiff had been struck off the register of the company by the order of the court exactly on the same ground as here—on the ground of excess in the objects of the company, as shown by the memorandum which was registered after he became a member, over those objects which were stated in the prospectus, on the faith of which prospectus he took the shares. Then he filed a bill for the return of his deposit against the directors who had issued the prospectus of the company. It is true that he did not allege a fraudulent intention; but if the facts create a fraud it is perfectly unnecessary to allege the fraudulent intention nor will the word “fraud” create fraud if the facts themselves do not establish it. Lord Hatherley held in that case that there was no fraudulent statement on the part of the directors at all, and that they were the agents, no doubt, of the plaintiff, who had given them the money for the purpose of applying it in a particular manner. They had applied it in a different manner, that is to say, they had applied it for a more extensive purpose, and he was entitled to be struck off the list of contributories. But that did not constitute a fraudulent act on the part of the directors, and Lord Hatherley is distinct and clear upon that subject. I am unable to distinguish Stewart v. Austin from the present case. There really is no distinction between them, with the exception of the passage I am going to refer to in a moment, whether that constitutes a misrepresentation in the prospectus or not; but, assuming there to be no misrepresentation in the prospectus, the principle of the case of Stewart v. Austin is exactly the principle applicable here, namely, that making a company extend to objects larger than those specified in the prospectus entitles a shareholder to have his name taken off the list of shareholders, and not to be a contributory; but at the same time it does not entitle him to go against the directors themselves, and say that they are trustees for him of all the money received from him. In fact this is quite a new attempt, so far as this it concerned, and of the numerous cases in which this court has struck off the name of a shareholder from being a contributory—when I say a shareholder I mean a person who subscribed for shares—on the ground that the objects of the company extended beyond what were published in the prospectus, I do not know a single case where the directors have been made liable where there has not been personal misconduct or personal fraud on the part of the directors themselves. What is the fraud which is here alleged against the directors, for it comes to that exclusively? The alleged fraud is this, that in the prospectus they used these words:—“More than half of the capital being already subscribed for, the list will remain open only a few days, and by a resolution of the board the whole of the remaining shares will be allotted in strict order of application pro rata.” In the first place, it was attempted to be argued that that extended to the whole 5,000,000*l.*, to which there was power to increase the capital, the original capital being 1,000,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each, with power to increase to 5,000,000*l.* But the prospectus says:—“First issue 10,000 shares; 1*l.* on application, 4*l.* on allotment, and 5*l.* in three months. It is not intended to call up more than 25*l.* per share.” Then it refers to one or two other things, such as, “If more shares are applied for than are allotted, the surplus of the deposit money will be applied to the payment due on allotment;” and then, “More than half of the capital being already subscribed for,” &c., as I read before. I am of opinion that the words “More than the half of the capital” extend properly and according to all grammatical and reasonable construction to the first issue, namely, the 10,000 shares, and that they were not intended to apply to the 20,000 shares. This is the thing that is complained of. The prospectus was issued on the 3rd May. At the time when the prospectus was actually issued—when the words were written—there were not more than half of the shares subscribed for; but on the 1st June, before Mr. Ship took the shares, not only were there more than half of the shares subscribed for, but the whole of the shares had been subscribed for, and many persons had been refused shares. Can anybody say that this misled him, and that he was in any way whatever deceived by it? Supposing he had gone to the company’s office and said, “Is it true that more than half of the shares have been subscribed for?” When he went on the 28th May they would have said, and with perfect truth, “Yes, more than half of the shares have been applied for.” I think more than the whole number had been applied for at that time, and then they took them, as they said, alphabetically. It is true that this company was very much run after; it certainly was not a bubble company at all, it cannot be put upon that footing. It was a company that failed egregiously, for I think it was wound-up six months after its registration, like many of these companies; but there can be no pretence for saying that there was anything like mala fides, or any of that species of defect which Lord Cairns, in a case that was cited to me, very clearly and distinctly laid down as one of the essential ingredients of fraud. That being so, I am of opinion that there is no fraudulent misrepresentation here. It is not a representation that the directors have done anything. In the first place, how are they attached to it? The most important of them is Mr. Crosskill. I will read one passage from his answer upon this subject. In the seventh paragraph he says, “I believe that a prospectus, to the purport and effect set forth in the second paragraph of the bill, was, but without my privity, assent, or authority, printed and published. I believe that this prospectus was intended to refer to the company incorporated by the memorandum of the 1st of June, stated in the 29th paragraph of the bill, being the proposed company of which I had consented to become a director, but I do not know and cannot set forth as to my belief or otherwise whether this prospectus was printed or published after I had in manner aforesaid consented to become a director of the proposed company, or before the 5th of May, 1864, or at what time it was printed or published. I was in no way party or privy to the preparation, printing or publication of the said prospectus. I never sanctioned it, and never saw it, and, till after the bill in this cause was filed, did not know the terms thereof." I am of opinion, following Lord Hatherley's judgment, that it is essential to establish that he had taken some part in the representation, and that he knew it. There is one gentleman, Mr. Downes, as to whom I think there is some proof that he knew it, but he is the only one. As to Mr. Legg, he had positively nothing whatever to do with it. They used his name without his authority, and he had nothing at all to do with it and knew nothing at all about it: and the greater number of the other directors are very poor, and the suit has not been prosecuted against them. They do not appear, and no steps are taken against them. But, with respect to Mr. Downes, I am of opinion that there is nothing whatever proved against him of any fraudulent representation or the like. I am struck with this also, that this seems to have been the view taken by the judges in the other courts. I hold in my hand the papers which were printed for the use of the House of Lords in Downes v. Ship, which are put in evidence in this case; amongst them is the judgment of the Lords Justices, who made a very clear distinction and gave a very clear judgment upon the subject. It is important to observe that Turner, L. J., does in that case, as I do in this, throw out of the question the memorandum of association of the 5th of May, and he says: "I have no idea that Mr. Ship ever intended to become a member of this company according to its constitution under the memorandum of the 5th of May, and I assume the case therefore to depend wholly upon the memorandum of the 1st of June," which unquestionably is so, because the other had no existence at all. After some discussion as to the costs, Knight Bruce, L. J., makes some observations about it; and Mr. Daniel, one of the counsel, says, "Your lordships have not said anything about the question of fraud." They dismissed both the motions that were brought before them with costs, because the appeal was wrong, and Knight Bruce, L. J., says, in reply to Mr. Daniel, "Not a word." And Turner, L. J., says, "I may say that I do not think there was any fraud on the part of your clients." The whole case was before them upon that appeal; and Turner, L. J., a judge who unquestionably was not in the habit of using expressions loosely or lightly, deliberately says, "I am of opinion there was no fraud." He volunteers that, and yet this bill is filed immediately afterwards in order to fix the directors on the ground of fraud, and upon the ground of making them liable as trustees, which can only be in the case of fraud. Without going into the details of the evidence, I am of opinion that the case fails, and as the bill alleges fraud it must be dismissed with costs.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 22.

DEAN v. BENNETT.

Baptist congregation—Trust deed—Dismissal of minister—Notice of meeting not specifying charges—Time of giving notice—Informal notice—Invalid resolution.

By the terms of the trust-deed of a Baptist congregation, the minister was liable to be removed by the decision, order, or direction of the church made and declared at a meeting of members who had been communicants for six months previously, of which notice should have been given as therein mentioned; and confirmed and approved at a second such meeting.

Disputes having arisen, notice was, on a particular Sunday, given of a meeting to be held on the following Saturday, "for the purpose of bringing charges against and considering the dismissal of" the minister. No specification of the charges was read, or was ever issued to anyone. The meeting was held, and a resolution was passed that the minister be dismissed. On the following Sunday a second notice was given of a second meeting to be held on the following Saturday "for the purpose of confirming and ratifying" the resolutions passed at the first meeting, but without specifying the resolutions which it was proposed to confirm. The second meeting was held, and the former resolutions were confirmed and ratified:

Held, that the second notice was invalid, because it did not specify the resolutions which were intended to be confirmed, and consequently that the resolutions passed at the second meeting were invalid:

Held also, that the omission to specify the charges which were intended to be brought against the minister, rendered the resolutions which were passed at the first meeting invalid.

By a settlement dated in 1795, certain lands at Barnoldswick, Yorkshire, and the chapel or meeting house erected thereon, called the old chapel, were vested in trustees upon certain trusts, but which trusts contained no provision for the dismissal of the minister of the chapel.

On the 7th July 1845 an agreement was made between the then trustees and the defendant, the Rev. Thomas Bennett, whereby he agreed to supply the pulpit and discharge the pastoral duties.

In 1852 a new chapel was built, and a new deed of settlement, dated the 9th Dec. 1852, was executed, which contained provisions as to the dismissal of the minister.

It was provided that every minister of the church should be liable to be forthwith removed by the decision, order, or direction of the church made and declared at one meeting, and confirmed and approved at a second meeting, to be called for that purpose in manner therein mentioned. It was also provided that all decisions, orders, and directions of the church, relative to any of the purposes specified and set forth therein, or any other matter or thing whatsoever, should be from time to time made and declared by the male and female members of the church, who should have been communicants for at least a previous period of six calendar months or a majority of them actually present at a meeting, of which notice should have been given publicly in the said chapels, or in one of them, during Divine worship on Sunday morning at least four days before the time of holding such meetings respectively. It was further provided that, whenever the church should have to consider the appointment of a minister or ministers, or the dismissal of a minister or ministers or other matters therein mentioned, the notice to be publicly given in manner aforesaid, should expressly state the object of such meeting, and each of the decisions, orders, and directions, to be made and declared at any such last mentioned meeting, should be reconsidered at a second meeting of the church, to be convened by public notice, to be given in manner aforesaid, expressly stating the object thereof; and such decisions, orders, and directions of each such first meeting should not be construed or held to be binding until confirmed and approved at a second meeting.

From and after 1852 Mr. Bennett officiated as minister of both the old and new chapels.

On Sunday, the 20th Sept. 1868, the following notice was read by members of the congregation in both the chapels during Divine service:—

We, the undersigned, being respectively trustees, deacons, and members of the church and congregation of Christians at Barnoldswick, in the county of York, commonly known by the name of Particular Baptists, hereby give notice that a meeting of the male and female members of the said church who shall have been communicants for at least a previous period of six calendar months, will be held in the old chapel belonging to the said church in Barnoldswick aforesaid, on Saturday next, the 26th Sept. instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of considering the dismissal of the Rev. Thomas Bennett as the present minister of the said church, and of making and declaring such decisions, orders, and directions on the subject of the said meeting, as the majority of the members present at such meeting may think proper. Dated at Barnoldswick aforesaid, this 19th Sept. 1868.

The meeting of the 26th Sept. was accordingly held, and a resolution was proposed and seconded to the effect "that the church dismiss the Rev. Thomas Bennett from the office of minister on the ground of some statements referring to Mr. Bennett's business affairs, and that his ministry cease from this day." To this an amendment was proposed and seconded to the effect "that this meeting adjourns the consideration of the dismissal of the Rev. Thomas Bennett from the office of minister for the period of twelve calendar months, from the 26th Sept. 1868." The amendment was put and carried by a majority of 59 to 47.

On Sunday, the 18th Oct. 1868, the following notice was read during the morning service in the old chapel, and during the afternoon service in the new chapel, by the officiating minister (Mr. Bennett having been excluded from the pulpits of both the chapels):—

We, the undersigned, being respectively deacons and members (&c., stating, in the same terms as the former notice, that a meeting would be held on Saturday, the 24th Oct.), for the purpose of bringing charges against and considering the dismissal of the Rev. Thomas Bennett, as the present minister of the said church, and of making and declaring such decisions, orders, and directions on the subject of said meeting, as the majority of the members present may think proper, or any other business.

WILLIAM BERRY,

On the 23rd Oct. the defendant caused a counter notice to be served upon John Edmondson, Thomas Edmondson, William Berry, and Joseph Wilcock, giving them notice "that the object named in the notice read on the 18th Oct. for a meeting on the 24th, is illegal, and the notice is illegal, and that any acts done by the said meeting will be of no effect."

On the 24th Oct. 1868, a meeting was held, at which a resolution was passed that, in consequence of certain offences therein alleged to have been committed by Mr. Bennett, the meeting unanimously agreed "that he is not a fit, and proper person to occupy the position of pastor and that his office as pastor cease forthwith."

On Sunday, the 25th Oct., the following notice was read by the officiating minister at the old chapel during morning service, and also during afternoon service at the new chapel:—

We, the undersigned, being respectively deacons and members (&c., stating, in the same terms as the former notices, that a meeting would be held on Saturday, 31st Oct.), for the purpose of confirming and ratifying the resolutions passed at the church meeting, held Oct. 24th, 1868.

Dated at Barnoldswick aforesaid, 25th Oct. 1868.

WILLIAM BERRY,	}	Members.
JOHN EDMONDSON,

On the 31st October, accordingly, the meeting was held, and a resolution to the effect that the minutes of the meeting of the 24th October "be passed, confirmed, and ratified," was unanimously carried.

The bill was filed on the 15th of March, praying that the defendant might be restrained from taking or endeavouring to take possession of the pulpits in the chapels at Barnoldswick, vested in the plaintiffs as trustees of the settlement of 1852, or either of them, and from acting or officiating in any manner whatsoever as minister thereof, and from in any way disturbing or interfering with the performance of divine worship in the chapels, or either of them, and from in any way intermeddling or interfering with the trust property vested in the plaintiffs by the new deed of settlement.

On the 8th May 1869, a motion for an injunction was made and ordered to stand to the hearing, on the plaintiffs' undertaking not to allow anybody to preach in the new chapel without the defendant's consent.

The cause now came on upon motion for decree.

Amphlett, Q.C., Fry, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the plaintiffs, cited:—

Perry v. Shipway, 1 Giff. 1; 4 De G. & J. 353.

Kay, Q.C., and Wickens, for the defendant, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case the bill has been filed for the purpose of having it declared that the defendant has been properly removed from his office as minister, and for an injunction consequent upon that declaration. The whole matter resolves itself into a very simple question as to the validity of the dismissal purported to have been effected by resolutions of two meetings convened by two notices. The first notice appears to me to have been properly and sufficiently given by persons properly and sufficiently authorised to call meetings of this congregation, and it was a meeting summoned "for the purpose of considering the dismissal of the Rev. Thomas Bennett" (this was a meeting preliminary to the two upon which reliance is placed) "as the present minister of the said church, and of making and declaring such decisions, orders, and directions on the subject of the said meeting as the majority of the members present at such meeting may think proper." At that meeting, by a majority, the consideration of the question was postponed for a period of twelve months, which does not seem to me to be a reasonable or proper mode of dealing with the question, and therefore I am not surprised that the persons who were dissatisfied with that took an opportunity of summoning another meeting. They did so accordingly, by a notice which was as follows:—"We, the undersigned, do summon a meeting for the purpose of bringing charges against and considering the dismissal of the Rev. Thomas Bennett as the minister of the said church." That seems to be signed also by persons duly authorised to summon such a meeting. Now, "for the purpose of bringing charges against a person" is a matter which requires that everything shall be done according to the strictest forms and principles of justice; and it appears to me that if a meeting was summoned for the purpose of bringing charges, those charges ought to have been communicated to Mr. Bennett before the meeting was called, that he might have an opportunity of knowing what he was to meet. At that meeting a resolution was passed rescinding the resolution of the previous meeting, upon the ground that the scrutiny had not been given. Of the intention to pass such a resolution no notice whatever was given. The second resolution was that, in consequence of Mr. Bennett having done various serious matters which are alleged against him, it was resolved that he was not a fit and proper person to occupy his position, and that his office should cease forthwith. It does not appear by what evidence those charges were supported, or in what way they were investigated, or that any evidence, in fact, was given in respect of them except that a certain person who was present, and who appears to have taken a very active part in the proceedings of this disturbed congregation, was required to read remarks made by a commissioner in bankruptcy. That certainly was not a mode in which anybody ought to be tried for any offence or to be convicted. Those resolutions were, however, passed, and then it is said a subsequent meeting was held for the purpose of confirming those resolutions, and that those resolutions were duly confirmed accordingly. Now I hold that that second notice was perfectly insufficient and invalid in point of law, because it being a notice to confirm resolutions, there was no way in which the congregation could be informed of the resolutions, and the only mode by which that notice could have been properly given was a notice intimating the resolutions which had been passed, and convening a meeting for the purpose of considering those resolutions. That notice I hold to be invalid. The second meeting for confirming the resolution, therefore, is void, and upon that ground I am of opinion that the plaintiff's bill has failed, and must be dismissed with costs, which will include the costs of the motion.

BUCKINGHAM v. SELICK. MOYE v. SPARROW.

[V.C. J.]

BUCKINGHAM v. SELICK.

Practice—Order for sale under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40 (Partition Act).

In a suit for the sale of property under the above Act, where inquiries were directed, the court will not make an order for sale on the hearing of the cause. The order must be made on further consideration.

This was an administration suit, in the course of which some of the parties, jointly interested with others, being desirous that the property should be sold and divided, applied to the court under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 40 (the Partition Act) at the hearing of the cause, to direct such inquiries as to the nature of the property, and the persons interested in it and other matters as it might think necessary, and for an order for sale of the property.

P. A. Kingdom, for the plaintiff, cited Silver v. Frost (a) mentioned in Silver v. Udall, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 227, in which case the Master of the Rolls made an immediate decree for a sale without waiting for the further consideration of the cause. He also cited

Peters v. Bacon, 20 L. T. Rep. 729.

(a) This case is not reported.

B. Babington and W. Coode appeared for some of the defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that under the 9th section of the Act—which enacts that if any person who, if this Act had not been passed might have maintained a suit for partition, may maintain such suit against any one or more of the parties interested without serving the other or others (if any) of those parties; and it shall not be competent to any defendant in the suit to object for want of parties; and at the hearing of the cause the court may direct such inquiries as to the nature of the property, and the persons interested therein, and other matters as it thinks necessary or proper with a view to an order for partition or sale being made on further consideration—the court, whilst directing inquiries to be made, had no jurisdiction at the hearing of the cause to make an immediate order for sale. Such order can only be made on further consideration when the result of the inquiries was known.

MOYE v. SPARROW.

Amendment of decree—Mistake.

Where counsel were instructed to state that which, upon inquiry, was found to be incorrect. On such discovery being made, the court will order the decree to be amended.

This was a motion to amend the decree in the suit of Moye v. Sparrow, reported at 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 154, by replacing the name of the defendant, William Barnard, on the list of contributories.

At the hearing of the cause the plaintiff's counsel were instructed to state that William Barnard was insolvent, which statement at the time was accepted as true, and the bill was dismissed as against him. The decree was made on the 26th Jan. 1870, and the defendants, who were made contributories, immediately set about making inquiries after Barnard, who they discovered was in the possession of a dairy with a large number of cows and other stock.

Upon this discovery being made, an affidavit was filed on the 22nd April stating these facts. Barnard then filed an affidavit stating that his cows and stock were all mortgaged for the amount he had to borrow to set himself up in business.

Eddis, Q. C. appeared in support of the motion.

Fry, Q. C. appeared for Barnard.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he had dispensed with all inquiries as to Barnard on account of the statement by counsel that he was in a state of insolvency. This having been discovered not to have been the fact, and there being nothing in Barnard's affidavit to show that he was insolvent, he must be placed on the list of contributories, and the minutes must stand as prepared by the defendants. The plaintiffs to pay the costs of this motion.

PENTON v. MURDUCK.

Infectious disease—Bailment of animal infected with—Liability of bailor.

The declaration alleged that the defendant had a horse and well knowing it to be glandered, and to be in an infectious state, delivered the said horse to the plaintiff to be kept by the plaintiff for the defendant in a stable of the plaintiff with another horse of the plaintiff, and without informing the plaintiff that the said horse was glandered; by means of which the plaintiff, not knowing that the said horse was glandered, was induced by the defendant to, and did place the said horse in a stable of the plaintiff with the said horse of the plaintiff, and the said disease was then communicated by the said horse of the defendant to the said horse of the plaintiff, so that the said horse of the plaintiff had to be killed. After verdict for the plaintiff, it was Held, on a motion in arrest of judgment, that the declaration disclosed a good cause of action.

The declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully kept a horse, well knowing the same to be glandered, and to be affected with an infectious, contagious, and fatal disease called glanders, and well knowing the premises, wrongfully delivered the said horse to the plaintiff to be kept and taken care of by the plaintiff for the defendant in a stable of the plaintiff with another horse of the plaintiff, and without informing the plaintiff that the said horse was glandered or had the said disease; by means of which premises the plaintiff, not knowing that the said horse was glandered or had the said disease, was induced by the defendant to and did place the said horse in the said stable of the plaintiff with the said horse of the plaintiff, and the said disease was then communicated by the said horse of the defendant to the said horse of the plaintiff, and the said horse became then infected with the same fatal disease, and had to be killed.

Plea, not guilty.

The case was tried at the Middlesex Sittings in Hilary Term, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff.

Waddy now moved in arrest of judgment. Hill v. Balls, 2 H. & N. 299; 27 L. J. 45, Ex. is an authority to show that this declaration discloses no cause of action. There is no statement of concealment, fraud, or warranty. It is compatible with this declaration, that the defendant at the time believed the plaintiff to know the state the horse was in, and on that account did not tell him.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that this declaration does disclose a breach of duty on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff. The question is raised after verdict, and I assume that the necessary evidence was given in support of the declaration. The declaration says in substance, that the plaintiff having no knowledge that the horse was glandered, the defendant brought the horse while affected with glanders to the plaintiff, and the defendant, knowing the condition in which the horse was, gave it to the plaintiff to be taken care of in a stable of the plaintiff with another horse of the plaintiff. The declaration also shows that the defendant was aware, and the plaintiff was ignorant, of the condition of the horse. The defendant, having under these circumstances, induced the plaintiff to put this horse into his stable with another horse belonging to the plaintiff, all that the law requires to give a cause of action is satisfied. The distinction between this case and Hill v. Balls is that the latter case was one between buyer and seller. Besides, as was pointed out by Martin, B. in giving judgment in that case, it was consistent with that declaration, that the defendant "told the auctioneer that the horse was glandered, and to sell him as such." Here any such supposition is entirely excluded by the declaration. The case then stands on this ground: the defendant delivers a well-known dangerous article to the plaintiff for the purpose of placing it in the plaintiff's stable with another horse of the plaintiff. The defendant must have contemplated the natural consequences of such an act, and must bear the responsibility of it.

M. SMITH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The declaration substantially says, that the defendant induced the plaintiff to put a horse into the same stable with a horse belonging to the plaintiff; the defendant well knowing that the horse was glandered, while the plaintiff was ignorant of it. I think that that shows a good cause of action. It was the duty of the defendant not to allow a glandered horse to be put with a sound horse, without informing the owner of the latter of the true facts of the case. The declaration says that the defendant knew, and the plaintiff was ignorant, of the state of the defendant's horse, so that the case in the Exchequer does not apply.

BRETT, J.—The declaration alleges not only that the defendant delivered a glandered horse to the plaintiff, but that he delivered it to him for the purpose of placing it with another horse belonging to the plaintiff, and induced the plaintiff to put it with the other horse. If that was so, and if the defendant knew his horse was glandered, and knew the nature of glanders, it was his duty to tell the plaintiff of the state of the horse. This he did not do. The declaration says that the plaintiff was ignorant of the circumstance. I certainly think, that, if a man delivers a horse to his neighbour that is likely to infect his neighbour's horse, it is his duty to disclose the state of his horse, and that if he omits to do so, he is liable for the natural consequences of his omission. With regard to the case in the Exchequer, there was no allegation that the horse was to be put in a particular stable or near another horse, as was pointed out by my brother Martin. That is, however, alleged here. On these grounds, I think there should be no rule.

Rule refused.

BROOMFIELD AND OTHERS v. THE SOUTHERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Bottomry bond—Insurance of—Constructive total loss.

The master of a ship executed a bottomry bond upon the ship, the condition of which was that if the ship should arrive at the end of her voyage, and on such arrival the amount of the bond should be paid to the lenders, or in case of the loss of the said ship, such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage, or if on the voyage the ship should be utterly lost, cast away, or destroyed in consequence of the perils of the sea, then the bond should be void. The bottomry bondholder effected an insurance on the bottomry bond against perils of the sea, &c. The ship was by the perils of the sea so much damaged as to be not worth repairing, and was sold by the master for a sum much less than the amount of the bond:

Held, that the condition of the bond only referred to an actual total loss of the ship, and not to a constructive total loss; and that there had, therefore, been no loss of the bond within the policy of insurance, and the bondholder was not entitled to maintain an action upon it against the insurers.

Stephens v. Broomfield, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 516, discussed and followed.

The declaration was in substance as follows:—

It stated that William Baillie, as master of the ship Great Pacific, of the port of Liverpool, being at the port of Sydney, in New South Wales, on the 29th March 1867, executed and delivered to the plaintiffs a bottomry bond on the ship. This instrument was set out verbatim in the declaration. After reciting that the plaintiffs had agreed to advance to the master a certain sum of money for the necessary reparations, refittings, provisions, stores, outfit, and the other necessary and lawful disbursements and expenses of the ship, so as to enable her to proceed with her voyage, it contained a mortgage of the ship and freight for securing the advance so made, and the premium agreed upon in respect thereof, and the condition of the bond was that if the said ship or vessel should, with all reasonable speed, sail from the port of Sydney aforesaid, and duly prosecute and complete the said intended voyage or voyages, and that without deviation except as aforesaid; the perils, damages, casualties, and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation excepted; and if the above bounden William Baillie, his executors or administrators, or some or one of them, or the owners of the said ship, would well and truly pay, or cause to be paid unto the plaintiffs, the principal money advanced, together with the interest or premiums thereon, before the expiration of twelve hours after the safe arrival of the ship at the port of discharge in the United Kingdom; or in case of the loss of the said ship or vessel, such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage; or if on the said voyage the said ship should be utterly lost, cast away, or destroyed in consequence of fire, enemies, men-of-war, pirates, storms, or other unavoidable perils, damages, or casualties of the seas, rivers, and navigation, then the bond or obligation to be void and of no effect, or otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.

It was then further alleged that the plaintiffs caused to be made with the defendants a certain policy of insurance. By this policy the insurance was agreed to and declared to be an insurance at and from Sydney to Callao and the Chincha Islands, thence to Cork for orders, final port of discharge to be in the United Kingdom on bottomry bond in or of the ship called the Great Pacific. The perils insured against were the ordinary risks covered by a policy of marine insurance. The declaration further averred that after the commencement of the said risks insured against, and during the continuance of the same, the said ship became and was by divers of the perils in the said bottomry bond mentioned, as well as by the said policy insured against, wholly lost on the said insured voyage, and in consequence thereof the master of the said ship during the said insured voyage properly and necessarily sold the said ship, and the proceeds of the sale of the said ship amounted to a sum much less than the said amount for which the said bottomry bond had been given and which was the subject of the said bottomry as aforesaid; and by reason of the premises the defendants became and were liable under the said policy to pay to the plaintiffs a certain sum in proportion to the sum so insured by them as aforesaid, to wit, a sum of 800*l.*; and all times elapsed and all conditions were performed and fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants pay to them the said sum of 800*l.* and to maintain the present action, yet the defendants did not pay to the plaintiffs the said sum or any part thereof.

Plaintiffs' points: First, that the whole amount mentioned in the bottomry bond is not payable under the bottomry bond in the case of a constructive total loss of the ship, and that the insurers of the bottomry bond are in such case liable for a certain proportion of the amount insured; secondly, that in case of a constructive total loss of the ship, the policy sued on when taken in connection with the bottomry bond which is the subject matter of insurance, makes the defendants liable; thirdly, that the count demurred to discloses a total loss of the ship, in respect of which the defendants are liable.

Defendants' points: The declaration does not show that the ship was utterly lost within the conditions of the bottomry bond; secondly, it is consistent with the declaration that the ship was only partially lost; thirdly, the declaration does not show a loss of the bond, and consistently with the declaration the bond is still valid and in full force.

Honyman, Q.C., with him Watkin Williams for the defendants: The declaration only shows a constructive total loss of the ship. It is clear law that in general the doctrine of constructive total loss does not apply to bottomry bonds, and that where the ship continues to exist in specie, there is no loss of the bond within the meaning of the policy of insurance upon it: (Thompson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 M. & S. 31.) In Stephens v. Broomfield, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 516, a case arising out of the same transaction as the present, it was held on that very ground that the bottomry bondholder was entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the sale of the ship as against a mortgagee. It was then decided that a constructive total loss was not a loss within the meaning of the condition of the bond. It follows from the same reasoning, that there is no loss of the bond within the meaning of the policy, for until the ship has been in fact totally lost, the bond continues in full force: (See also 1 Parson's Maritime Law, 409.)

Mellish, Q. C., with him H. James, Q. C., and Cohen.—It has no doubt been decided by the case of Thompson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 M. & S. 31, that where the master has not been discharged by the loss from paying the whole amount of the bond, there is no loss under a bottomry insurance. It seems somewhat extraordinary that in a case where the value of the security has been so reduced in value as not to equal a tenth part of the sum due on the bottomry bond, it should be held that there is no loss on the insurance, and Mr. Phillips throws out some doubt whether Thompson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company ought to be supported. I feel, however, that I cannot ask this court to overrule it, and that only a court of error can do that. It only follows, however, from that case, that as long as the master is liable for the amount of the bond, the underwriter not being an insurer of the solvency of the master, there is not a loss within the policy, and it would follow from that, that if the bond were so worded that the master would be discharged if there had been a constructive total loss, and the salvage had been paid to the bondholder, then there would be a loss of the bond by which the bondholder would have lost the difference in value between the amount of the salvage and the bottomry bond. Nothing could be more reasonable than for the master to say that on payment over of the proceeds of the salvage to the bottomry bondholder, he should be discharged. For it is very hard on the master that he should remain liable under such circumstances. The question is, whether this be not the meaning of the condition of the present bond. There are three contingencies mentioned in it; the first and the last are perfectly plain. The only question is, as to the meaning of the second; it is no doubt ambiguously worded, but is it not the most reasonable construction that it provides for a state of things not met by the first and third, merely the case of the ship not being prevented from performing the voyage by an actual total loss, but being so much damaged as to make it a case of constructive total loss; and that the meaning is that in such a case, if all the proceeds of salvage are paid over to the bottomry bondholder, the master shall be discharged. [MARTIN, B.—May it not mean such an average as would cover the amount of the bond?] It does not say so. We say that we are entitled to the difference between the proceeds and the amount of the bottomry bond. The real effect of the bond is that the ship is mortgaged or pledged to us for the amount of our bond, and we insure that amount. All the Privy Council had to decide in the case of Stephens v. Broomfield, was whether the bottomry bondholder took precedence of the mortgagee. It was quite unnecessary really to touch the question whether the master was discharged by the loss, and on that question, according to Thompson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, the case depended. [MARTIN, B.—It was necessary to decide the question whether the loss referred to by the words you rely upon would include a constructive total loss, for if they did not, the interest of the mortgagees in the proceeds of the sale could not arise, inasmuch as only a constructive total loss occurred. The only meaning of the words appears to me to be, to secure to the bondholder any salvage on a loss; the proceeds of the sale are not salvage within the meaning of this clause.] This is clearly a distinction intended to be drawn between the case of a total and partial loss. [CLEASBY, B.—There are really only two alternatives in the condition, each introduced by the word "if."]

FAIRLIE v. FENTON AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants. Whatever construction may be put on the clause of the bond in question, I do not see how it can be said that there has been any loss of the bond within the meaning of the policy.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This is the case of an assurance against the loss of the bond by the loss of the ship. It has been held that in such a case an actual total loss is meant. Mr. Mellish says that the words which he relied on in this bottomry bond make a difference, although he says they are very difficult to give a precise meaning to. Now, I think it is extremely plain, that whatever the effect of them may be, they do not advance his case. On the loss of the ship the lender on bottomry is to become entitled to the average due on salvage. The money received on the sale of the ship cannot be called salvage within this proviso, and in order that it may come into effect there must be a loss of the ship within the meaning of the term loss, as applicable to bottomry bonds, i.e., an actual total loss.

FIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. Though the bond is in some parts somewhat obscurely worded, it is plain when one comes to look at it that there are really only two alternative contingencies in the condition, viz., the ship's arrival at the end of her voyage and payment of the money or the loss of the ship. This must mean an actual loss, according to the well-established law as to bottomry bonds.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. As pointed out by the judgment in the Privy Council, the clause Mr. Mellish relied on is not a special one, but is to be found in the form of a bottomry bond given in the latest edition of Abbott on Shipping. It is quite clear that the doctrine of constructive total loss is not applicable to bottomry bonds.

FAIRLIE v. FENTON AND OTHERS.

Contract—Principal and agent—Broker—Right to sue.

The plaintiff, E. F., a cotton broker, entered into a contract on behalf of his principal for the sale of cotton to defendants, and signed a note in the following terms:—"I have this day sold you" (the defendants) "on account of T., one hundred bales Oomrawuttee cotton . . . signed E. F., broker:"

Held, that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the defendants for non-acceptance of the cotton, the true construction of the contract being that the plaintiff acted as a broker merely, and was not a party to the contract.

This was an action for non-acceptance of cotton. The defendants pleaded, inter alia, a traverse of the contract.

Joinder of issue.

The plaintiff was a cotton broker, and entered into a contract for the sale of certain cotton on behalf of his principal, to the defendants, of which he signed a sold note in the following terms:

London, Aug. 20, 1869.

Messrs. J. and R. Fenton.

Per Messrs. Ronaldson and Stringer.

I have this day sold you on account of Mr. T. A. Timmins, of Manchester, to arrive in Liverpool, per Evelyn, from Bombay, on the terms of the printed rules of the Cotton Brokers' Association of Liverpool as endorsed N. O. 100, one hundred bales, Oomrawuttee cotton, on the basis of 10½ per lb. for fair. No allowance to sellers, but in case of inferiority of quality, the cotton to be taken by the buyers at an allowance to be settled by arbitrators in the usual manner. To be taken from the warehouse; any slight variation in marks not to vitiate the contract. Brokerage per cent.

(Signed) EVELYN FAIRLIE, Broker.

At the trial it was objected that the plaintiff appearing merely to have executed the contract as broker, and his principal being named on the face of it, he could not maintain the action. The verdict was entered for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained, against which Pollock. Q.C., and Barnard showed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action. In Sargent v. Morris, 3 B. & Ald 281, Bayley, J., says, "I take the rule to be this: if an agent acts for me and on my behalf, but in his own name, then inasmuch as he is the person with whom the contract is made, it is no answer to an action in his name to say that he is merely agent unless you can also show that he is prohibited from carrying on that action by the person on whose behalf the contract was made. In such cases, however, you may bring your action either in the name of the party by whom the contract was made or of the party for whom the contract was made." This case falls precisely within the principle here laid down. Here the plaintiff signed in his own name, though on behalf of another. In Williams v. Millington, 1 H. Bl. 81, it was held that an auctioneer employed to sell the goods of a third person by auction, may maintain an action for goods sold and delivered against a buyer though the sale was at the house of such third person, and the goods were known to be his property. There Lord Loughborough said, "It is not a true position that two persons cannot bring separate actions for the same cause; the carrier and owner of goods may each bring actions of tort; the factor and owner may each have actions on a contract." It is well established that when an agent has any beneficial interest in the performance of the contract, as for commission, &c., he may maintain an action in his own name (see 1 Chitty on Pleadings, 7th edit., 8, where the case of a broker is expressly mentioned). In Lush's Practice also, 3rd edit., vol. 1, p. 11, it is said, "thus a broker, factor, auctioneer, or commission agent, may sue upon contracts made with them in that capacity." The modern cases also show that whenever a person entering into a contract on behalf of another has not used language clearly precluding himself from suing, he is entitled to do so. The instances in which it has been held that the broker or agent might be sued are just as much in my favour as though they had been cases where he was suing; for the question whether an agent can sue on a contract depends upon the same conditions as the question whether he can be sued. With respect to this latter question it has been held repeatedly that unless the agent by the most express and absolute words negatives any liability on his part, unless he says on the face of the contract, "I am merely the scribe, and no party," he may be rendered personally liable. In Tanner v. Christian, 4 E. & B. 595, a written agreement was expressed to be made between C. for and on behalf of N. of the first part, and T. of the second part. And Lord Campbell, in giving judgment, said that the real question was whether the defendant was intended to be personally liable on the contract; and that looking to the whole frame of the agreement he had come to the conclusion that he was. In Parker v. Winlow, 7 E. & B. 942, a memorandum of charter-party was expressed to be made between P. of the good ship C., and W. as agent for E. W. and Son. It was signed by W. without restriction, and it was held that W. was personally liable as charterer. Here the words of the contract are, "I have sold;" and the word broker after the signature is mere description. Lord Campbell says, in giving judgment in that case, "I can have no doubt myself that the defendant is personally liable. He makes the contract, using apt words to show that he contracts, and the only ground suggested for rebutting his personal liability is that he says he is agent for another; but he may well contract and pledge his personal liability, though he is agent for another. If he had signed the contract as by procuration for E. Winlow and Son, he might have exempted himself from liability; but on principle, and on the authorities cited, an agent is personally liable if he is the contracting party, and he may be so though he names his principal." In Lennard v. Robinson, 5 E. & B. 125, where the charter-party stated that it was agreed between the owner of the ship N. and R. and F. of London, and was signed "by authority of and as agents for Mr. H. H. S., of Memel, R. and F." it was held that R. and F. were personally liable. See, also, Mahony v. Kekule, 14 C. B. 390. From all these cases it is clear when from the frame of the contract it appears that where the intention was that the agent should contract personally, he may sue or be sued on the contract even though it appear that he is really acting on behalf of another. [CLEASBY, B., referred to Story on Agency, 6th edit., pp. 111, 113, as showing a distinction between brokers and auctioneers, or factors.]

FAIRLIE v. FENTON AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

Brown, Q.C., and J. W. Mellor in support of the rule. This case involves a question of the highest commercial importance, viz., whether, when a broker makes a contract as such and names his principal, he can sue or be sued. If he can sue, the effect is very considerable, for he can then always get the price into his hands, which he has no right to do unless the custom of the trade allows him, for the other party is justified in paying him forthwith if he be liable to be sued. The principles of the law on the subject are clear. The broker may sue where he does not disclose the name of his principal, for then it is merely the case of an undisclosed principal, in which case it is well settled that either principal or agent may sue. A factor may sue because he is entrusted with possession of the goods, and has a right to receive the price. The auctioneer also has a special interest in the goods, and a lien on the price. But the broker has no interest whatever in the performance of the contract, nor any possession of or special property or interest in the goods. So soon as the contract is completed he is entitled to his commission. He has no right to touch the purchase-money, nor any lien on it. Therefore his case is quite different from that of a factor, auctioneer, or policy broker, all of whom have some special interest or lien. In Williams v. Millington, 1 H. Bl. 84, the judgment is expressly based on the peculiar character of an auctioneer. Lord Loughborough says, "an auctioneer has a possession coupled with an interest in the goods which he is employed to sell—not a mere custody like a servant or shopman . . . but an auctioneer has also a special property in him with a lien for the charges of the sale, the commission, and the auction duty, which he is bound to pay." He is entitled to receive the price, and in Robinson v. Rutter, 4 E. & B. 954, in an action by an auctioneer for the price of a horse, the defendant pleaded that plaintiff had sold the horse as auctioneer, agent, and trustee for K, and that defendant had paid K before action, and the plea was held bad. In Fisher v. Marsh, 6 B. & S. 416; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604, Blackburn, J. says, "The general rule is that when an agent makes a contract, naming his principal, the contract is made with the principal, not with the agent. But even when the principal is known, a contract in writing may be made by an agent with a third person in such terms that he is personally bound to the fulfilment of it as if he says, 'I, for my own self, contract.' In such a case there is a personal contract by the agent, and he may sue or be sued on it, although the principal may interfere and claim the benefit of it, as was decided in Higgins v. Senior, 8 M. & W. 834, where the cases are collected." Now it is clear that this case falls within the general rule so laid down, and not the qualification afterwards mentioned. The plaintiff here contracted as broker only, naming his principal; the latest authorities show that in such case he cannot sue. The case of Fawkes v. Lamb, 31 L. J., 98, Q. B. is really on all fours with the present. Blackburn, J. there says "the plaintiff was avowedly and to the knowledge of the defendant acting as broker for a third person, and all contracts made through his instrumentality when so acting were prima facie made with that third person. But though prima facie this was so; there was nothing either in law or mercantile practice to prevent one known to be a broker from entering into a contract in his own name so as to make himself a contracting party with the rights and liabilities of a contracting party. An agent may lawfully say. 'I act for A. and B. but I will make the contract myself though on his account, so that you shall have me responsible as if I myself were the contracting party.' Such a bargain is in effect made wherever the agent enters into a written contract in his own name, though he be known to be an agent." It is clear then that in the case of a mere broker when the principal is disclosed, prima facie the contract is with the principal, and he must sue. Then there is nothing in this contract to show that the broker made himself personally liable as a contracting party; he therefore cannot sue. Bramble v. Spiller, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 672, is also conclusive in our favour.

KELLY, C. B.—Many cases have been mentioned by Mr. Pollock, in which the agent may sue on contracts by which the principal is disclosed. In no case, however, does it appear that an action has been maintained by a broker, apparently acting as such. The rule of law is clear and well settled as to a broker. Of course he may so frame the contract, which he executes, as to make himself personally liable. But when the contract is in the ordinary form, where a broker enters into a contract as broker describing himself as such, and naming his principals, he cannot sue or be sued. Such contracts constantly occur, and no instance ever occurred in my recollection and no case has been cited in which a broker had maintained an action on such a contract.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I had at first, I confess, a sort of general impression that a broker had such an interest in the contract as would entitle him to maintain the action. It is so laid down in Chitty on Pleadings and in Lush's Practice. I am now satisfied, however, that when an agent states on the face of the contract that he makes it on behalf of another, and that he is merely acting as broker, that is to say, as a middleman between the contracting parties, and has no interest in the contract, he is not entitled to maintain an action upon it. He does not enter into the contract as a party; he only contracts that he has authority to contract on behalf of his principal.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. We have to construe the terms of the contract, and see whether the plaintiff is a party to it. It is clear on the face of the contract that he is not, and that he acted only as a broker. In Baring v. Corrie, 2 B. & Ald. 143, 147, Abbott, C. J., says that a broker is not entrusted with the possession of goods, and ought not generally to sell in his own name. The plaintiff here acted only as broker and middleman to bring the parties together.

CLEASBY, B.—I doubted slightly at first from the particular terms of this contract, but I never had any doubt on the general question as to the position of the broker when he acts merely as middleman. A broker merely acting as such has nothing to do with the delivery of the goods or the receipt of the price of them. See Story on Agency, 6th edit., 111, 113. If payment be made by the purchaser to the broker it is at his own risk. The difference is well established in this respect between a broker and an auctioneer or factor. With respect to the terms of this particular contract I am now satisfied that the plaintiff appears on the face of it merely to be acting as broker. The result is that this rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 15.

(Before LORD PENZANCE.)

In the Goods of SAVAGE.

Will destroyed—Codicil remaining—Codicil admitted to probate.

A testator left a testamentary paper, which was described as "a codicil to my will." The will was not forthcoming, and there was reason to believe that the testator had destroyed it. The court held, following and explaining Black v. Jobling, that the destruction of the will did not presume the revocation of the codicil, and that since the Wills Act a codicil could only be revoked in one or other of the several modes prescribed by the statute.

John Savage, late of Beaufort Buildings, Bath, in the county of Somerset, died Jan. 18, 1870. Some time before his death he executed a will which was not forthcoming, and which there was every reason to believe had been destroyed by him. On Aug. 2, 1869, he executed the following codicil:—

This is a codicil to my will. After the death of my dear wife, save and except the Cotty estate containing 300 acres, more or less, I give all the land I have to my son William absolutely, and I also give to my son William the Vale of Neath debenture stock, value 1000*l.*, to cover the bond I have given to Robert Holdsworth and Francis Savage, my son, as trustees of his marriage settlement for securing the sum of 600*l.* and interest. Witness my hand this 2nd day of August 1869, at Mappowder, Dorsetshire. Signed by the said John Savage as a codicil to his will in the presence of us, &c., James William James, farmer, Mappowder, Charles Giles, groom, Mappowder.

After executing the codicil he placed it in an envelope, and handed it to his son, with whom he was at the time staying on a visit. Rachel Wright Savage, the deceased's wife, survived him two days.

Pritchard now moved on behalf of the eldest son that letters of administration be granted to him with the codicil annexed.

LORD PENZANCE—I think the grant ought to go. The question is discussed in Black v. Jobling, and some trouble was taken there to review the previous decisions. Before the statute the principle enunciated was that a codicil fell to the ground, together with the will, upon the revocation of that will; but that if the party could establish that the testator intended the codicil to stand by itself, the court would give effect to it, notwithstanding the revocation. At that time the court used to go at large into the question what papers the testator intended to be testamentary. But then came the statute, which says that "no will, codicil, or any part thereof shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid (marriage), or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence or by his direction. Therefore, if after the statute it is to be held that the codicil is revoked, by the mere fact of the will being revoked, the court would be going in the teeth of its actual language. Therefore, if this had been the first case since the Wills' Act, I should have had no doubt of the codicil being unrevoked. There has, however, been a decision on the subject, but as the meaning of the court has not been made perfectly clear in Black v. Jobling, the court will refer to the case again. The previous decisions were hardly satisfactory. There are two of Sir H. J. Fust in Notes of Cases. The first is In the Goods of Hallwell 4 N. C. 400, and there the court did not appear to have had its attention directed to the words of the statute, but upheld the codicil on the ground that it was the only substantive testamentary paper of the deceased. The next was the case of Clogstown v. Walcot, 5 N. C. 623, and there the language of the judge was as follows:—"Nothing can be clearer than this, that when the testator destroyed the will he expected that its destruction would have no effect on the codicil. Under the old law the effect of destroying a will was by presumption to defeat the operation of the codicils of that will, but there must be an intention to destroy." Now that is hardly satisfactory, because the statute says nothing of an intention to destroy. The statute says a codicil shall not be destroyed otherwise than by one of the several modes which it specifies. When the matter came before Sir C. Cresswell, In the Goods of Cozens, 2 S. & T. 364, the court said, "I think it has been established by the cases cited at the bar, that previous to the passing of the Wills Act a codicil was prima facie dependent on the will, and that the destruction of the latter was an implied revocation of the former; and, moreover, that Sir H. J. Fust was of opinion that no alteration of this principle was made by the passing of the statute." That is not exactly so, because what Sir H. J. Fust said was, that there was an alteration, which was that the statute made it necessary there should be an intention to destroy. That was the way in which the case was handled in Greenwood v. Cozens, and it seemed to me that the matter had never been properly considered, and I said as much in Black v. Jobling. The result is, that in my opinion the words of the statute are imperative, and the decisions which have taken place since the statute do not appear to me to have proceeded on any consideration of the statute, or any consideration how far the imperative words can be got rid of. The result is that the testator, having left behind a paper properly executed as a testamentary paper in the form of a codicil, that codicil must stand, unless revoked in some manner indicated by the statute. The testator having destroyed his will and left his codicil still standing, the natural inference is that he did not intend to destroy it. But I do not go on his intention, I go on the words of the statute. A testator having once executed a testamentary paper, that paper, be it will or codicil, must be held valid, unless revoked in the particular manner required by the statute. The grant of administration with the codicil annexed will therefore go as prayed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—IN ADMIRALTY.

LAW v. WALLERSTEIN;
THE GRAPESHOT.

Bottomry—Necessity for repairs—Necessity for credit—Distinction where claim against owners and against ship—Express and implied hypothecation—Evidence of necessity—Survey.

Where the claim on a bottomry bond is by the material man against the owner, it will always be presumed that supplies and repairs ordered by the master were reasonably fit and proper, unless there is clear proof to the contrary, and also proof of collusion by the material man. But circumstances of actual necessity must be shown to exist to support a lien on ship in respect of a like claim. Proof of absolute and indispensable necessity, however, is not required in order to the establishment of such a lien, where supplies and materials are furnished on the credit of the ship and owners in a foreign port.

The cases of the Sultana, Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. 359, and the Laura, 19 How. 29, held not to lay down, as generally supposed, any more stringent rule in such cases:

There is only a faint line of demarcation between express and implied hypothecation, the more substantial distinction being found in the greater diligence required of the lender on bottomry than of the material man in inquiry concerning the necessity for repairs. The doctrine of maritime hypothecation stated in propositions thus:

1. Liens for repairs and supplies, whether implied or express, can be enforced in admiralty only upon proof made by the creditor that the repairs or supplies were necessary, or believed, upon due inquiry and credible representation, to be necessary:
2. Where proof is made of necessity for the repairs or supplies, or for funds raised to pay for them by the master, and of credit given to the ship, a presumption will arise, conclusive, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, of necessity for credit:
3. Necessity for repairs and supplies is proved where such circumstances of exigency are shown as would induce a prudent owner, if present, to order them, or to provide funds for the cost of them on the security of the ship:
4. The ordering by the master of supplies or repairs upon the credit of the ship is sufficient proof of such necessity to support an implied hypothecation in favour of the material man, or of the ordinary lender of money, to meet the wants, of the ship who acts in good faith:
5. To support hypothecation by bottomry, evidence of actual necessity for repairs and supplies is required, and, if the fact of necessity be left unproved, evidence is also required of due inquiry, and of reasonable grounds of belief that the necessity was real and exigent.

A survey is not indispensable in proof of necessity; but where the repairs alleged to be made are extensive, and the necessity otherwise left in doubt, the absence of such an examination will go far to warrant the conclusion that no real necessity existed.

A bottomry bond may be good in part and bad in part; and the mere omission of the lender to make inquiry, will not vitiate it altogether.

CHASE, C. J. delivered the opinion of the court.—An important question of jurisdiction having been disposed of, the judgment proceeded:—The object of the original suit was the enforcement of a lien upon the bark Grapeshot, created by a bottomry bond, executed by her master, one Joseph S. Clark, in favour of Wallerstein, Massett, and Co., at Rio Janeiro, upon the 15th April 1858. The libel, filed by Wallerstein, Massett, and Co., on the 3rd July 1868, alleged that the bark Grapeshot, lying in the port of Rio, during the month of April 1858, was in great need of reparation, provisions, and other necessaries to render her fit and capable of proceeding thence on her intended voyage to the port of New Orleans; and, Joseph S. Clark, the master of the bark, not having any funds or credit there, and the owner of the said bark not residing in Rio, and having no funds or credit there, that the libellants, at the request of Clark, advanced and lent to him 9767dolls. 40 cents. on the bottomry and hypothecation of the bark at the rate of 19½ per cent. maritime interest; that Clark, as master, did really expend the sum borrowed for the repairing, victualling, and manning of the bark in order to enable her to proceed to New Orleans; that the bark could not possibly have proceeded with safety upon her voyage without such repairs, and other necessary expenses attending the refitting of her; that she sailed, and arrived safe at New Orleans on or about the 7th June 1858; and, that the bond was, at the proper time, presented for payment to Clark, who refused to discharge it. Upon this libel, process was issued, and the vessel and her freight were seized. Subsequently the vessel was sold under an order of the court, and the proceeds, together with the freight money, amounting, in the whole, to 13,805 dolls., 85 cents., were deposited in the registry on the 2nd Sept. 1858. On the 1st Nov. 1858, George Law, the claimant of the vessel and freight, filed his answer, denying the necessity of the repairs and supplies, alleged to have been paid for by the money raised upon the bottomry bond, and alleging fraudulent collusion between the master and the lenders, to the prejudice of the claimant. The answer set out at large the history of the Grapeshot, from the time she left New York, on or about the 9th Feb. 1857, to the date of her arrival in New Orleans, on or about the 7th June 1858. It represented that the bark, when she left New York, was stout and staunch, well fitted, and supplied for her then intended voyage to Constantinople, and for the return voyage to New York; that, instead of returning from Constantinople to New York, the master, Clark, embezzled the freight earned in the voyage out, and engaged the vessel in voyages for his own benefit, until he caused her to be stripped at Rio of her copper, which was replaced by second-hand and indifferent metal, owned by Clark, and put on her in fraud of the claimant; that the dishonest practices of Clark were well known at Rio, and that the libellants were fully cognisant of them. The answer further denied the charge of the libel that the claimant had no funds or credit at Rio, and averred that he had credit to procure and obtain the necessary funds, and that the master was under no necessity to resort to the bottomry upon the vessel. The answer further alleged that there was no inspection or survey of the vessel with reference to the necessity for repairs; and that the alleged expenses for repairs and provisions far exceeded the sums actually expended, of all which the libellants had notice. Before proceeding to examine the evidence taken under these pleadings, it will be proper to consider the principles of maritime law applicable to the case. A bottomry bond is an obligation executed generally in a foreign port by the master of a vessel for repayment of advances to supply the necessities of the ship, together with such interest as may be agreed on; which bond creates a lien on the ship, which may be enforced in admiralty in case of her safe arrival at the port of destination; but becomes absolutely void and of no effect in case of her loss before arrival: (Carrington v. Pratt, 18 How. 67; The Atlas, 2 Hag. 57, 58.) Such a bond carries usually a very high rate of interest, to cover the risk of loss of the ship as well as a liberal indemnity for other risks and for the use of the money, and will bind the ship only where the necessity for supplies and repairs, in order to the performance of a contemplated voyage, is a real necessity, and neither master nor owners have funds or credit available to meet the wants of the vessel. Sometimes bonds, bearing only the ordinary rate of interest, or executed under circumstances more or less different from those just stated are called bottomry bonds, and are enforced as such (The Trident, 1 W. Rob. 29; brig Draco, 2 Sumn. 157; 1 Parsons on Shipping, 136, 138); but the general description just given embraces most instruments known under that name, and is sufficiently accurate for the case presented by the record. There is no question in this case as to the character of the bond, nor as to the safe arrival of the ship, nor as to the validity of the bond if the lien can be held valid. The controversy turns on the question of necessity for repairs and supplies and for credit. We are to consider, therefore, what degree of necessity for supplies or repairs, and what degree of necessity for credit in that form, will warrant a master in borrowing upon bottomry. Where the claim of the material man is against the owner only, and no privilege is given upon the vessel, no necessity need be shown affirmatively. The master, in the absence of known fraud, is fully authorised to represent the owners in all matters relating to the ship; and it will always be presumed that supplies and repairs ordered by the master, were reasonably fit and proper, unless there is clear proof to the contrary, and also proof of collusion by the material man. But something more is required when the claim is against the ship itself. Such a claim can be asserted only as a lien of privilege upon the vessel. And the rule is that such a lien for supplies and materials, or for money advanced upon the ship, since it is created and exists without record, or other public notice, can only be established upon circumstances of actual necessity. Proof of absolute and indispensable necessity however, is not required in order to the establishment of such a lien, where supplies and materials are furnished on the credit of the ship, or of the ship and owners, in a foreign port. In such cases courts of admiralty do not scrutinise, narrowly, the account against the ship. They will reject, undoubtedly, all unwarranted charges (Cognac, 2 Hagg. 387), but upon the proof that the furnishing was in good faith, on the order of the master, and really necessary, or honestly and reasonably believed by the furnisher to be necessary for the ship while lying in port, or to fit her for an intended voyage, the lien will be supported (The General Smith, 4 Wheat. 443; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. 324; Brig Nestor, 1 Sumn. 73), unless it is made to appear affirmatively that the credit to the ship was unnecessary, either by reason of the master having funds in his possession applicable to the expenses incurred, or credit of his own or of his owners, upon which funds could be raised by the use of reasonable diligence; and that the material man knew, or could, by proper inquiry, have readily informed himself of the facts: (The Fortitude, 3 Sum. 246-7.) It has been supposed that a more stringent rule than that just stated was sanctioned by this court, at the December Term 1856, in the case of The Sultana, reported under the title of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. 359. And it has been supposed also that the judgment of this court in the case of the bark Laura, 19 How. 29, reported as Thomas v. Osborn, required affirmative proof of the necessity of credit to the ship, in order to the creation of a lien on the vessel. [Reference was made to the facts and judgments in these cases.] We are satisfied that neither of the two cases when properly considered in connection with the proofs before the court, can be regarded as in conflict with the rule we have stated, which, prior to these decisions, had been undoubtedly received upon the general consent of authorities as the true rule on the subject of implied hypothecation for repairs and supplies, or for advances having the same relation to the ship. We have been induced to state this doctrine of implied hypothecation somewhat fully, not only because it seemed desirable to correct a common misunderstanding of these cases; but because of the close analogy in origin, effect, and incidents between implied hypothecation and express hypothecation by bottomry. It is, indeed, difficult to trace, either in reason or in the authorities, any marked line of discrimination between them. In the case of the Aurora, decided in 1816, this court said, "To make a bottomry bond, executed by the master, a valid hypothecation, it must be shown by the creditor that the master acted within the scope of his authority, or, in other words, that the advances were made for repairs or supplies necessary for effecting the objects of the voyage, or the safety and security of the ship. And no presumption should arise in the case that such repairs or supplies could be procured on reasonable terms with the credit of the owner, independent of such hypothecation." (1 Wheat 96.) And it was further said in the same case, that "it is incumbent on the creditor who claims an hypothecation, to prove the actual existence of those things which gave rise to his demand; and if it appear on his own showing, or otherwise, that he has funds of the owners in his possession which might have been applied to the demand, and he has neglected or refused to do so, he must fail in his claim:" (1 Wheat. 105.) And this, undoubtedly, is the general rule also in respect to implied hypothecation. The principles on which it rests were fully explained and illustrated by Story, J. in 1838, in the case of The Fortitude, 3 Sumn. 232. It has been thought that a distinction between the lien for repairs and supplies, or ordinary advances to pay for them, and the lien of bottomry, may be found in that "superadded necessity" of which the learned judge speaks, in the case last cited, as distinguishing the former from the latter. There must, he said, in substance, not only be a necessity for the repairs, but a necessity for resorting to a bottomry loan: (Ibid, 234.) But this ruling must be taken with the qualification previously established by this court in the case of The Virgin, 8 Pet. 554, where it was held that the "necessity of the supplies and repairs being once made out, it is incumbent on the owners, who assert that they could have been obtained upon their personal credit without bottomry, to establish that fact by competent proofs, unless it is apparent from the circumstances of the case." It is only when such competent proofs have been adduced, or the practicability of raising funds on credit has been made to appear from circumstances, that the lender is held responsible for failing to make due inquiry. In the absence of such proofs or circumstances, an apparent necessity for credit by bottomry must be regarded as established when the necessity for repairs is proved. A more substantial distinction between the implied and the express hypothecation may, perhaps, be found in the greater diligence required of the lender on bottomry than of the material man in inquiry concerning the necessity for repairs. The authorities on this subject are not easily reconciled; but they may be best harmonised, perhaps, in the proposition that if no necessity for repairs is established a bottomry bond will not be supported in the absence of proof that the lender, after using reasonable diligence to ascertain the facts, had good reason to believe, and did believe, that the necessity really existed. And this is warranted by good reason. The maritime law seeks equally the general promotion of commercial intercourse and the most complete security in private transactions; and neither can be well reconciled with the support of hypothecations which partake largely of the nature of hazard, made where the owner cannot be consulted, at extraordinary rates of interest, agreed upon by the master and the lender, and under circumstances favourable to collusion and fraud, unless the lender be held to reasonable diligence in inquiring as to the existence of the facts of distress and necessity for repairs, which alone warrant such transactions. The doctrine on the subject of maritime hypothecation, so far as it seems useful to consider it in this case, may be summed up, I think, in these propositions: 1. Liens for repairs and supplies, whether implied or express, can be enforced in admiralty only upon proof made by the creditor that the repairs or supplies were necessary, or believed, upon due inquiry and credible representation, to be necessary. 2. Where proof is made of necessity for the repairs or supplies, or for funds raised to pay for them by the master, and of credit given to the ship, a presumption will arise conclusive, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, of necessity for credit. 3. Necessity for repairs and supplies is proved where such circumstances of exigency are shown as would induce a prudent owner, if present, to order them or to provide funds for the cost of them on the security of the ship. 4. The ordering by the master of supplies or repairs upon the credit of the ship is sufficient proof of such necessity to support an implied hypothecation in favour of the material man, or of the ordinary lender of money, to meet the wants of the ship, who acts in good faith. 5. To support hypothecation by bottomry, evidence of actual necessity for repairs and supplies is required, and if the fact of necessity be left unproved, evidence is also required of due inquiry and of reasonable grounds of belief that the necessity is real and exigent. These principles are now to be applied to the case before us. The pleadings make distinct issues upon the necessity for credit, and exercise of due diligence in inquiry by the lender. [Having examined the evidence, the court came to the conclusion that the necessity for repairs had not been established.] This view is confirmed by the absence of any survey or examination by public authority, or by competent and disinterested persons for the purpose of ascertaining the necessity for repairs. In the case of the Cognac the bottomry bond was authorised by the French Tribunal of Commerce at the port of repair, and also by the British Vice-Consul there, and yet the British Court of Admiralty disallowed some of the items covered by the bond. 2 Hagg. 377, 387. And in the case of the Fortitude the bottomry bond was supported by evidence of a survey, called by the master and conducted by persons skilled in nautical affairs. This was, as the learned judge observed, "what every prudent master ought to do under the like circumstances." We do not say that such a survey is indispensable. No doubt proof of the necessity, and of the extent of the necessity, may be otherwise made. But where the repairs alleged to be made are extensive, and the necessity otherwise left in doubt, the absence of such an examination will go far to warrant the conclusion that the real necessity existed. The evidence in respect to the bills for supplies covered by the bottomry bond is not so strong as to the absence of necessity for them. But there are some items included in these bills, and particularly a very considerable item stated as a general balance found due on a former account of the consignee of the ship, which can generally be regarded as subjects of bottomry. Under these circumstances, if there were any proof affecting the lenders with actual knowledge of the facts, it would be our duty to pronounce the bottomry wholly invalid. For there is no evidence that they made any inquiry whatever, and the maritime law holds them to reasonable diligence in this respect. But mere omission to make inquiry will not invalidate the bond altogether. It may be good in part and void in part. And where, as in this case, part of the repairs and supplies have been shown to be necessary, and there is no reason to impute fraud or collusion to the lenders, the bond, though void as to the items of which the necessity is disproved or not shown, may properly be held valid as to those items the necessity of which is shown. On the whole the decree of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause must be remanded to that court with directions to refer the accounts for repairs and supplies to one or more commissioners experienced in commerce and of known intelligence and probity, to ascertain, under the instructions of the court, what portion of the repairs and supplies actually supplied to the ship were really necessary, and for the amount thus ascertained and approved by the court to enter decree for the libellants.

LAW v. WALLERSTEIN ; THE GRAPESHOT.

THE UNION OF EXETER (apps.) v. THE UNION OF ST. THOMAS, DEVON (resps.).

*Settlement by payment of public taxes of a parish—
Local improvement and lighting rates.*

By a public local Act every occupier of the city of Exeter had to pay rates fixed by commissioners, and assessed and collected by persons appointed by the commissioners for the purposes of improving and lighting the city. The majority of the commissioners were elected by the parishes, and the commissioners had power, although they were not obliged, to appoint assessors and collectors for each parish separately. As a matter of fact, assessors were appointed for each parish separately:

Held, that paying his share to these rates by a man who rented a sufficient tenement created a settlement by the payment of public taxes or levies of the parish within 3 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 6.

This was an appeal against an order of two justices for the removal of Ann Tupman and her seven children from the St. Thomas's poor law union, in the county of Devon, to the poor law union of the city and county of the city of Exeter, the parish of St. Sidwell, in the last-named union, being adjudged to be the place of their last legal settlement. The appeal was tried at the Exeter Quarter Sessions 1869 for the county of Devon, when the court quashed the said order, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following

CASE.

The said paupers Ann Tupman and her children are respectively the widow and legitimate children of William Henry Tupman deceased, who died in a house occupied by himself and his family in the parish of St. Sidwell, in the city of Exeter (one of the parishes of the appellants' union), on the 1st Oct. 1868. Shortly after the death of the said William Henry Tupman, the said paupers removed themselves into the respondents' union. The order of removal appealed against was made the 29th Jan. 1869. The said William Henry Tupman bonâ fide rented a tenement, viz., the said house in which he died, which consisted of a separate and distinct dwelling-house in the said parish of St. Sidwell, at and for a larger sum than 10*l.* a year for the term of one whole year, namely, from Michaelmas 1867 to Michaelmas 1868, and the said house was occupied by the said William Henry Tupman and the said paupers during the whole of the said year under the said yearly hiring, and the rent for the same to the amount of 10*l.* was actually paid for the term of one whole year. The said William Henry Tupman was duly assessed to the poor-rate, but did not himself pay the same in respect of the said tenement for one year. In the month of July 1868 the said William Henry Tupman paid his share, which was demanded of him, and for which he was liable towards the improvement rate and the lamp rate levied as hereinafter stated for the said parish of St. Sidwell, in respect of his occupation of the said house. At the trial of this appeal at the quarter sessions, the court held that the said William Henry Tupman did not acquire a legal settlement in the said parish of St. Sidwell on the following grounds, viz.: That the improvement rate and lamp rate were neither of them "public taxes or levies" of the town or parish in which the said William Henry Tupman inhabited within the meaning of the statute 3 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 6, nor "parochial rates" within the meaning of the stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 57, s. 2; the said order of removal was therefore quashed, but the said court of quarter sessions granted a case that this point might be decided by the Court of Queen's Bench.

The said improvement and lamp rates are distinct rates, and are levied under the authority of a local Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 106, which was passed on the 5th July 1832, and is intituled, "An Act for better paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, and otherwise improving the City of Exeter and County of the same City." This Act is to form part of this case, and the following are the sections most material to this question:—

Sect. 2 provides for the appointment of commissioners to consist of six members of the common council, the dean and canons residentiary of the Cathedral, and also of persons to be elected by each parish and precinct within the city and county of the city as provided in the 4th section.

Sect. 4—

And be it enacted that the commissioners for executing this Act to be hereafter appointed shall be elected by the parishioners and inhabitants of the several parishes and precincts within the city of Exeter and county of the same, and every such parish or precinct respectively shall from time to time be entitled to appoint such person or persons to be commissioners of that Act as together with the commissioners for the time being acting for such parish or precinct respectively by virtue of the said recited Act, and this Act will make up the number of commissioners which such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint according to the following scale (that is to say), where the amount to which the parishioners and inhabitants of such parish or precinct respectively shall be assessed to the rates hereinafter directed to be made after such assessments shall have been approved and confirmed in manner hereinafter mentioned shall not exceed 100*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint one commissioner; where such amount shall exceed 100*l.*, and not exceed 250*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint two commissioners; where such amount shall exceed 250*l.*, and not exceed 400*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint three commissioners; where such amount shall exceed 400*l.*, and not exceed 600*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint four commissioners; where such amount shall exceed 600*l.*, and not exceed 800*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint five commissioners; where such amount shall exceed 800*l.*, such parish or precinct respectively shall be entitled to appoint six commissioners.

And be it further enacted that when, and so often as the inhabitants and parishioners of any of the said parishes and precincts shall be entitled, as before mentioned, to appoint a commissioner or commissioners, the commissioners for the time being acting in the execution of this Act shall, and they are hereby required to, cause notice in writing to be given by their clerk to the churchwardens, or to any two inhabitants or parishioners of such parish or precinct qualified to vote at the election of commissioners, in manner hereinafter mentioned, that a person or two or more persons (as the case may be) is or are required to be elected to make up the full number of commissioners which such parish or precinct is entitled to appoint: and the inhabitants or parishioners of such parish or precinct shall, within fourteen days next after the delivery of such notice, meet at the church or chapel or in the usual place of public meeting of such parish or precinct, between the hours of ten and twelve in the forenoon, of which meeting seven days' notice shall be given by the churchwardens of such parish, or by any two inhabitants or parishioners of such parish or precinct qualified to vote as hereinafter mentioned, by affixing the same at the Guildhall of the said city, and also in case of a parish at the church door thereof: and at such meeting it shall be lawful for the major part of the inhabitants and parishioners to nominate and elect a person or such number of persons (as may be specified in such notice) to act as a commissioner or commissioners for such parish or precinct.

By sects. 40 to 135 the commissioners are empowered to pave and light the city of Exeter, and provide for watchmen and water pipes.

Q. B.] THE UNION OF EXETER (apps.) v. THE UNION OF ST. THOMAS, DEVON (resps.) [Q. B.]

Sect. 136 is as follows:—

And for raising, securing, and paying money to answer and defray the several purposes of this Act, and to defray the charges and expenses of soliciting, obtaining, and passing this Act, or a proportion thereof (other than and except for the purpose of lighting the said city and county of the same), Be it enacted, that the said commissioners shall, and they are hereby authorised and required, once in every year to rate and assess by a just and equitable pound rate or assessment under the name of the Exeter Improvement Rate, the several landowners and owners, and the several tenants and occupiers of all houses, buildings, gardens, tithes, and other hereditaments within the said city, in sums not exceeding certain sums therein mentioned.

Sect. 139—

And be it further enacted, that the charges and expenses of lighting, setting-up, fixing, providing, maintaining, and repairing the lamps by this Act directed to be set up for the purpose of lighting the said streets, ways, passages, and places, parishes, liberties, suburbs, and precincts, of the said city and county of the same city of Exeter; and for otherwise putting this Act into execution in any manner touching and concerning the lighting the said city and county of the same, shall be at all times borne and paid and defrayed by the tenants or occupiers of all houses, buildings, lands, tithes, and other hereditaments within the city of Exeter and county of the same; and for that purpose the said commissioners shall and they are hereby authorised and empowered and required from time to time, once in every year, to rate and assess by a just and equal pound rate or assessment under the name of the Exeter Lamp Rate, all the tenants or occupiers of all houses, buildings, lands, titles, and other hereditaments within the said city and county of the same in respect thereof at amounts therein limited.

Sect. 141—

It shall be lawful for the said commissioners as often as they shall see occasion to appoint two or more of the inhabitants of the city and county, or of each parish, precinct, or ward within the said city and county to be assessors of such rates and assessments, and such assessors are required to make such rates and assessments from time to time accordingly, and to deliver to the commissioners two copies of the rates and assessments made in the manner and according to the form directed by the said commissioners, and subscribed by such assessors; and the said commissioners shall as soon as may be after such rates and assessments are made and delivered to them by such assessors, settle and sign the same, and cause a duplicate thereof also signed by them to be delivered to the collectors to be appointed in that behalf. A penalty of 10*l.* is imposed on persons appointed assessors and refusing to take the office, such penalty when levied to be paid to the treasurer or treasurers of the said commissioners to be applied to purposes of the said Act.

Sect. 142—

No person who shall have served the office shall be compellable to serve again for three years, except with the consent of a vestry meeting of any parish, in respect of which any such assessor shall be appointed.

Sect. 150—

The commissioners are required yearly to appoint the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the respective parishes, or such other persons as the commissioners shall appoint to be collectors of the said rates and assessments, and that all the said rates shall be paid to the said collectors by the respective tenants or occupiers of houses, &c.

Sect. 158 enacts that in all cases where any person or persons shall come into or occupy any house rated, or assessed, or liable to be rated or assessed out of or from which any other person or persons shall have removed or which at the time of making such rate or assessment was empty or unoccupied, the person or persons coming in or occupying the same shall be liable to pay such rate or assessment although his, her, or their name or names may not be inserted in such rate or assessment in proportion to the time that such person or persons shall occupy the same respectively, and in like manner as if such person or persons had been originally rated or assessed by name in such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, which said proportions in case of dispute shall be settled and ascertained by the said commissioners.

Improvement and lamp rates were from time to time made for the said parish of St. Sidwell by assessors appointed by the said commissioners, in pursuance of the powers given to them in that behalf by the said Act, and such rates were collected by persons appointed as collectors by the said commissioners by virtue of the said Act. The improvement rate for the parish of St. Sidwell from Lady-day 1867 to Lady-day 1868, was produced in evidence, the heading of which is as follows:

Instructions to assessors: the assessors are required to insert the Christian and surname of the owner and occupier of every property assessed. The assessors will make the assessment by a strict list. Where there are two or more tenants of houses, and where houses are let for a less term than a year, or under the yearly rent of 5*l.*, the assessors will be very particular in assessing correctly the landlord of such property, who in all such cases will be liable to the occupier's as well as owner's proportion of the rate. The rate to be returned at the Guildhall, signed by the assessors at eleven o'clock in the forenoon on the day named in the warrant, under penalty of 10*l.*

The collectors of the rate have instructions to give the assessors their best assistance in making the rates.

The Exeter improvement rate is a rate on the several landlords and owners and the several tenants and occupiers of 1*s.* in the pound on the annual rent or value of all houses, buildings, gardens, tithes, lands, and hereditaments other than and except arable, meadow, or pasture ground, and of 8*d.* in the pound on the annual rent or value of all arable or pasture ground situate within the parish of St. Sidwell, in the city and county of the city of Exeter, made in pursuance of an Act passed in the second and third years of the reign of William IV., intituled "An Act for better paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, and otherwise improving the city of Exeter and county of the same city for one year commencing from Lady-day 1867."

In this rate one "Daniel A." was inserted as the occupier of a house of the annual value of 16*l.*, the amount of the rate being 16*s.* The rate was duly signed. The said Daniel A. was at the time the said rate was made tenant of the premises, but left during the year of rating, and was immediately succeeded in the occupation by the said W. H. Tupman as tenant.

The lamp rate is a rate on the several tenants or occupiers of 4*l.* in the pound on the annual rent or value of all houses, buildings, lands, tithes, and other hereditaments within the parish of St. Sidwell, within the city and county of the city of Exeter, made in pursuance of an Act passed in the second year of the reign of William IV., intituled "An Act for paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, and otherwise improving the city of Exeter and county of the same city."

In this rate "Aquila Daniel" was assessed as the occupier of a house assessed at the annual value of 16*l.*, at the amount of 5*s.* 4*d.*

The rate was duly signed.

The said Aquila Daniel was, at the time the said rate was made, the tenant of the premises, but left during the year of rating, and was immediately succeeded in the occupation by the said W. H. Tupman.

If the court shall be of opinion that the said improvement rate or the lamp rate was a public tax or levy, or a parochial rate within the intent and meaning of the stat. 3 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 6, and stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 57, s. 2 respectively, then the said order of removal shall stand confirmed, and the said order of sessions shall be quashed; but if the court shall be of contrary opinion, then the said order of removal shall be quashed, and the said order of sessions shall stand confirmed.

By the 3 Will. & M. c. 11, s. 6, it is enacted—

That if any person who shall come to inhabit in any town or parish shall for himself and on his own account execute any public annual office or charge in the said town or parish during one whole year, or shall be charged with or pay, his share towards the public taxes or levies of the said town or parish, then he shall be adjudged and deemed to have a legal settlement in the same, though no such notice in writing be delivered and published as is hereby before required.

Q. B.] THE UNION OF EXETER (apps.) v. THE UNION OF ST. THOMAS, DEVON (resps.) [Q. B.]

Anderson and Mackay argued for the appellants, and in support of the decision of the quarter sessions, they relied upon the power given to the commissioners by the 141st section to nominate any two inhabitants of the city of Exeter to be assessors for the whole city. It is not necessary under the Act that there should be any parish assessors, or that any authority of the parish should have any notice of inhabitancy. This is a similar case to that of R. v. Christchurch, 8 B. & C. 660, in which it was held that a watch rate made upon each ward of the City of London was not a parochial rate. There is a wide distinction, too, between rates of this kind and those imperial taxes of which everybody has notice, e.g., the land tax, R. v. Bramley, Burr S. C. 75; and R. v. Exmouth, 8 East, 383; the property tax, St. George's, Hanover-square, v. Cambridge Union, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 1; or even the Liverpool borough watch rate, as in Reg. v. Everton, 2 E. & E. 701.

Sir J. Karlake, Q. C., and McKellar, for the respondents.—The case finds that these rates were assessed and collected by separate persons for each parish, according to the power vested in the commissioners by the 141st section. And by the early sections of the Act it became necessary to assess each parish separately in order to find out the number of commissioners each parish was to elect. [Stopped by the court.]

BLACKBURN, J.—I think we need not trouble the respondents to finish their argument. The case comes to this, that by the Local Act, sect. 136, the commissioners appointed by the Act are “authorised and required once in every year to rate and assess by a just and equitable pound rate or assessment, under the name of ‘The Exeter Improvement Rate,’ the several landlords and owners, and the several tenants and occupiers of all houses, buildings, gardens, tithes, and other hereditaments within the said city of Exeter, and county of the same,” in a certain limited sum. And sect. 141 shows that the commissioners have at least an option to appoint two or more of the inhabitants of each parish within the city to be assessors of such rates and assessments as are provided by the 136th section, and also as to lighting by the 139th. We suppose we may infer from the case that as a matter of fact they do so appoint assessors. The section goes on, “such assessor or assessors is and are hereby authorised and required to make such rates and assessments from time to time accordingly, and to appear at such time and place as the said commissioners shall by writing under their hands order and appoint, and then and there produce and deliver to them two copies or duplicates of the rates and assessments made, in the manner and according to the form directed by the said commissioners, and subscribed by such assessor or assessors” . . . “and the said commissioners shall from time to time, as soon as may be after any such rate or assessment shall be made and delivered to them by such assessor or assessors, settle and sign the same, and cause a duplicate thereof, also signed by them, to be delivered to the collector or collectors, to be appointed in that behalf, and shall also issue their orders to such collector or collectors, requiring him or them to collect and receive the respective sums of money made payable by such rate or assessment.” Sect. 150 shows that the commissioners may, and I suppose they have, authorised the churchwardens and overseers of the respective parishes or places rated or assessed by virtue of the Act to be collectors of the said rates and assessments. All this being taken together shows that the commissioners have at least the option to have the rates assessed and collected by persons belonging to each parish separately. Then the question is whether these are taxes within the meaning of the Acts of Parliament, the payment of which creates a settlement. Lord Hardwicke said in R. v. Bramley, “It hath been a great doubt whether in this respect the Legislature did not mean parochial taxes. But this hath been long gotten over; and the land tax has been holden to be within the Act from the notice of inhabitancy that arises by the parties being assessed and paying it.” Mr. Anderson has argued that there is a distinction between an imperial tax like the land tax, and a city tax of the kind here imposed; and that the notice of inhabitancy in the former is much greater than in the latter. I cannot see it; indeed if anything, it seems to me, for the purpose of notice to the parochial authorities, the advantage is the other way. At all events, a city rate assessed by each parish is just as much within the Act as the land tax, and it is by no means necessary that officers of the parish should collect the money. The doubt in the case of Reg. v. Everton was whether the exception from liability of particular parts of each parish did not alter the nature of the rate; but that difficulty does not arise here, and that case is therefore an authority for the respondents. The case of Reg. v. Christchurch is clearly distinguishable from the present; each ward and precinct there had nothing to do with a parish, and the reason for the decision was that the parish had not notice that the party who paid the watch-rate was an inhabitant. I think there was a settlement obtained by the payment of these local taxes, and therefore the order of sessions should be quashed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the deceased paid his share towards rates which were “public taxes or levies of the town or parish” in which he inhabited. Prima facie he was liable to pay these rates because he lived in the parish. I think the nature of these rates makes them sufficient to create a settlement; the land tax is sufficient, and a fortiori, the rates here should be; that tax, although in early times it was made by the inhabitants, was rendered perpetual by 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, and its collection had from that time nothing to do with parish officers; yet in the case of R. v. Axmouth it was held that although a mere personal tax it still continued to be within the meaning of these Acts. It seems to me that the reasons given for the decisions referred to are abundantly sufficient to make these public taxes or levies of each parish of Exeter.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. That these are public taxes I never entertained the slightest doubt; the only question about which I was not certain was whether they were public taxes of each parish. If the rates had been made and collected by the commissioners for the whole city there would have been no notice of inhabitancy to the parish authorities. But by the 141st section the commissioners had power to appoint assessors for each parish separately, and they seem to have done so.

Order of sessions quashed.

CLIFF v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

[Q. B.]

Wednesday, Feb. 2.

CLIFF v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

⚡ Railway—Level crossing—Negligence—Obligation to provide a gatekeeper.

In an action against a railway company by the plaintiff, who had been knocked down and injured by a train of the company whilst in the act of passing along a level crossing (an occupation road), where the gates were left unfastened and there was no gatekeeper, the learned judge who presided at the trial left, amongst other things, to the jury, as evidence of negligence on the part of the company, the fact that a gatekeeper was not kept at the place, though one had been kept there originally; and also the fact that the company had taken no steps till after this accident, notwithstanding the occurrence of previous accidents at the same place, to exercise the powers given them by an Act of Parliament of making a new road and discontinuing the use of the level crossing:

Held, that this was a misdirection.

Bilbee v. The London and Brighton Railway Company, 18 C. B., N. S., 584; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 146, commented upon.

In this case, which was tried before Byles, J., at Leicester, on the 12th July 1869, the declaration alleged that the defendants were possessed of a certain railway which crosses at a level a certain road or way leading from a certain highway called Mantel-lane to the Snibstone Colliery, in the county of Leicester; and the defendants did not take reasonable and proper care, nor use reasonable and proper means for the protection of persons using the said road or way where it was crossed by the said railway, and negligently omitted so to do; and erected and kept improper gates at the side of the said railway where it crosses the said road or way, and negligently kept the said gates and roadway open and unfastened, and negligently invited persons to pass the said road or way when it was dangerous so to do, and improperly and negligently drove and managed their trains on the said railway; and the plaintiff, whilst lawfully using and entitled to use the said road or way, and being permitted and invited by the defendants so to do, was, owing to the said negligent conduct of the defendants, knocked down by a train of the defendants and had one of her legs crushed, and was otherwise hurt and wounded, &c.

The defendants pleaded (1) not guilty, and (2) that the plaintiff was not permitted or invited to use the road or way as alleged. Issue was joined on these pleas.

There was also a demurrer to so much of the declaration as charged the defendants with not taking reasonable care or means to protect persons using the way or road, and erecting improper gates, and negligently keeping the gates and road or way opened and unfastened, on the ground that there was no duty on the defendants to do the said things. To this there was a joinder in demurrer.

It appeared from the evidence adduced at the trial that on the 17th Aug. 1868, the plaintiff, a girl between ten and eleven years of age, was, along with another girl of about the same age, taking dinner to her father, who was a workman at the Snibstone Colliery, which did not belong to the defendants, and had been in existence before the defendants' line of railway had been made. When the two girls arrived at the level crossing (an occupation road for carriages and foot passengers) leading from the highway, called Mantel-lane, to the colliery, the ordinary train having just passed, they attempted to cross, and were both knocked down by an engine and tender which were employed in shunting trucks. The plaintiff was severely injured and her companion killed. The driver of the engine both whistled and shouted to them, and a pointsman, about ninety yards off, also shouted to them, but the girls, owing to their holding an umbrella between them and the quarter whence the men shouted, neither heard nor saw them. Owing to the number of collieries adjacent, there are many sidings near this spot, and trains and engines pass more frequently there than at ordinary parts of the line. The attention of the company had been called to the dangerous nature of the crossing by a letter written in 1861, and by one fatal and several other accidents which had previously occurred there. Originally the defendants had gates erected across the occupation road or level crossing, and had kept a gatekeeper there, but they had ceased to do so, and the gates were left unfastened.

By an Act of Parliament, the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 335 (1865), reciting, that it was expedient that the defendants should be empowered to construct a road in the township of Snibstone, and that the use as a thoroughfare of so much of the above occupation road as crossed the railway should be prohibited, the defendants were empowered to make a new road and stop up and discontinue the use as a thoroughfare of so much of the said occupation road as lay between the fences and crossed the defendants' line. The works were to be completed within five years, when the powers given by the Act for the purpose were to cease. At the time the plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of, the company had not diverted the road or taken any steps to do so. Since the accident the level crossing has been stopped up, and a new road made.

Byles, J., in summing up the case to the jury, said that, in his opinion, there was little, if any, evidence of negligence on the part of the driver of the engine, and, after referring to the previous accidents, and the powers conferred on them by the Act 28 & 29 Vict. c. 335., on which they had not acted till after the accident, said, "If you think that the injury to this little girl, looking at the provisions of the statute as to diverting the way, certainly one fatal former accident, at the former complaints, and at the letter of 1861, and looking also at the fact that there was originally a gatekeeper, and that the gatekeeper was discontinued, if you think that was negligence on the part of the company which led to this accident, you must give your verdict for the plaintiff, if you think there was no contributory negligence on her part."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 250*l.*, finding generally that the railway company were guilty of "negligence as to the crossing," but acquitting of negligence the driver of the engine.

Keane, Q. C., having on the part of the defendants obtained a rule nisi, calling on the plaintiff to show cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground, amongst other things, of misdirection on the part of the learned judge in telling the jury that there was evidence of liability on the part of the defendants, and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence,

Bulwer, Q. C., and Graham, now showed cause against the rule. The railway company were bound to take sufficient precautions in the case of level crossings where there is considerable danger, as there was here, a fact which the company must have well known from the number of accidents which had previously occurred there, one of them of a fatal character. Its dangerous character is in fact admitted by the company, seeing that they themselves had gone to Parliament to obtain an Act to enable them to discontinue the use of the level crossing and to make a new road. It is not contended that there was an absolute obligation on the part of the railway company to have a gatekeeper at the spot; but there is an obligation to take reasonable precautions under the circumstances of the case—to be guilty of no negligence. The question of what they should have done was one of which the jury could best judge, and the jury, though they have acquitted the driver of the engine of negligence, have found that the company were guilty of negligence as to the crossing. Bilbee v. The London and Brighton Railway Company, 18 C. B., N. S., 584; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 146, is a distinct authority in favour of the plaintiff. In that case a railway crossed on a level a public carriage and footway at a spot which from the fact of there being a considerable curve in the line and a bridge near preventing trains coming in one direction from being seen until very close, was peculiarly dangerous, there being gates across the carriage way, which were kept locked, but the footway was protected only by a swing gate on either side, no person being there to caution people passing. The plaintiff while using the footway having been knocked down by a passing train and injured, it was held that it was properly left to the jury to say whether or not the company had been guilty of negligence. [LUSH, J. In that case the railway company had obstructed the view of persons crossing by building a bridge close to a curve. They may thereby impose upon themselves an obligation. There is nothing of that kind in the present case.]

Stubley v. The London and North Western Railway Company, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376; Gardner v. Grace, 1 F. & F. 359, were also referred to.

Keane, Q.C. and Mereweather, in support of the rule.—The learned judge was wrong in leaving to the jury, as evidence of negligence, the omission to keep a gatekeeper, and to divert the road. The jury may have been induced by the direction of the learned judge to think that the defendants were bound to make the new road and discontinue the use of the level crossing before the time of the accident; but there was no obligation on the defendants to do so, as the Act of Parliament gave them five years for doing it. The jury may also have been led to think that there was a legal obligation on the part of the company to continue to keep a gatekeeper at the crossing because they had once kept one there; but there is no such obligation, and the direction was therefore wrong, and the rule for a new trial should be made absolute.

[Judgment on the demurrer was taken without argument for the plaintiff, at the conclusion of the argument on the rule.]

MELLOR, J.—We are of opinion that the rule must be made absolute for a new trial. I quite agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff to this extent, that when Parliament authorises a company to construct a railway and to work it, it is implied in that that the company are to work it in a reasonably proper manner, in the usual way in which railways are worked; and in crossing a footway on a level the company are bound, as to the mode of working their railway, as to the rate of speed* and signalling, or whistling, or other ordinary precautions in the working of a railway, to do everything which is reasonably necessary to secure the safety of persons who have to cross the railway by means of the footway. But, as I understand my brother Byles's summing up, he goes a great deal further than that. [His Lordship here read from the summing-up of Byles, J.] By leaving the question thus to the jury, he involved the consideration of the provisions of the statute which he had already said are stronger evidence of negligence than the matters to which he had previously referred. He mixes up the statute with the previous accidents, with the complaints, and with the fact that a gatekeeper had been discontinued who had formerly been placed there. Now that being so, and coupling it with what passed between the learned judge and the jury when they were discussing the terms of the verdict, and the finding with reference to negligence, the learned judge telling them that they were not bound to specify any particular act of negligence, it is clear that the learned judge was under the impression, and so left it to the jury, that all these matters to which I have referred amounted to evidence of negligence; and if in truth one or more of them did not really amount to negligence there can be no doubt that the direction would be wrong, because the jury, for aught we know, may have founded their verdict on the fact that this company, having power from Parliament to stop up and divert the way, had not stopped it up and diverted it, although the Legislature itself had allowed five years for them to exercise their discretion. The jury may have supposed that the not doing that at an earlier time, and before the accident, was evidence of negligence, upon which they might give a verdict for the plaintiff; and this is the more probable when we see that the learned judge construed the expressions of the statute as an admission by the company of the dangerous character of the crossing. It is impossible to distinguish these various considerations; and without saying more upon that point, it seems to me that there was an erroneous direction to the jury, which was calculated to mislead them, and may have left it open to them to find a verdict for the plaintiff, upon a state of facts which were not negligence at all; because it appears to me that it is impossible to say that it was evidence of negligence that the company, having power at their discretion within five years to stop up this way, did not stop it up, and did not divert the road. With reference also to the gatekeeper I am inclined to think the direction was wrong. I have already said that the Legislature, when it authorises a railway company to construct a railway and to work it, does by implication require that the company shall work it in the ordinary way, and shall take all usual and reasonable precautions in the working of the traffic, in the management of the trains up and down the line, as experience shows to be proper and necessary; and if they failed in that they would be liable to an action for negligence. In this particular case the jury's attention was not confined to any negligence in the management of the trains, or in the mode in which they were sent backward and forward; but their attention was directed to the question of whether or not it was negligence in not having a gatekeeper, and in not stopping up and diverting the way before the end of the five years which Parliament had allowed for that purpose. Now, in this state of things, I am satisfied that there was or may have been a miscarriage in the verdict of the jury, and that the cause must go down for a new trial. I would also say with regard to the case of Bilbee v. The London and Brighton Railway Company (ubi sup.) which was much pressed upon us by the counsel for the plaintiff, it does appear very difficult to distinguish this case from that, so far as the duty to provide a gatekeeper is concerned; but my brother Lush has suggested a distinction in the course of the argument, and if it be not the distinction I really cannot suggest any other, viz., that where a railway company are empowered to make their railway and to use it, and to cross a road on the level, and they make a bridge so near as to obstruct the sight of the person who has to cross, and so to impose a difficulty or a danger which was not contemplated by the Legislature, they are bound to use extra precautions, and such a case may be distinguished from the present possibly on that ground. I am not very clear that that is a sound distinction, but it is a distinction upon which possibly we might have felt at liberty to act if we had found it necessary to do so. Without expressing any further opinion upon the case of Bilbee v. The London and Brighton Railway Company, I think that if the present case cannot be distinguished on the grounds I have mentioned, we should be bound by it in this court. But that is a very distinct question from that on which we are sending the case down for a new trial, namely, that a miscarriage may have arisen from the learned judge leaving as evidence of negligence what appears to us to be no evidence of negligence at all.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the direction of the learned judge is faulty, inasmuch as it leaves it open to the jury to find a verdict against the company, either upon the ground that they had omitted to divert the road which they had taken power to do by the Act of Parliament, as if the Act had imposed an obligation upon them to do it, or on the ground that they had taken away the gatekeeper whom they formerly employed at the crossing, or had omitted some other undefined precaution for the protection of persons going upon and crossing the railway. Now it seems to me that there was no obligation upon the company to do either the one thing or the other; no obligation to divert the road, because the Act authorising them to do so is merely permissive, and no obligation to fence off the road or to employ anyone there to warn persons coming on the road, because no such obligation is imposed by the Legislature; and I do not see in this case, supposing anything a railway company could do would create an obligation, that the company have done anything here to create that obligation. I think that where the Legislature authorises a railway to cross a way, public or private, upon a level, and does not require from the company any precaution to avoid danger, the Legislature intends that the persons who have to cross that line should take the risk incident to that state of things. But it may be, and I am inclined to think that it is, a sound principle that if the railway company, in the construction of the works so authorised, in the exercise of the discretion which the Legislature has vested in them, do anything which prevents persons passing over the line from taking care of themselves, and exposes them to greater peril than is ordinarily incident to a level crossing, the company thereby impose upon themselves an obligation to take other than the usual precautions for the protection of persons who have a right to pass there, and, as it were, to make up to the public for that which they have taken away from them. That I take to be the principle of Bilbee v. The London and Brighton Railway Company. As I read the case, it may well be sustained upon that principle. If it cannot, then I do not see any ground upon which it can be sustained. But it appears to me, although the principle is not enunciated in that specific form, that that is the ground upon which the learned judges in that case acted. It appeared at the trial that the number of trains which passed the crossing was very considerable; that the crossing was on a curve, and that at about 150 yards from it there was a bridge over the line which obstructed the view of the trains from that direction until they were partly under it. The plaintiff, who was deaf, had partly got on the line. His attention was attracted by an engine which ran by on the up line, and whilst his attention was thus diverted a down train which passed by at the same time knocked him down. Now it was pressed, I observe, in the argument for the plaintiff that this was a peculiarly dangerous place; that trains were perpetually passing; that there was a curve, and a bridge obstructing the view; that some notice or some man might have been placed there, and that a swing gate was improper. Erle, C. J., who tried the cause, delivered judgment in these terms:—"I do not intend to lay down a rule as to footpaths elsewhere, or to interfere with the statute law; the ground of my decision is the great degree of risk in this place. There were many trains; it was on a curve and near a bridge. The noises of the different trains would interfere with each other, and the bridge would obstruct the sight; and I am therefore unable to say that the judge was bound to nonsuit." Now, as I have said, the principle I extract from that decision is this. The railway company had so constructed their line as to make a sharp curve at the spot where this train passed; they also built a bridge which prevented a passenger from seeing a coming train until it was very near; and on that account, the company having themselves created a peculiar difficulty, and exposed passengers to more peril than the Legislature contemplated, and more than was ordinarily incident to a level crossing, undertook the obligation of providing some additional protection. That appears to me the principle upon which that case may well stand; and I think it is a sound principle and one of easy application, distinguishing that case from this, and from many others that have been quoted. Whether the rule was properly applied in that or in any other case is not the question. Now there is nothing of the like kind in this case. There is nothing more here than the level crossing which the Legislature has authorised. There were no works of the company which impeded the view of the line and made it more perilous for persons to cross the level, than the Legislature must be taken to have been aware of when the Act was passed. Therefore, there being no obligation arising out of the acts of the company and no obligation imposed by their statute, I am unable to see any duty whatever, and if there was no duty, the omission to do what they were not bound to do cannot be a ground of complaint. Whether the jury acted upon the view that the company ought to have diverted the road, having obtained powers by an Act of Parliament to do so, or that they ought to have kept a person at the gate to warn people, or ought to have done something else which was not done, I do not know. But I cannot find in the case any facts which to my mind create an obligation on the part of the company to do either the one thing or the other. Upon that ground I think that the direction was wrong. I need hardly say that I agree with my brother Mellor that in the management of the trains upon a line which crosses a way, whether public or private, upon a level, the company are of course bound to use all reasonable care, vigilance, and skill; and the greater the thoroughfare over any part of the line the greater the care and vigilance that ought to be exercised by those who have the charge of the trains. Those persons ought to anticipate that people may be crossing where they know people have a right to cross. Whatever the degree of traffic may be, be it more or less, a corresponding degree of care is required on the part of the company. Here the jury have exonerated the driver from blame; and the only ground on which the verdict can be sustained is that there is some duty or other resting upon the company to take some undefined precaution, as to which I see no obligation created in point of law.

HANNEN, J.—I am of opinion that there ought to be a new trial for the reasons given by my brother

LONGBOTTOM v. BERRY AND ANOTHER.

Fixtures—Equitable mortgage—Bill of sale—Mode and object of annexation.

K. the occupier and owner in fee of certain land and buildings thereon, deposited in 1862 the title-deeds relating to the same, with the defendants, a banking company, to secure the balance of his account with them. K. subsequently built on this land a mill and fitted it with engines and machinery, and also with such articles and machinery as were necessary for the purposes of carrying on his trade as a woollen cloth manufacturer. In 1865, in consideration of a sum of money advanced to him by the plaintiff, K. assigned to the plaintiff by bill of sale "all the machinery, fixtures, implements, utensils, effects and things in or upon" the mill, and enumerated in a schedule, the plaintiff having at the time notice of the previous deposit by K. of the title-deeds with the defendants. In 1866, K. conveyed to the defendants by deed the land and buildings (including the mill), before mentioned, together with all the "steam-engines, shafting, going gear, tenders, pump, fixed machinery, and things fixed and fastened to the freehold of the said mill, &c.," the plaintiff not acquiescing in such conveyance to the defendants.

Of the articles enumerated in the schedule to the bill of sale, some were fixed to the building by screws and bolts or soldered with lead, in some cases being affixed to the floor, in some both to floor and roof, and in others to the side walls, the object of the fixing being to insure the steadiness of the machines whilst they were at work.

Other articles not so fixed were a washer or washing machine, standing by its own weight on the floor; press plates, press papers, clogs and fencings; a loom machine for sizing and drying the threads of cloth, and a beaming frame, each of which stood by its own weight on the floor; a large desk standing by its own weight in the counting house; condenser bobbins around which the wool was wound, and certain loose articles called fencings and clogs which are necessarily used with the hydraulic presses.

Held, that the former class of articles had as between the plaintiff and the defendants (equitable mortgagees), become part of the freehold, and passed to the defendants under their mortgage and subsequent conveyance but that the latter class of articles were movable chattels, and passed to the plaintiff under his bill of sale.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court, pursuant to an order of Mellor, J.

The action was brought to try the right to certain machines and other articles, and the judgment of the court was desired as to the ownership thereof, under the following circumstances.

1. The plaintiff is a wool merchant, carrying on business at Gomersal, in the county of York, and the defendants are the trustees of a certain banking company called the West Riding Union Banking Company, carrying on business at Huddersfield, Dewsbury, and Batley, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

2. In the year 1855 one William Kershaw, of Gomersal aforesaid, woollen cloth manufacturer, cloth finisher, and army clothier, was the owner in fee simple in possession of certain land situated at Gomersal, on part of which land there was then a building which had been used as a cloth drying house.

3. The said William Kershaw kept an account with the bank, and in the year 1862 he deposited with the bank the title-deeds relating to the said land and building, and certain other buildings which had been erected since 1855 on the said land, as an equitable mortgage to secure the balance of his account for the time being.

4. The bank continued to hold the said deeds as such security from the time of the said deposit until Aug. 1866, when the land and premises to which the deeds related were conveyed to the bank as hereafter mentioned.

5. After the said deposit of the title-deeds, and before the year 1865, the said William Kershaw built upon other part of the said land than that occupied by the buildings mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3, a large mill and other buildings; and, having completed the said mill and the said other buildings, he fitted them with apparatus for generating and communicating steam power, and fitted up steam and gas pipes for heating and lighting the whole of the said mill and the said other buildings, and furnished such part of them as he required with machinery for the purposes of his said trade of a woollen cloth manufacturer, and thenceforward used and occupied all the said premises as a factory for the manufacture of woollen cloth.

6. By a bill of sale, dated 18th Jan. 1865, the said William Kershaw, in consideration of a certain sum of money advanced to him by the plaintiff, assigned to the plaintiff all the machinery, fixtures, implements, utensils, effects, and things in or upon the said factory and enumerated in the schedule thereunder written. The said schedule comprises all the machines and articles the ownership of which is in question in this case. The said bill of sale was duly registered under the Bills of Sales Act.

7. For some time previously, and up to the 25th Aug. 1866, a sum of money considerably exceeding 8000*l.* was due to the bank from the said William Kershaw on the balance of his account, and secured by the deposit of title-deeds mentioned in paragraph 3, and it was, some months previous to that day, agreed between the said William Kershaw and the bank, that the bank should become the absolute purchaser of the premises comprised in the deeds so deposited for the sum of 8000*l.* That agreement was carried out by a deed bearing date the day and year last above mentioned, by which the said William Kershaw, in consideration of the sum of 8000*l.* with which he was then credited by the bank on account of their claim against him, conveyed to the defendants and their heirs as trustees of the bank, all that close piece or parcel of land or ground situate at Upper Spen, within Gomersal aforesaid, containing by measurement 0a. 3r. 29p., and then in the possession of the said William Kershaw. And also all that cloth dry-house, and the cottages, warehouse, and mill called Perseverance Mill, and other buildings erected and built upon the said close piece or parcel of land or ground, and then in the tenure or occupation of the said William Kershaw and his tenants. And "all those three several steam-engines, shafting, going-gear, tenters, pump, fixed machinery, and things fixed and fastened to the freehold of the said mill, buildings, and premises, and then being in and about the same, and part and parcel thereof, together with all houses, fixed machinery, and fixtures, rights, liberties, easements, privileges, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said hereditaments and premises thereof conveyed, and every or any part thereof respectively belonging or appertaining." The said deed was not registered under the Bills of Sales Act.

8. At the time of the making of the bill of sale, dated the 18th Jan. 1865, to the plaintiff, the plaintiff was aware of the previous deposit of the title-deeds with the bank, and at the time of the agreement for the absolute purchase and premises being made by the bank as in the 7th paragraph mentioned, the plaintiff was made aware of that agreement, but he was never asked to acquiesce therein, nor did he do so in any way. Before the making of the said agreement for the absolute purchase of the said mill and premises as aforesaid, the trustees of the bank knew of the plaintiff's said bill of sale.

9. The said William Kershaw became bankrupt on the 21st Jan. 1867. Before that date the plaintiff, to whom a much larger sum of money was then and still is due from the said William Kershaw under the said bill of sale than the value of the machinery and articles comprised in such bill of sale, entered the factory, and without removing anything, took possession of the machinery and articles therein under the said bill of sale.

10. The defendants claimed part of the said machinery and effects under the deposit of title-deeds mentioned in paragraph 3, and the conveyance of the 25th Aug. 1866, or one of them; but by agreement between the plaintiff and defendants all the machinery and articles in question in this cause have been sold by public auction on the joint account of the plaintiff and defendants, and as arranged between them the bank has received and now holds the produce of the sale, subject to the determination of the court on this special case.

11. It is conceded between the parties to this suit, that on the one hand the defendants as representing the bank had become entitled to the fee simple in the mill premises formerly belonging to Kershaw, and to such of the machinery and fixtures therein as are necessarily incident thereto, or as became part of the freehold thereof when placed in or connected as hereinafter mentioned with the premises by the owner of the premises, he being also occupier thereof and owner of all the machinery worked therein; and, on the other hand, it is conceded that the plaintiff has become entitled to all the property in or upon the mill and premises which would not pass to the mortgagee by deposit of the deeds relating to the freehold. Both parties were large creditors of Kershaw under his bankruptcy, and both will be losers by his failure.

12. The mills used for the purposes of the various trades carried on in the manufacturing district of the West Riding of Yorkshire generally resemble each other in construction and in the manner in which the steam power is supplied, but differ in minor arrangements and in the machines with which they are furnished according to the particular trade which is being carried on in them for the time being. In the majority of cases where mills are held by tenants, the land, buildings, steam engines, boilers, main shafting and gas and steam piping are the property of the landlord, and the tenant supplies and furnishes the mill with the species of machinery suited for the particular trade to be carried on by him, which last-mentioned machinery is in such case the property of the tenant. Occasionally however, and particularly when the owner of the mill and machinery relinquishes business, mills are let furnished by the owner with machinery, and in such cases the owner in order to rebut the presumption of ownership in the tenant, sometimes advertises in the newspapers circulating in the district that such machinery and things as are in question in this cause belong to him, and not to the tenant for the time being in possession of the premises.

13. Machinery such as is in question in this cause is never rated to the relief of the poor, although the steam engine, boilers, and shafting always are.

14. The usual mode of rating mills of all kinds, including the steam engine, boilers, and shafting in the West Riding of Yorkshire is, according to the actual or estimated horse power of the engine or other first power. The requirements of the various manufacturing trades of the West Riding district are not so diverse, but that the same building may be applied to any or all of them, and cases are by no means unfrequent of one floor of a building being used for one kind of manufacture, and another floor of the same building being used for an entirely different one, both being supplied with motive power from the same steam engine, but the machinery used in such floors if not belonging to the owner of the mill, or his tenant invariably, is found by the sub-tenants. The mill and premises of the said William Kershaw are well adapted for the silk cotton or worsted manufacture, as well as for the woollen manufacture. Within the town of Gomersal are eight mills of which four are at present used for the manufacture of woollen cloth, and for the manufacture of worsted, yarn, and stuffs—one for the manufacture of shoddy, and another for the manufacture of cotton. One of the mills now used for the worsted manufacture was formerly used for the woollen manufacture by the owners of it, and it was recently sold under their bankruptcy to the present owner, who is a worsted manufacturer, and the one now used for the cotton manufacture was about two years ago used for the woollen manufacture.

14. The machines adapted to all the various kinds of manufacture are dealt in by machine brokers and others, and may usually be bought ready made ready to be placed in a mill, and to have the steam power belonging to such mill applied to them in the manner hereinafter described. The frequent improvements in the several processes of manufacture render occasional changes of machinery desirable, and the large manufacturer finds it his interest to replace portions of his machinery by others of improved construction or more novel arrangement.

15. The machines and articles, the ownership of which is in question in this cause formed part of the machinery used by the said William Kershaw in his said business of a woollen cloth manufacturer and cloth finisher, but they did not comprise all the machinery in the said mill and premises, nor even the more valuable part of it. Certain very valuable machines comprised in the said bill of sale to the plaintiff are of a very massive character, and unlike other machines hereinafter specially described, are kept steady by their own weight, and therefore do not require to be attached, and were not in this case attached in any way to the building. The plaintiff's right to the machines of the character just described the defendants do not dispute.

16. There is no custom of the trade in the said West Riding District that machines, such as those in question in this case, and attached to the building in the manner hereinafter described, should go with the freehold, but on the contrary they are, save in exceptional cases, the property of the tenant, and removed by him at the expiration of his term.

17. Steam power is supplied to the mill in which the machines and articles in question in this cause are placed by shafting in the usual way. Shafting is of three kinds or classes, namely: Main shafting, cross shafting, and counter shafting. The mode of fixing main and cross shafting, usually, is by having iron bearers cast on the pillars of the mill, or otherwise fixed or annexed by some other permanent way to the building; an iron socket is annexed to the bearer; upon this socket the shaft is fixed, a metal cap is put over the shaft and screwed or bolted to

LONGBOTTOM v. BERRY AND ANOTHER.

[Q. B.]

the bearer. The cap keeps the shaft in its place, and the shaft cannot be removed without taking off the cap. Counter shafting is fixed in a similar way, namely, by caps screwed on, or bolted to bearers or hangers, which are screwed or bolted to the floor of the room above. The main shafting consists of substantial rods or bars of iron running along each room or floor of the mills, to which rods or bars a rotatory motion is communicated direct from the steam engines. Cross shafting consists of similar rods or bars, but often of a lighter description and is fixed at right angles to the line of main shafting.

Par. 18.—Enumerated the various machines and articles in question, which are afterwards described.

19. The said machines and articles are all, with the exception of the gig rods, press plates, press papers, loom machines, beaming frame, condenser bobbins, fencings, clogs, and straps or belts, attached to or connected with the fabric of the said mills and premises, in the various ways hereinafter described.

20. A shake willey is a machine for detaching the various fibres of wool from each other, and then mixing or blending the same together before the wool is carried to a machine hereinafter described called "the tenter hook willey." The shake willey stands about 6ft. high, is about 5ft. broad, and 6ft. long, and weighs 15cwt. or thereabouts. Of the two shake willeys in question in this cause one was attached to the fabric of the mill in the following way. A hole having been drilled in the flags forming the floor of the mill, a bolt with a screw at the top thereof was inserted and fastened in the hole by means of melted lead, so as to leave the top of the bolt standing from 1in. to 3in. above the flags. In the feet or frame work of the machine are holes large enough to admit of the bolt passing through it. When the machine was to be fixed in its place it was lifted up and placed on the floor of the mill in such a way that the bolt should pass through the holes in the feet or framework thereof, and a nut was then screwed on to the top of the bolt, and the machine was thereby made firm, and prevented from oscillating or being moved from its place when in use.

21. The other shake willey was attached to the floor of the mill as follows, that is to say, holes were drilled in the flap forming the floor of the mill, and the machine was placed on the floor so that certain holes in the framework thereof, which are made for that purpose, were placed over the holes drilled in the flags. Wooden pegs or wedges were then driven through the holes in the framework of the machine into the holes in the floor, until the pegs or wedges were firmly fixed; and still further to fix the said machine, a nail or iron spike was driven into each such peg or wedge to cause it to expand and hold the more firmly. The said machine could not be moved without pulling out, or breaking, or damaging the said peg or wedges; nor could the said first-mentioned shake willey be moved without unscrewing the nuts; but when the nuts were unscrewed in the one case, and the peg or wedges pulled out or broken in the other case, the said machines could be removed. This removal of the nuts could be effected in a few minutes by an unskilled workman. In consequence of the great speed at which the said shake willeys run, and the uneven manner in which they are fed, it is necessary to fasten them in some way to the fabric of the building to keep them steady, and prevent them jerking or moving from their place, and the object of the fixings, as above described, was simply to insure steadiness and keep the machine in its place when working; for if these machines were not kept in their places, the belt or strap from the shaft would get slack, and then not turn the machine at the great speed required.

22. A winding-on machine is a simple apparatus for winding cloth on to rollers. It consists of an iron framework supporting a wooden roller or brush, it is about 8ft. broad, 4ft. high, and 4ft. long, and weighs 5 cwt. or thereabouts. It was attached to the floor of the mill by bolts and nuts in the same manner as the shake willey first above described, and the object of its being so attached was simply to keep it steady and in its place whilst the roller revolved.

23. A gig or raising gig is a machine for raising the nap or surface of cloth. It is about 7ft. high 7ft. broad, and 4ft. long, and weighs 10cwt. or thereabouts. It was attached to the floor of the mill by bolts and nuts in the manner hereinbefore described in regard to the shake willey first described, and for the same purpose. There were four gigs in all; to each pair of gigs there was driving gear which was bolted to an iron pedestal, the pedestal being bolted in a like manner as the first described shake willey to the Ashlar foundation let into the floor for that purpose.

24. A wringing machine is a machine for wringing the water out of cloth after it has been washed. It is about 4ft. high, 2½ft. broad, and 2ft. long, and weighs 6cwt. or thereabouts. It was attached to the stone work which forms part of the floor of the mill by means of bolts and nuts as above mentioned in regard to the shake willey hereinbefore first described, and the sole object of fixing was to keep it steady and in its place when at work.

25. A tenter-hook willey is a machine for drawing out the fibres of the wool so as to make them straight and regular. It stands about 6ft. high and is 3½ft. broad, 12ft. long, and weighs 1½ tons or thereabouts. It was attached to the floor of the mill in the same manner as the shake willey described in the 21st paragraph of this case, save that there were no nails or iron spikes driven into the wooden pegs or wedges. In consequence of the great speed at which this machine revolves it is necessary to fasten it to the floor, or otherwise, to prevent a jerk when it is fed with the material, and to keep it steady and in its place, otherwise the strap would get slack.

26. The double balloon drying machine, which revolves over a coil of steam pipes, which is attached to the main steam pipes of the mill in order to dry the material on it, is a machine for drying webs or threads that have been warped and sized before they are woven. It is a slender apparatus, the framework of which is of wood and one end an iron plate or holdfast, about 12in. long and 3in. broad, and ½th of an inch thick, was fastened by screws to the top of the framework of the machine, and the other end of the said iron plate or holdfast was fastened by screws to the under side of the floor of the room above. A similar iron plate or holdfast was attached in the same manner to the framework at the bottom of the said machine, the other end of which was fastened by screws to a third iron plate, which said last-mentioned iron plate or holdfast was let into and fastened by lead to the flags forming the ground floor of the mill. By taking out the screws attaching the iron plates of the framework of the said machine it could be completely detached. This machine as made must be attached to something before it can be worked, as it has not sufficient framework to stand by itself, whether in motion or not.

27. A drying machine is a machine or apparatus for drying wool; it consists of two parts, that is to say, a fan and a drying cage. The fan is an iron box or chest which was attached to the Ashlar floor of the mill by bolts and nuts, as hereinbefore described with regard to the raising gig and driving gear in paragraph 23. The cage is a kind of wooden trough supported on a light iron framework, and in or on the wirework placed on the top of this trough,

LONGBOTTOM v. BERRY AND ANOTHER.

[Q. B.]

the material to be dried is placed. The trough is fastened by bolts, nuts, and screws to the framework of the fan, which was fastened to the stone forming the floor of the mill as just mentioned. The fan is driven at a great speed by a belt from the shafting, and must be firmly fixed to keep it steady and from moving, neither part of this drying machine is of use without the other.

28. A scouring machine is a machine for scouring or washing wool. It consists of two parts—the rollers and the cistern. The framework of the rollers was fastened by bolts and nuts like the shake willey described in paragraph 20, the object of the fastening being, as in other cases, for the purpose of keeping it steady, and to prevent it moving when at work. An iron rod or stay was at one end, bolted with a screw and a nut to the beam of the roof, and at the other end with another screw and nut to the framework of the machine, so that the machine could not be moved without unscrewing the nuts of the bolts let into the stone floor, and one of the nuts of the iron rod or stay bolted to the roof and framework, as aforesaid; but when such nuts were unscrewed, the machine was completely detached. The cistern rested on the floor by its own weight. It has a valve, the framework in which the valve works is riveted to the under side of the cistern, an iron pipe was fastened by nuts and bolts to the bottom of the framework of the valve, in order to empty the cistern. This pipe was buried in the soil of the floor, and taken into a drain, and the framework of the valve so riveted as aforesaid could be detached from the outlet pipe by taking out the nuts and bolts, and the cistern was then no longer connected in any way with or to the fabric of the building; but in order to get to the framework of the valve and pipe it was necessary to remove a flag and take out soil. The cistern was supplied with water by another pipe, but such supply pipe was not in any way attached to the cistern.

29. A spinning mule is a machine for spinning the wool, which is brought to it in the half-manufactured state called stubbing—that is, material drawn into a thick yarn or thread. The mule is about 4ft. high, 6ft. broad, and 66ft. long. It consists of two parts: one part was fixed by screws to the floor, and to this part is permanently attached the head gear, which was driven by a strap from the shaft above, and thereby gave motion to the fixed part of the machine, and the other part was unfixed and quite movable. To the unfixed parts there are wheels, which run upon pieces of metal called “carriage slips,” firmly screwed to the floor so as to form slight tramways. By these wheels running upon the said tramways the movable part of the machine is drawn backwards and forwards, to and from the other part of the machine which was screwed to the floor and on which the stubbing had to be placed. The two parts with the metal tramways constitute a mule, and the motive power was communicated in this, as in all other cases, by means of a belt or band, one end of which passed over the drum fixed to the shafting of the mill, and the other passed over a wheel forming part of the head gear of the machine, which head gear was secured to the floor, and also connected by bolts with that part of the machine mentioned above as also screwed to the floor. Neither part of the mule can be worked nor is of any use without the other. The object of fastening part of the mule as above described is to insure steadiness and to prevent it from moving, as it would do if not fastened, every time the movable part was sent against it.

30. A washer or washing machine is an apparatus for washing cloth after it is woven. It is about 5½ft. high, 4½ft. broad, 6ft. long, and weighs 1½ tons or thereabout. The principal portion of it is an iron frame lined with wood, standing on the floor entirely by its own weight. There was, however, attached to it a lead pipe to let water into it. This pipe is two inches in diameter, and was carried by two branches through two holes in the woodwork of the machine, and the end or opening of this branch of the lead pipe was hammered out flat to the wood inside the cistern, so as to expand and form a flange, which surrounded the hole in the wood for the space of about an inch, so that the pipe could not be drawn out without forcing up or cutting off the flange, and restoring the mouth of the pipe to its original size. The pipe was connected with the water pipes which supply the building, and the water pipes are connected with the water pipes laid under the yard and the public turnpike road, and thus communicate water from the town's mains. The pipe could also be supplied with water from a well belonging to and situated on the said premises by means of another lead pipe one inch in diameter and several feet in length, which last-mentioned pipe was, for the sake of convenience, held in its place at one point by a small iron stay or band which was fastened to the machine by means of screws, and these screws would have to be taken out before the last-mentioned pipe could be moved.

31. Fulling stocks are machines or apparatus for rendering cloth thicker, closer, more compact and solid in substance. A pair of stocks consists of two large wooden hammers which are made to fall upon the cloth, which is placed in a cistern below saturated with water. The hammers are worked, that is made to rise and fall at intervals, by a cast-iron cogged or tappet wheel. This wheel is about 4½ft. in diameter, there being one of such wheels to every pair of stocks. The framework of the stocks was on the side thereof steadily held to the Ashlar work forming the floor of the mill by means of bolts and screws, after the manner hereinbefore described in regard to the first-mentioned shake willey, and on the other side was firmly fixed in its place by means of two wooden wedges driven in between it and the Ashlar. In consequence of the great weight of the hammers the machines require to be held very firmly to keep them in position, but, with proper appliances, they can be detached in a few minutes, all that is required being to take out the wedges and unscrew the nuts.

32. A milling or fulling machine is a machine for effecting the same purpose as is attained by the fulling stocks, but by a somewhat different mode. It is about 6ft. high, 2½ft. broad, 8ft. long, and weighs 15cwt. or thereabouts. It was held fast by the framework being screwed to beams about 6in. square, laid just below the surface of the floor of the mill, the space between the machines and over the beams being filled up to the level of the floor with bricks laid in mortar. Neither the machine nor the beams to which it was screwed could be removed without displacing some of the bricks, but the beams form no part of the machine. The floor of the mill does not consist of bricks in any other part than between these particular machines, but on taking these machines away it is necessary to remove several of the bricks.

33. A dry brushing machine is a machine for brushing cloth in a dry state. It is about 7ft. high, 8ft. broad, and 6ft. long, weighs 15cwt. or thereabouts, and was fastened to the floor in like manner as the shake willey described in paragraph 21. There is a long and slender cast-iron framework attached by bolts to the body of and projecting over and beyond this machine; and this framework is sustained and prevented from snapping off by being held up with three iron rods or stays, one end of each rod being nailed to the joists of the floor above, and the other end being bolted to the projecting framework by means of a threaded bolt passed through the end of the rod or stay, with a nut screwed thereon to hold it in its place. This machine had also one end of a steam pipe screwed thereto, the other end of the steam pipe being connected with and fastened by an ordinary screw or threaded joint to a main steam pipe laid along the floor of the mill. A condensed water pipe of quarter-inch diameter was also screwed at one end to the machine, and the other end was taken under the floor and through the wall of the building, to carry the water arising from condensed steam.

34. A dry beating gig is a machine for brushing cloth, and thereby loosening the nap, and is a machine of a somewhat similar nature to the dry brushing machine described in the last preceding paragraph. The machine has also an iron framework over it, as described in the last machine, and bolted to and forming part thereof, and was held in its place by being attached with two iron rods to the roof of the building and to the machine by nuts and bolts in the manner described in the preceding paragraph, and the other of the parts rested by its own weight on the floor. There was also attached, by screw or union joints, to the machine, an iron steam pipe, half an inch in diameter, which was connected with the main steam pipe, and also a condensed water pipe, which was fastened to the machine by screws or union joints, and went under the floor through the wall of the building, in the same manner as before described in the case of the dry brushing machine.

35. A hydraulic pump and hydraulic presses constitute the machinery used for pressing the cloth after it has been manufactured, so as to form an even and smooth surface upon it. The pump, which is worked by hand, is about 3ft. high and 4ft. broad and 4ft. long and the presses are each about 8ft. high, 4ft. broad and 4ft. long, and the whole of the machinery of which it is constituted weighs two tons or thereabouts. The pump was screwed to bolts set into an Ashlar stone bed on a level with the floor of the building by means of nuts. A pipe was connected with the pump by a screw or union joint, which pipe was also connected with the cylinder of each of the presses by a screw or union joint. The presses stood entirely by their own weight in holes sunk into the ground, and when the pipe from the pump which is screwed to the cylinder of each press was unscrewed, each press could be completely removed in detached pieces without disturbing any part of the fabric of the building. Until such pipe was unscrewed the press of course could not be so removed. These presses could also be worked by the steam-engine. To do so it was necessary to turn a valve connected with the above pump, so that the water from the steam pump might be driven by the same pipes to the cylinder of the press.

36. In using hydraulic presses in the finishing of woollen cloth, it is necessary to have and use therewith press plates, press papers, clogs, and fencings. Press plates are loose sheets of iron 32in. long, 12in. wide, and about $\frac{1}{4}$ in. thick. They are heated in the press oven hereafter mentioned, and then placed between the different folds of cloth so as to keep the cloth warm during the time that it is being pressed in the hydraulic presses just described. There were from 100 to 200 of them used in the mill of William Kershaw, and at the said sale they were sold at a price per cwt. Press papers are loose sheets of strong glazed cardboard about 36in. long and 31in. wide, they are placed between the different folds of cloth before it is put in the press, and their use is to protect the cloth from the heated press plates, and to give a smoothness and gloss to the cloth with the different folds of which they are compressed in the hydraulic press. There were a great number of such papers used in the mill of William Kershaw, and they were of considerable value. At the sale the press plates and press papers were sold separately from the hydraulic presses, the papers being disposed of at a price per lb. weight.

37. Press oven. This is an iron box heated by steam, and its use is to put in the iron press plates to be heated before being used as before mentioned. It weighs about a ton, and stood on the floor by its own weight. It was connected by means of screws or union joints, with an iron pipe 1in. in diameter, for the purpose of supplying it with steam from the boilers, and with an iron pipe $\frac{3}{4}$ in. in diameter, by which the condensed water was carried away from the oven into the condensed steam pipe of the small steam engine in the press shop hereafter mentioned.

38. The screw press is a machine used for a similar purpose to that which the said hydraulic packing press hereafter described is used, but is worked by hand, and consists of two wooden boards 2in. or 3in. in thickness, and about 4ft. square, between which the cloth is placed, and by means of an iron screw brought to bear on the upper of the said two boards. The boards are faced towards each other, and the cloth is compressed into a smaller and more compact bulk. The iron screw works in a hole made in the wooden plank or board upheld at the height of about 7ft. from the floor by two other boards, one on either side thereof. This machine rested on the floor by its own weight, but in order to support the said framework two small iron rods, or holdfasts, were inserted at one end and bolted by a nut to the outside, through the wall of the building, and at the other end were attached to the machine by means of a nut and screw. By unscrewing the nuts the whole machine could be at once removed.

39. Small steam engine. In the same room where the said four hydraulic presses and press oven were placed; namely, the press shop there was a small high pressure or non-condensing steam engine of four horse power, the ownership of which is also in question in this case. It was used for the sole purpose of working the said hydraulic presses when the hand pump was not used, and was fastened by nuts secured by four bolts let down into the Ashlar bed or floor built up for the purpose, on which it stood; the steam to set it in motion being conveyed by pipes from one of the main boilers used to generate steam for the condensing steam engines used for communicating power to the mill; which pipes were attached to the steam engine now being described by means of a flange pipe bolted thereto by nuts and bolts. When the nuts and bolts to this steam flange pipe, and the nuts to the bolts in the Ashlar work were unscrewed and withdrawn, the small steam engine could be lifted off the bolts and completely detached.

40. A hydraulic packing press and hand pump form the machinery for packing the cloth previous to its being sent away to the merchant or customer. This class of machine is not by any means invariably a part of a woollen manufacturer's machinery; but the peculiar business carried on by William Kershaw, viz., that of a cloth finisher and army clothier, as well as a manufacturer, necessitated his sending away his cloth in a finished state to great distances, and made it desirable that he should have the means of packing it easily and effectually, and with a greater saving of time than when a common hand screw press is only used. The pump is a hydraulic hand pump for working the packing press, and resembles the hand pump described in the 35th paragraph, except that the pump now being described is smaller in size. The packing press is about 8ft. high, 6ft. long, 3ft. wide, and weighs, with the pump, one ton, or thereabouts. The packing case rested on the floor of the first story of a building forming part of the mill premises, and was fixed or stayed by two iron rods, one of which was fastened to and through the wall of the room by a rod or stay through the wall with a nut screwed at the end outside the building, and the other to the joists of the floor above by means of bolts and nuts. The pump was bolted by bolts and nuts to the floor on which it stood, and a pipe from the pump to the press was fastened by screw or union joints. The aforesaid iron rods or stays form no part of the machine, and were used only for the purpose of keeping the machine steady while working. It is necessary that the hydraulic pumps should in all cases be securely fixed in their places, otherwise the pipes conveying the water to the cylinder of the press would get displaced or broken. The hydraulic presses are of no use without a pump.

LONGBOTTOM v. BERRY AND ANOTHER.

[Q. B.]

41. A blowing machine is a small machine or apparatus for giving a gloss to the cloth by causing steam to pass through it. This machine stands by its own weight. One end of a pipe was fastened to it by screws, or union joints, the other end being screwed into the steam pipe used for supplying steam from the boilers to the room in which the machine is placed. There was also an outlet waste pipe, one end of which was attached to the machine by screws, or union joints, and the other end ran through the wall of the building into the underground drain.

42. A Donisthorpe sizing machine and the drying, warping and loom machines connected therewith, form an apparatus for sizing (i.e., immersing in a glutinous liquid), and afterwards drying, warps, or threads before they are woven into cloth. This machine stood by its own weight on the floor of the mill. A three-quarter inch iron pipe, which was screwed into one of the main steam pipes of the mill, was placed at a convenient point above the machine and fastened to the wall of the mill by holdfasts. The other end of the iron pipe was screwed to the machine by a screw or union joint. Another pipe, quarter inch in diameter, was screwed in the same manner to the machine, and also to a condensed water-pipe which was connected with a larger pipe fixed near the floor of the room, and used for carrying away condensed waste-water from the main steam engine. When the two screws or union joints—by means of which the said two pipes were attached to the machine—were unscrewed, the machine was completely detached. The warping machine consists of a tin cylinder, in no way attached to the fabric of the building, but standing upon cushion wheels, which run upon two ridges or slight tramways of metal, about half an inch in diameter and 5yds. long, laid upon the floor of the mill, and held in position by means of small iron holdfasts, part of them driven into the stone floor between the flags, and others let into the flags and fastened by lead. The ridges or tramways stood about half an inch above the surface of the floor. Their only purpose was to guide the machine when in motion, and to enable it to run more smoothly. The motion given to this machine was from the shaft above by a strap. The loom machine was in no way affixed to the freehold, but is claimed by the defendants as being appurtenant to the Donisthorpe sizing and drying machine in connection with which it was used. As a matter of convenience, the material was usually carried from one of these machines direct to the other, but there is no necessary connection between the two machines, and either of them would be available for the purpose of a wheel; it is used without the other. The above sizing, and drying, warping, and loom machines were put in one lot by the auctioneer and sold together.

43. The beaming frame stood upon the floor by its own weight. It was not connected in any way with the fabric of the building, and could be at once lifted up and carried away, but for a leather band or belt which communicated motion to it from the shafting above. This belt was passed over a drum on the shafting, and also over a wheel of the machine, but the wheel being surrounded by the framework of the machine the belt could not be slipped off, as in the case of the generality of machines, but must be cut or have some stitches taken out before the machine could be removed.

44. In the yard of the said premises there was a double iron cistern, used for steaming cloth, in order to give it a lustre or gloss. This cistern was about 7ft. deep, and sunk into a hole in the ground, made on purpose, about 3ft. deep. An iron steam pipe from the main steam pipe from the boilers was directed into it, and reached from the top to the bottom, about the middle, but was not in any way fastened to the cistern, and the pipe would have to be bent, or one length of the pipe would have to be unscrewed and detached in order to move the cistern. Without bending or detaching this pipe, and removing the soil around it, it would be impossible to remove the cistern. There is also an aperture in the bottom of the cistern, through which, when a valve attached to the cistern was opened, condensed water could pass into a pipe drain laid in the ground beneath the cistern.

45. In the counting-house of the mill and premises was a large desk, the ownership of which is also in question in this case. It is about 5ft. long, 4ft. high, and 4ft. broad. This desk stood by its own weight. An iron gas pipe, connected by screw or union joints, with the main pipe laid underneath the soil in the yard, was brought into the counting-house through a hole in the wall. To this gas pipe a small lead pipe was soldered, and passed through a hole cut in the side of the desk, and was screwed to the under part of a socket, above which socket was an upright standard carrying the burner, and which socket was fixed by screws to the desk. When the gas pipe was unscrewed from the socket, and the lead pipe cut at its junction with the iron pipe, which was the only means of severing it, the desk was completely detached, and could be removed, but without severing the gas pipe it could not be removed.

46. There was also in the counting-house an iron safe. It was let into the brick wall, and surrounded with bricks and mortar. In the front was a wood moulding fastened by nails to pieces of wood driven into the wall. The safe could not be removed without pulling off the wood moulding and disturbing the brickwork.

47. Condenser bobbins are used for winding the wool upon when in the partly manufactured state called slubbing. It is wound upon the bobbins when used in connection with machines called condensers, which it is admitted are not fixtures. The bobbins are then taken to the mules before described, and the wool is wound off them by the mule, and spun into a coppin or bobbin, after which they (the condenser bobbins) are taken back empty to the condensers. These bobbins the defendants claim as appendages to the mules.

48. There are also certain loose articles, consisting of fencings and clogs which are necessarily used with the hydraulic presses, and are only of use in connection with such presses. They are, however, bought and sold separately from the presses.

49. The counter shafting, the ownership of which is in question in this case, is placed in various positions in the several rooms of the mill and premises, and consists of separate iron bars or shafts, which are fixed at each end, as before described in paragraph 17, to sockets in iron hangers or bearers suspended from the ceilings of the rooms, but so loosely that the shafts easily revolve in the socket on their own axes, but these shafts cannot be removed from their hangers or bearers without unscrewing and taking off the caps. Motion is communicated to the counter shafting from the main shafts, which run along the several chambers of the mill and premises, as before described, by means of hollow wheels or drums on such main shafting or counter shafting respectively, over which leather belts or bands pass, and when made tight, these bands communicate to the counter shafts the motion given to the main shafts.

50. Lastly, the straps or belts, the ownership whereof is in question, are the leather bands before referred to as used to impart the motion of the main shafting to the counter shafting, and of both kinds of shafting to the machinery in the mill and premises. They are generally about six inches in breadth, and are commonly brought from the curriers, in undivided lengths, which are afterwards cut up by the owners of the machinery into the required lengths, the several pieces being generally riveted together by metal rivets. The strap, before being put together, is passed over the drum on the shafting, and over a wheel of the machine to be set in motion, and, being drawn quite tight, the two ends are stitched, riveted, or laced together with leather, thread or tags, or metal rivets. The straps, when so joined, can be slipped off the drum of the shaft, from which they cannot be removed until they are cut or unloosened at the point of junction. They can be slipped off the wheel of all the machines in question in this case (except the beaming frame) at pleasure, when the machine and shafts are not in motion.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether, upon the facts above stated, the plaintiff became entitled to the said machine or articles, or any and which of them under or by virtue of the bill of sale dated the 18th Jan. 1865, in the sixth paragraph mentioned, or whether the defendants are entitled to the possession of the said machines or articles, or any and which of them under or by virtue of the said deposit of title-deeds, and of the conveyance of the 25th Aug. 1866, or either of them. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to all the said articles or machines, then judgment is to be entered up for the plaintiff for the sum of 944*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* with costs of suit. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled only to part of the said articles or machines, then judgment is to be entered up for the plaintiff for a sum to be fixed by an arbitrator already agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant as the value of the said articles and machines in respect of which judgment shall have been given for the plaintiff without costs. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to any of the said articles or machines, then judgment of non pros. is to be entered with costs.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him M^r Leod) for the plaintiff. It is admitted on the part of the plaintiff that decided cases have established that there is no difference with reference to fixtures between a legal and an equitable mortgage, and, further that the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures although they are tenant's fixtures which, as between landlord and tenant the tenant would be entitled to remove. But it is contended that the articles in question in the present case, or most of them, come within the rule laid down in Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Ex. 295, and are not fixtures but movable chattels. In that case it was held that machinery used for the purposes of manufacture, such as mules used for spinning cotton, though fixed by means of screws, some into the wooden floors of a cotton mill, and some by being sunk into the stone flooring and secured by molten lead, were nevertheless distrainable for rent. "Before the machines were so attached," said Parke, B., "they were mere chattels and undoubtedly were distrainable chattels; and the question is whether they lost that character by being attached to the floor in the manner described. . . . This is a question of fact depending on the circumstances of each case, and principally on two considerations: first, the mode of annexation to the soil or fabric of the house, and the extent to which it is united to them, whether it can easily be removed, intégrè, salvè et commodè, or not, without injury to itself or the fabric of the building; secondly, on the object and purpose of the annexation, whether it was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the dwelling—in the language of the civil law, perpetui usus causa, or in that of the Year Book, pour un profit del inheritance (20 Hen. 7, c. 13)—or merely for a temporary purpose, or the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel. Now, in considering this case, we cannot doubt that the machines never became a part of the freehold. They were attached slightly so as to be capable of removal without the least injury to the fabric of the building or to themselves; and the object and purpose of the annexation was not to improve the inheritance, but merely to render the machines steadier and more capable of convenient use as chattels. They were never a part of the freehold any more than a carpet would be which is attached to the floor by nails for the purpose of keeping it stretched out, or curtains, looking glasses, pictures, and other matters of an ornamental nature, which have been slightly attached to the walls of the dwelling as furniture, and which is probably the reason why they and similar articles have been held in different cases to be reasonable. The machines would have passed to the executor: (Per Lord Lyndhurst, C. B., Trappes v. Harter, 2 C. & M. 177.) They would not have passed by a conveyance or demise of the mill. They never ceased to have the character of movable chattels, and were, therefore, liable to the defendants' distress." These observations and this reasoning apply to most, if not all, the machines in the present case. Both the mode of annexation and the object and purpose of annexation are in favour of these machines being regarded merely as movable chattels and not as fixtures. In Parsons v. Hind, 14 W. R. 860, it was held that a hydraulic press fixed by means of bricks and mortar to the floor of a factory remained a chattel, and did not become part of the freehold. Blackburn, J. said, "whether or no a thing remains a chattel or becomes a part of the freehold is often difficult to decide, turning as it does on a question of more or less. . . . There are generally three classes—first, those cases where a chattel still remains a chattel, being merely fixed for convenience, like the clock in court, which though firmly fixed, and though probably it could not be moved without disturbing the plaster, yet no one could doubt that it remains a chattel, and does not become a part of the freehold. Then there is another class, where chattels are fixed for the better enjoyment of the freehold, but subject to a right to remove them. These are what are generally called fixtures. Then there is a third class, where chattels are fixed to the freehold and cannot be removed.

. . . Hellawell v. Eastwood gives the two guiding points to determine whether or no the article remains a mere chattel. Nevertheless the question must always be one of more or less," and the learned judge cites the remarks of Williams, J. in Lancaster v. Eve, 3 C. B., N. S., 717, "No doubt the maxim, 'Quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit,' is well established; the only question is what is meant by it? It is clear the mere putting a chattel into the soil by another cannot alter the ownership of the

LONGBOTTOM v. BERRY AND ANOTHER.

chattel. To apply the maxim there must be such a fixing to the soil as reasonably to lead to the inference that it was intended to be incorporated with the soil." Climie v. Wood, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 257; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1012, no doubt conflicts with Hellawell v. Eastwood, but it cannot be said to overrule the principles laid down in the latter case, nor does it profess to do so; and those principles are recognised in Waterfall v. Penistone, 6 El. & Bl. 876, where a person who had mortgaged the freehold of a mill with machinery thereon afterwards assigned to the defendant the equity of redemption, and certain machinery which had been fixed in the mill since the first mortgage, and afterwards by indenture bargained and sold to the defendant machinery erected since the conveyance of the equity of redemption, subject to redemption on payment of a certain sum which was charged on the mill and machinery, the machinery in the last-mentioned indenture being erected for the purpose of carrying on the manufactory in the mill, and for the more conveniently doing so, part of it was screwed, nailed, and otherwise fixed to the mill. On the bankruptcy of the mortgagor it was held that his assignees were entitled to the machinery, the machinery under the interpretation clause being personal chattels, as the intention of the parties appeared to be that the machinery should pass, separately from the realty, and so it had not become parcel of the freehold by annexation subsequent to the conveyance of the equity of redemption. "In Hellawell v. Eastwood," said Erle, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, "the question whether the trade machinery there described, which was annexed to the soil, was liable to be distrained, was answered in the affirmative, on the ground that, if the purpose of the annexation was not the permanent improvement of the dwelling, but the more complete use temporarily of the machinery, it was a chattel, and that the intention of the party in the annexation was material to be considered for deciding whether it became parcel of the realty. According to that decision, we hold this machinery to have been a personal chattel within the statute, notwithstanding the annexation to the soil." It is submitted that the doctrine of Hellawell v. Eastwood remains unimpeached, and that it applies in favour of the plaintiff to almost all, if not all, of the machines here in question.

Manisty, Q. C. (with him Macrory), for the defendants.—It has been long settled that articles of machinery fastened to a floor or wall merely for the purpose of steadying them, would, as between landlord and tenant, pass to the tenant; but as between heir-at-law and executor, or as between mortgagor and mortgagee, they go with the realty. All the machines in the present case are but accessory to the mill; they, along with the building, constitute the mill, and as between mortgagor and mortgagee, they go with the mill. Hellawell v. Eastwood (ubi sup.) has been treated in subsequent cases as deciding merely that as between landlord and tenant such articles are chattels; but not that they are so as between mortgagor and mortgagee. In Fisher v. Dixon, 12 Cl. & Fin. 312, it was held that where the absolute owner of land for the better purpose of using that land, created upon and affixed to the freehold certain machinery, in the absence of any disposition by him of the machinery, it would go to the heir as part of the real estate; and that if the corpus of such machinery belongs to the heir, all that belongs to that machinery, though more or less capable of being detached from it, and more or less capable of being used in such detached state, must also be considered as belonging to the heir. "The principle," said Lord Cottenham, p. 328, "upon which a departure has been made from the old rule of law in favour of trade, appears to me to have no application to the present case. The individual who erected the machinery was the owner of the land and of the personal property which he erected and employed in carrying on the works; he might have done what he liked with it; he might have disposed of the land; he might have disposed of the machinery; he might have separated them again. It was, therefore, not at all necessary, in order to encourage him to erect those new works, which are supposed to be beneficial to the public, that any rule of that kind should be established, because he was master of his own land. It was quite unnecessary, therefore, to seek to establish any such rule in favour of trade as applicable here, the whole being under the control of the person who erected this machinery." In Mather v. Fraser, 2 K. & J. 536, it was held that all articles affixed to the freehold whether by screws, solder, or any other permanent means, or by being let into the soil, partook of the nature of the soil, and would have descended to the heir along with and as part of the soil itself. "According to the old rule of law," said Wood, V.C., "if that which would otherwise have been a chattel had been affixed to the soil, whether by nail, screw, or otherwise, it passed along with the soil to which it had been so fixed. In the relation of landlord and tenant, but in that relation alone, the rule of law was relaxed for the encouragement of trade, it being very early perceived that it would be injurious to trade if a tenant were told he must contrive to conduct his trade with piping which need not be fixed in any way to the soil, or he would at once be held to have made a present of it to his landlord; and accordingly, as between landlord and tenant, questions of some difficulty have arisen, whether in particular instances chattels pass with the freehold of the land. But here—and it was the case also, as Lord Cottenham observed, in Fisher v. Dixon—no such question can arise. Here the same parties were owners both of the fee and of the chattels in question. There was no landlord between whom and themselves the question could arise. Here, therefore, and in all other cases where the owner of the chattel is also the owner of the fee, the court can at once dismiss from its consideration the entire class of cases in which the rule of law has been relaxed in favour of trade, all such cases presuming the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant." And the Vice-Chancellor thus refers to the case of Hellawell v. Eastwood (ubi sup.), which is chiefly relied on by the plaintiff in the present case. Immediately after the words last cited he says, "This consideration disposes of the decision—I do not say of the dictum—in Hellawell v. Eastwood. For the decision in that case there was abundant ground irrespective of the dictum. . . . That case, in common with the numerous other cases upon the question of distress, has no application to the present. And, in fact, the only point for which it was cited was the dictum of a learned judge, whose opinion is entitled to great weight, Mr. Baron Parke. . . . That remark, however, is a mere dictum, not necessary to account for the decision, for which there was abundant ground in the circumstances I have mentioned; and I cannot but think that the numerous class of cases ending with that of Fisher v. Dixon, which does not appear to have been cited in Hellawell v. Eastwood, could not have been present to the mind of the learned judge to whom that dictum is attributed." In Walmsley v. Milne, 7 C. B., N. S., 115, it was held as between a mortgagee and the assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor that a steam-engine and boiler, a haycutter, a malt mill or corn crusher, and a pair of grinding stones erected for the more convenient use of the premises in the business of the mortgagor as an innkeeper, brewer, and bath proprietor, and all capable of being removed without injury either to themselves or to the premises, did not pass to the assignees but remained attached to the freehold. Crowder, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, referred to Hellawell v. Eastwood, and said, "Now, without expressing any opinion upon that case, it is sufficient on the present occasion to observe that, assuming it to be well decided, it is no authority for holding that the disputed articles in the case at bar are not fixtures forming part of the freehold; for we are of opinion, as a matter of fact, that they were all firmly annexed to the freehold for the purpose of improving the inheritance, and not for any temporary purpose." And he quotes the language of Lord Tenterden in Doe d. Robey v. Maisey, 8 B. & C. 767: "The mortgagor is not in the situation of tenant at all, or, at all events, he is not more than tenant at sufferance; but in a peculiar character and liable to be treated as tenant or as trespasser, at the option of the mortgagee;" and Crowder, J. adds: "All the cases, therefore, which show that, where a tenant for years has put up trade fixtures, he may remove them before his tenancy expires, have no application to the case at bar." In Boyd v. Shorrocks, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 72; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197, it was held that looms put up by the lessee of a cotton mill for his convenience during the existence of his term, and fastened to the floor by nails driven through the loom feet into wooden plugs fitted into the floor, are, though easily movable, without injury to the freehold, fixtures, which will pass under an assignment of "the mill, fixed machinery, and hereditaments, with all looms and other machinery, fixed or movable," without the necessity of registering the assignment as an assignment of chattels under the Bills of Sales Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36). "On the best consideration I can give to this case," said Wood, V.C., "having looked into the various authorities referred to, I can come to no other conclusion than that the principle enunciated in Ex parte Barclay, 5 De G. M. & G. 403, is the right one. That principle seems to be that if the tenant has affixed to the freehold, during his tenancy, articles in such a manner as to make it appear that during the term they are not to be removed, and that he regards them as attached to the property, according to his interest in the property, then on any dealing by him with the property to which these articles are affixed, the court would presume that he meant to deal with the property as it stood, with all these things so attached, and to pass the property in its then condition." He adds, "The looms, no doubt, might be transported to another part of the building, and in that respect the case may be compared to a man dealing with a grate or cupboard. He thinks the cupboard would be in a more convenient situation if removed to another part of the building. Of course he can take down his cupboard and screw it up in another part. Having done so, it is to be supposed that the cupboard continues where it is placed during the remainder of the term as a fixture." The looms in that case were exactly like the willeys in the present case. In Place v. Fagg, 4 Man. & Ry. 277, it was held that by a mortgage of a mill, the stones, tackling, and implements necessary for the working of the mill passed to the mortgagee. (The notes to Elwes v. Mawe, 2 Sm. L. C. were also referred to.) Of fixtures those most favoured are tenants' as against the landlord, those least favoured are as between executors and the heir, and on a similar footing the courts treat fixtures as between vendor and vendee, mortgagor, and mortgagee.

Waterfall v. Penistone, 6 El. & Bl. 874;
Walmsley v. Milne, 7 C. B., N. S., 115;

were referred to. In Haley v. Hammersley, 30 L. J. 771, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 269, where the mortgage of the mill was stated to include "all those the steam engine or steam engines, boilers, steam pipes, main shafting, mill gearing, millwrights' work, and other machinery and fixtures whatsoever then erected or set up, or standing or being, or which should at any time thereafter be erected or set up, or stand or be in or upon the said lands, mill, and premises, or any part thereof," it was held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, who confined these words to the machinery necessary to give motive power to the mill), that all the machinery and fixtures used in the manufacturing of silk within the mill were included.

Parsons v. Hind, 14 W. R. 860;

 were also referred to.

McLeod in reply.—If all the machinery claimed on the part of the plaintiff were removed, the mill would not lose its character of a mill, though it would no longer be a mill for the specific purpose of making cloth. It would be in a position to be fitted up as a mill for any other purpose. In Walmsley v. Milne (ubi sup.) the lower grinding stone was boxed on to the floor of part of the premises by means of a frame screwed thereto, and the steam engines and other articles (except the boiler) were fastened by means of bolts and nuts to the walls or the floors. In Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Lee (ubi sup.), Blackburn, J. (p. 708) states the rule to be "that where the things are attached to the premises so as to be part of the premises, although they are removable afterwards, still they are part of the premises, although there may be a right to remove them. But if things or chattels be merely fixed to the premises, and so fastened to the premises as to be still chattels, but fixed and steadied for the purposes of use there, they remain chattels altogether, so that they would not be part of the premises at all; they would never cease—to use the phrase in the case of Hellawell v. Eastwood—to have the character of movable chattels, although fixed for the purpose of the enjoyment of them, still they remain movable chattels"—a rule which covers those things claimed by the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13, 1869.—The judgment of the Court (Lush, Hannen, and Hayes, JJ., prepared by the late Hayes, J.), was now delivered as follows by HANNEN, J.—The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff became entitled to the machines and articles enumerated in the list contained in sect. 18 of the special case under his bill of sale of the 18th Jan. 1865, or whether they passed to the defendants as fixtures annexed to the freehold, under the equitable mortgage (which was prior to the plaintiff's bill of sale), and the subsequent conveyance of the 25th Aug. 1866; and our opinion is in favour of the defendants as to all the articles that were really affixed to the premises comprising nearly the whole of the enumerated articles, except a few that appear to be merely movable goods. Kershaw, under whom both parties claim, was owner as well as occupier of the mill and premises. He built the principal mill and fitted it with engines and machinery as well as shafting and pipes for the purpose of supplying and communicating steam power and gas throughout the building, and he also supplied and affixed all the machinery and articles necessary for adapting the mill for the business of a woollen manufacturer, which he carried on there. The title to the former machinery is admitted to be in the defendants, and it is only in regard to the latter to which the enumerated articles belong, that any question is raised. It is stated in the case that in the district where mills are occupied by tenants, the landlord owns the former class of machinery as well as the mills and premises, but that it is common for the tenant to supply the latter class, which in that case remains his property. But we consider the statement as altogether immaterial and irrelevant to the present case, which is not that of a tenant annexing fixtures on the property of another, but of an owner annexing them on his own property. The entire inapplicability of the peculiar law of fixtures between landlord and tenant to such a case was long since very clearly pointed out by Lord Cottenham, in the well known case of Fisher v. Dixon, 12 Cl. and Fin. 328. The precise question here is what are the rights of a mortgagee in the case of fixtures annexed to the freehold by the mortgagor. In the present case the mortgage was an equitable one, but no point or distinction was made on this ground; and it was admitted that the plaintiff, at the time of his bill of sale, had notice of the defendant's mortgage, and the case was argued on the same footing as if a mortgage had been executed before the bill of sale. Now, it appeared to us to be well settled by a series of decisions both at law and in equity, that in the case of such an annexation by the freeholder of machinery or other fixtures, the things so annexed will pass to a mortgagee with the freehold, and that this applies equally to articles which, as between landlord and tenant, would be considered as trade fixtures. As to any other articles which are really in the nature of fixtures, see Mather v. Fraser, 2 K. & J. 536; 25 L. J. 97, Ch.; Walmsley v. Milne, 7 Q. B. 115; 29 L. J. 97, C. P.; and the earlier cases in bankruptcy and Chancery cited in the judgment of the late case of Cullwick v. Swindell, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 249, and especially the case of Climie v. Wood (ubi sup.), affirmed in error L. Rep. 4 Ex. 328. But on the part of the plaintiff it was strongly contended on the authority of Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Ex. 296, that the machines and articles now in dispute, that looking to the nature of the articles, the mode of annexation, and the object and purpose of annexation, they were not in truth fixtures at all, but remained mere movable goods and chattels which would be liable to distress, as the machines called cotton mills were held to be in that case. The grounds of decision given by the court in that case being that the annexation there was so slight as to admit of removal of the machines without injury to the building or themselves, and the object and purpose of annexation being not to improve the inheritance but to render the machines steady and more capable of convenient use as chattels. In that case the mules were affixed in the same manner, as many of the machines in the present case. But it is observable that this case was decided before any of the cases to which we have referred and was cited in all or most of them, but not followed in any. On the contrary, it was distinguished in Mather v. Fraser, by the present Lord Chancellor (then Vice-Chancellor), who observed that it was a case between landlord and tenant, and was altogether inapplicable to the question whether machines fixed by an owner of the soil passed to a mortgagee of the freehold. In that case, machinery fixed in the same manner as the machine in Hellawell v. Eastwood was considered to pass to a mortgagee as fixtures and so also in Walmsley v. Milne the fact that the machinery there was so fastened as to admit of severance without injury to the building or the things fixed was disregarded by the court, as was also, in Climie v. Wood, the special additional fact found by the jury that the object of annexation was for the more convenient use of the things fixed, and not to improve the inheritance. In the present case the machines in question was nearly all firmly fixed to the building, in what the Vice-Chancellor in Mather v. Fraser calls a quasi-permanent manner, viz., by screws and bolts, or soldered with lead; in some cases they were affixed to the floor, in some both to floor and roof, and in others to the side walls. This fixing was clearly necessary, for they could not otherwise be effectually used, and for the same reason the fixing obviously was not occasional, but permanent. It is no doubt said in this case that the object of fixing was to insure steadiness, and keep the machines in their places when worked; but the same thing could probably be said of most trade fixtures, from a steam-engine downwards; and if the effect of this fixing is to cause the whole set of machines to be effectually used in the manufacture of wool and cloth, it seems very difficult to avoid coming to the conclusion that a necessary consequence is to cause the mill to be put to a more profitable use as a wool mill than it otherwise would be. It is also equally difficult to conceive that a machine which at all times requires to be firmly fixed to the freehold for the purpose of being worked, could truly be said to lose its character as a movable chattel. We therefore think that the case of Hellawell v. Eastwood was well distinguished from cases like the present in Mather v. Fraser, and that all the fixed articles in this case were such articles in the nature of trade fixtures as were considered by the court of error in Climie v. Wood in regard to the machinery there in dispute, and that they passed here to the defendants under their mortgage and subsequent conveyance. The articles which we consider to be merely movables are the washer or washing machine described in paragraph 30, the press plates and papers mentioned in paragraph 36, the loom machine mentioned in paragraph 42, the beaming frame mentioned in paragraph 43, the desk in the counting-house paragraph 45, the condenser bobbins paragraph 47, and the fencings and clogs paragraph 48.

Q. B.] THE LAND CREDIT COMPANY OF IRELAND v. LORD FERMOY; Ex parte MUNSTER. [CHAN.]

THE LAND CREDIT COMPANY OF IRELAND
v. LORD FERMOY.

Ex parte MUNSTER.

Practice—Service of decree—Writ of fi. fa.—Motion to discharge on ground of non-service of decree—Consolidated General Orders, 23, rule 10; 29, rule 6.

By the decree in a suit, the defendants were declared to be jointly and severally liable to repay to the plaintiffs a sum of money, and they were ordered to pay the same accordingly, with interest from the date of the decree, and the taxed costs of the suit, on or before a day named.

More than a month after the decree had been passed and *entered, the plaintiffs issued a writ of fi. fa. against one of the defendants, upon whom the decree had not been served:*

*Held (affirming a decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the writ of fi. fa. was regularly issued, though there had been no service of the decree on the defendant.*

*But even though the month from the time when the decree was duly passed and entered has elapsed, a fi. fa. could not be issued, if the time fixed by the decree for payment had not arrived.*

This was an appeal by Mr. Munster, one of the defendants to this suit, from an order made by the Master of the Rolls, refusing an application on the part of Mr. Munster to set aside, as irregularly obtained, a writ of fi. fa. which the plaintiffs had issued against him to enforce payment of a sum of 3739*l.*, which, by the decree in the cause, he and the other defendants were ordered to pay on or before the 30th June 1869, with interest from the date of the decree, and the costs of the suit when taxed. The decree was made on the 24th March 1869, and passed and entered on the 10th May 1869, but it was never served on Mr. Munster. On the 24th Nov. 1869, the plaintiffs issued a writ of fi. fa. against Mr. Munster, for the sum of 3739*l.*, with interest from the date of the decree, and also for the sum of 580*l.*, the amount at which the costs of the suit had been taxed.

The hearing of the application before the Master of the Rolls is reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574.

Jessel, Q. C., and Hemming, for the appellant, argued that, according to the old practice of the court, in order to compel the payment of money which by the decree a defendant was ordered to pay, it was necessary not only to serve the decree on the defendant, but to make a demand for payment. The 17th order of the 30th March 1859, which had now become the 1st rule of the 29th Consolidated General Order, was simply intended to do away with the necessity of making a demand for payment, but was not intended to alter the practice in any other way. The 1st rule of Order 29 provides that any person directed by any decree or order to pay any money to another shall be bound to obey such decree or order upon being duly served with the same, without demand, and that rule governs all the other rules of Order 29, among which is rule 6, relating to the writ of fi. fa. Rule 6 provides that every person to whom any sum of money shall have been directed to be paid, shall, after the lapse of one month from the time when the decree or order for payment was duly passed and entered, be entitled to sue out one or more writs of fi. fa., &c. All the other provisions of Order 29, as to the enforcing obedience to a decree, proceeded on the assumption that there had been default made in obeying it, and there could be no default till the decree had been served. Moreover rule 6 could not be read literally, for, if so, the writ of fi. fa. might be issued a month after the passing and entering of the decree, even in a case where the term fixed by the decree for payment had not arrived. That construction of rule 6, though absurd, was at one time adopted in the Record and Writ Clerks' Office. The practice of the court requires service of a decree or order as a preliminary to enforcing process of contempt in all cases except that of an order for an injunction, in which case it is sufficient that the party enjoined has knowledge in any way of the order. If, however, the practice at law is to be followed, then it should be followed altogether, and at law it would be necessary that the writ of fi. fa. should be issued against all the defendants, even though it was executed against one only. On this ground also, therefore, the writ was irregular in the present case, and ought to be discharged. They cited

Adkins v. Bliss, 2 De G. & J. 286;

Order 23, rule 10;

Order 29, rules 1 and 6;

Order 30, rule 4.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Shebbeare, who appeared for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD thought that there was no difficulty in the case. The meaning of the General Orders was quite plain, and it was the constant practice of the court to enforce orders against one of several defendants. Rule 10 of Order 23 had no reference to the issuing a writ of fi. fa. Then, by Order 29, express provision was made by rules 4 and 5 that in certain specified cases, viz., the enforcing obedience to a decree by means of a sequestration, or by the serjeant-at-arms, or a writ of assistance, the decree must be served before process could issue to enforce obedience to it. All these proceedings were founded upon the old process of contempt, and in all those cases the order required service of the decree as a necessary preliminary step. But the 6th rule of Order 29, which related to the issuing of the writ of fi. fa., said not a word about service of the decree. If it had been intended to require service of the decree as a preliminary, one would have expected to have found it mentioned in the rule. But the terms of the rule were unqualified. There was no difficulty in construing the 29th order. It was not intended that the 1st rule should override all the subsequent ones. No provision was made in the 6th rule for service of the decree before a writ of fi. fa. could be issued, because it was not intended that in that case service should be required as a necessary preliminary. But of course it was not supposed that the 6th rule would be construed otherwise than in accordance with common sense, or that the limit of one month was to apply when it would be inconsistent with the time fixed by the particular decree for payment. The appeal must be accordingly dismissed.

G. H. LEVITA'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Contributory — Application for shares—Allotment notice—Agent—Authority to accept notice of allotment.

L. applied for shares in a company in the ordinary way. The shares were allotted to him, and his name was entered upon the company's register of shareholders as the holder of them. No notice of allotment was, however, given to him by the company, and they never treated him as a shareholder. The notice of allotment was given to M., at whose request L. had signed the letter of application for the shares, and dividends which became due upon the shares were carried by the company to the credit of M. By the evidence of L. it appeared that he was not aware till after the commencement of the winding-up of the company that his name had been entered on the company's register, and also that he was told by M., when he signed the letter of application, that his doing so was a mere matter of form, and that he would not be troubled any more in the matter:

company, he having constituted L. his agent in every respect with regard to the shares.

This was an appeal by Mr. G. H. Levita, of Antwerp, from a decision of Stuart, V. C., fixing him on the list of contributories of this company in respect of 350 shares.

On the 4th June 1864 Mr. Levita signed a letter of application for the shares, as follows:

To the Directors of the International Contract Company (Limited).

Gentlemen,—Having paid to your bankers the sum of 350*l.*, being a deposit of 1*l.* per share on 350 shares in the above company, I hereby request that you will allot me that number, and I agree to accept such shares, or any less number that you may allot me; and I agree to pay the deposit on allotment, and to sign the articles of association of the company when required, and I authorise you to insert my name on the register of members for the number of shares allotted to me.

These 350 shares were afterwards registered in the name of Mr. Levita, but no notice of allotment was given to him. It appeared, however, that Mr. Levita had applied for the shares at the instance of a Mr. McHenry, and that the certificates of the shares were handed by the company to a person who signed the initials "C. C.," in the books of the company. Certificates of other shares belonging to McHenry, appeared to have been handed by the company to a person who signed the same initials, and he was believed to have been a clerk in the employ of McHenry. The books of the company showed that the dividends which accrued due on the 350 shares in question had been carried by the company to the credit of McHenry. The circumstances under which Levita applied originally for the shares were detailed by him in an affidavit which he made as follows:

In the month of June 1864, I received a letter from Mr. James McHenry, inclosing three printed forms of letters of application for shares in the above company, and requesting that I would sign one of them for 350 shares, and get my friends A. Van Bombeyer and H. Schopeler to sign the two others for 250 shares each, and I was informed by the said Mr. McHenry that it was a mere matter of form, and that neither I nor my said friends would be troubled any more in the said matter. I had known the said Mr. McHenry for some time previous thereto, and believed him to be a person of great respectability, and having confidence in his representations, I acceded to his request by signing the said first-mentioned letter, and getting my said friends also to sign the other two letters, and on the 4th June 1864, I transmitted them to the said Mr. McHenry. I never received any letter or notice of allotment of shares in the said company either before or after my returning the said letters, or any reply whatever from the said company to the said letter of the 4th June 1864, nor did I ever receive any scrip or other certificates for shares in the said company; nor did I ever pay anything as a deposit in applying for the shares mentioned in the said letter of the 4th June 1864, or any shares whatever in the said company. I never authorised any person or persons to accept any shares of the said company on my behalf, or to apply for or accept any scrip or share certificate for any shares whatever in the said company or on my behalf, or to give a receipt or receipts for the same. I never received any notice of a call, or paid any call on the said shares, or any shares whatever in the said company, or received any notice of a dividend or dividends in respect thereof, nor have I received any dividend or dividends, nor did I ever authorise any person or persons to pay any deposit or call, or receive any dividend or dividends on my behalf in respect of the said shares, or any shares whatever in the said company, save that I signed and sent to Mr. McHenry the said letter of the 4th June 1864. I have never done, said, or written anything with reference to becoming a shareholder in the said company, nor have I authorised or ratified or recognised anything which may have been done by the said Mr. McHenry, or any other person, in my name or on my behalf with reference to the said company or the affairs thereof, nor have I ever received any notice whatever from the said company until I received a notice in the month of June 1867 from the official liquidator after the commencement of the winding-up of the said company. Until I received the aforesaid notice from the said official liquidator after the commencement of the winding-up I did not know and had no reason to believe that any shares in the said company whatever had been allotted to me, either in pursuance of the aforesaid letter of the 4th June 1864; or otherwise, and I do not now know when the shares alleged to have been allotted to me were so allotted, if, in fact, they ever were allotted to me, which I have no reason to believe, except from the notices which I have received from the official liquidator in the course of the winding-up of the said company.

Notwithstanding this the Vice-Chancellor held that Mr. Levita was liable as a contributory in respect of the 350 shares, and from the decision he appealed.

Greene, Q.C., and Rigby, on behalf of the appellant, contended that he never became a shareholder in the company, because no notice of allotment of the shares was given to him. McHenry was not made his agent to receive notice of the allotment, but only to make the application. They cited

Re The Peruvian Railway Company, Crowley's case, and A. Robinson's case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 322;

Wallis' case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 325.

Hardy, Q. C., and J. Napier Higgins appeared on behalf of the official liquidator, but were not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that this case was entirely different from Robinson's case. Mr. Levita could not be taken to have signed the letter of application for the shares with any other intention than that it should be made use of, and his own evidence showed that when he had done so he sent the letter of application to Mr. McHenry to make what use he pleased of it, trusting to him for an indemnity against any consequences which might result from the application. To his Lordship's mind it was clear that Mr. Levita constituted McHenry his agent in every respect with regard to the shares, and left him to do as he pleased in the matter. Mr. Levita must, therefore, be taken to have been the owner of the shares, and must be placed on the list of contributories in respect of them. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ALEXANDER v. MILLS.

Power for trustees to sell at request of tenant for life—Alienation by tenant for life—Subsequent exercise of power—Fraud on power—Specific performance.

By a marriage settlement made in 1850, certain real estate was conveyed to trustees to the use of H. for life, with remainder to certain uses in favour of his children, and with an ultimate limitation in default of issue to H. in fee. The settlement contained a power for the trustees, during his life at and by his request in writing to sell the property.

In 1862 H. conveyed the property to A. to hold the same for the life of H., and for and during every other estate and interest which H. then had or could dispose of.

In 1868 the trustees of the settlement, purporting to exercise the power of sale contained in the settlement, at the request and by the direction of H., conveyed the property to A. in fee.

A. afterwards sold the property by auction to M. who declined to complete on the ground that the conveyance by the trustees was not a valid exercise of the power.

On a bill by A. to enforce specific performance of the contract:

This was a vendor's suit for specific performance.

By an indenture dated the 19th June 1850, and made between the Reverend William Henry Hicks of the first part, Charles Bailey and Charlotte Louisa Bailey spinster, his eldest daughter, of the second part, and Isaac Moreton Wood, Henry Albert Goodwin and Charles Edward Rowcliffe of the third part (being a settlement made in consideration of the marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnised between the said William Henry Hicks and Charlotte Louisa Bailey), the manor or lordship of Watton Hall, in Watton, in the county of Norfolk, and certain other real estate therein particularly described were conveyed to the said Wood, Goodwin, and Rowcliffe, their heirs and assigns: to the use (after the solemnisation of the said then intended marriage) of the said William Henry Hicks, and his assignees during his life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder (subject to certain powers for raising money and jointuring, appointment, &c., and to all terms of years, and estates to be created by the exercise of the said powers) to certain uses in favour of the child or children and other issue of the said William Henry Hicks whether by his then intended or by any future wife with an ultimate limitation, in default of such issue to the use of the said William Henry Hicks, his heirs and assigns. And by the indenture of settlement it was agreed and declared that it should be lawful for the trustees and the survivors and survivor of them their and his heirs and assigns at any time after the said intended marriage during the life of the said William Henry Hicks, at and by his request and direction in writing, to dispose of either by way of absolute sale or in exchange, all or any part or parts of the manor, &c., and other hereditaments thereby conveyed and the inheritance thereof, in fee simple to any person or persons whomsoever for such price, &c., as to them should seem reasonable, and for the purpose of effecting any such sale, &c., absolutely to revoke all and singular the uses, trusts, and powers thereinbefore contained of the hereditaments so to be sold, &c.

By an indenture dated the 29th Oct. 1862, and made between Hicks of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, for the consideration therein mentioned, Hicks granted, conveyed, and in order to extinguish the powers of jointuring and appointment reserved or given to him by the settlement, released and quitted claim unto the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, the said manor and other hereditaments comprised in the settlement, to hold the same freed and discharged from the said powers of jointuring and appointment, but subject to certain sums amounting together to 5000*l.* charged by Hicks on the premises and the interest thereon, and subject to certain terms of 5000 years and 3000 years and to certain sums thereby secured unto and to the use of the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, for the life of Hicks, and further for and during every other estate and interest which Hicks then had or could dispose of by this indenture both at law and in equity, and whether present or future, vested, executory, contingent, or otherwise howsoever.

By an indenture dated the 27th March 1868, and made between G. Goldney, G. P. Goldney, and C. W. Roberts (the then trustees of the settlement) of the first part, Hicks of the second part, G. Goldney and T. A. Fellowes (in whom the terms of 5000 years and 3000 years, and the sums thereby secured were vested) of the third part, and the plaintiff of the fourth part, for the considerations thereafter expressed, the parties thereto of the first part in exercise and execution of the power or authority in that behalf, vested in them as trustees of the said indenture of settlement of the 19th June 1850, and at the request and by the direction of the said William Henry Hicks absolutely revoked the uses, trusts, and powers in the said indenture of settlement declared and contained of the hereditaments and premises thereafter described and thereby appointed and conveyed or intended so to be so far as such powers were not necessary to effectuate and complete the assurance intended to be thereby made. And in consideration of the sum of 5000*l.* to the said G. Goldney and T. A. Fellowes, paid by the plaintiff at the request and by the direction of the trustees, and in consideration of the sum of 14,000*l.* to the trustees, at the same time paid by the plaintiff, the trustees, by force and virtue, and in exercise and execution of the aforesaid power or authority in that behalf, given to or vested in them as such trustees as aforesaid, and at the like request and by the like direction of the said William Henry Hicks, thereby absolutely and irrevocably declared and appointed that all and singular the premises thereafter mentioned, &c., with their appurtenances, should thenceforth go, continue, and be to the use thereafter expressed and declared of and concerning. And for the considerations aforesaid the trustees at the like request, and by the like direction of the said William Henry Hicks, and according to their estate and interest, if any, in the premises thereby granted and conveyed, and the said G. Goldney and T. A. Fellowes, for the purpose of merging and extinguishing the said several terms of 5000 years and 3000 years surrendered and released, and the said William Henry Hicks granted and conveyed unto and to the plaintiff, his heirs, and assigns, all and singular the said manor, &c., and other hereditaments comprised in the said indenture of settlement of the 19th June 1850, with the appurtenances to hold the same unto and to the use of the plaintiff, his heirs, and assigns, for ever freed and absolutely discharged from the said mortgage securities so vested in the said G. Goldney and T. A. Fellowes as aforesaid, &c.

In May 1869 the plaintiff put up the property for sale by auction, and it was purchased by the defendant at the price of 21,000*l.*, of which 2100*l.* was paid by way of deposit, and the defendant's agent signed an agreement to complete the purchase in accordance with the conditions of sale.

On examining the title the defendant refused to complete on the ground that as Hicks, the tenant for life, had conveyed away absolutely all his estate and interest in the property by the indenture of the 29th Oct. 1862, his power of directing or consenting to a sale had determined, and the indenture of the 27th March 1868 was not a valid exercise of the power.

Thereupon the plaintiff filed the present bill praying that the defendant might be decreed specifically to perform his contract of the 13th May 1869.

Jessel, Q. C. and Wickens, for the plaintiff, submitted that the defendant's objection to the title could not be sustained. They cited Simpson v. Bathurst, W. Notes, 31 Dec. 1869.

Joshua Williams, Q.C., and Rodwell for the defendant, contended that there was no case in which it had been held that, after the tenant for life had completely alienated his interest in the property, the power for the trustees to sell at the request of the tenant for life could be exercised, while there was a clear opinion of Lord St. Leonards' to the contrary; in his work on Powers (8th edit.) p. 70, he says "an absolute conveyance upon a sale would, it is apprehended, prevent the power from being exercised, from the very nature of the power independently of any technical question, for powers of sale and exchange are manifestly given to the tenant for life in consequence of the character which he fills." The cases cited on behalf of the plaintiff were quite different from the present case; in Long v. Rankin there was a conveyance of the life estate to secure an annuity; that did not defeat the life estate, but merely created a charge upon it. Holdsworth v. Goose, Eisdell v. Hammersley, and Simpson v. Bathurst were cases in which the life estate was alienated by bankruptcy; that was an alienation by operation of law, and was quite different from a voluntary alienation such as had taken place in the present case. The conveyance by the trustees was a clear fraud on the power; true it was that the trustees might sell to the tenant for life, for in that event they could exercise their discretion, but here their hands were bound, and they could exercise no discretion. They referred to

Reeves v. Creswick, 3 Y. & Coll. Ex. 715;
Hill v. Pritchard, Kay 394.

Wickens, in reply, contended that there was no foundation for the distinction insisted upon between bankruptcy and voluntary alienation.

March 9.—Lord ROMILLY.—The question in this case is whether a tenant for life who has sold his estate, and the ultimate reversion to a purchaser for value, can, at the request of the purchaser, exercise his power of sale; it is clear that he cannot exercise the power of sale without the assent of the purchaser, because no man can derogate from his own grant. The facts which raise the question are the simplest possible. On the 19th June 1850, a settlement is made on the marriage of Mr. Hicks; by it he takes a life interest in the property and a power of jointuring a wife with remainder to the issue of the marriage, with an ultimate limitation to himself in fee; and the settlement contained a power given to the trustees to sell at the request and by the directions in writing of Mr. Hicks. In Oct. 1862, Hicks sold the whole of his interest under the settlement to the plaintiff. Afterwards in March 1868, the trustees at the request and by the direction in writing of Hicks, sell the property to the plaintiff under the power; and about a year after in 1869, he sells the estate by auction to the defendant. The defendant objects that there is a blot on the title, and that the sale by Hicks to the plaintiff was a fraud on the power. The plaintiff files a bill for specific performance; this is the only objection to the title, and the question is whether this is such a title as the court can compel the defendant to accept. I think that it is impossible to compel the defendant to accept the title. In saying this I do not adopt the expression frequently cited to me, that the court will abstain from compelling a defendant to accept a title where, though the point is doubtful, the court is of opinion that the objection is bad; but, upon fully considering this case, I have found myself compelled to come to the conclusion that if it was absolutely necessary to decide the point between adverse claimants, I should hold the objection to be valid. I do not think that this case is affected by such decisions as that of the House of Lords in Long v. Rankin (sup.) where the tenant for life had sold his estate for the purpose of raising an annuity for his life, and had expressly reserved his power of leasing, and the question there tried was whether the exercise of that power was derogatory to his grant, and it was held not to be so, but to be for the benefit of all persons interested in the enjoyment of the estate. But here the opposite principle appears to me to arise; on the principle of that case all that is clear as applied to this case is that the tenant for life could not require the trustees to exercise the power of sale without the consent of the plaintiff. But the question in reality here is whether the plaintiff can require the tenant for life to call on the trustees to exercise the power for the benefit of himself, and in fact at the suggestion of the plaintiff. As long as the tenant for life is the owner of the property for the period of his life, it is obvious that it must be for his interest that the property should be sold in such a manner, and at such a time as to secure the highest price, but when he has sold his life interest and his reversion to a stranger, it is to him a mere matter of indifference at what time and in what manner the sale is carried out, and if it can be so managed that it can be bought by the purchaser of the life interest, he acquires an advantage, as indeed is shown in the present case, where the sale to the defendant is at a considerably advanced price on the price that was given for it by the plaintiff. The time and mode of sale is, in fact, intrusted to the tenant for life because it is inferred that he will do what he can to protect his own interest, and in so doing to protect the interests of the persons in remainder, but the moment his interest ceases then he may collude with the alliance to the injury and detriment of the persons in remainder. I do not observe or suspect anything of that sort in this case, but I state it in order to show the reason of the rule and why such an exercise of the power may reasonably be considered as a fraud on the power. It seems to be quite settled by authority that an absolute alienation of the life estate by sale takes away from the tenant for life the power of leasing. How does the power of sale in substance differ from this? It is no doubt difficult to see how, in a court of law, any distinction can exist between the conveyance of the life estate by way of security or by way of mortgage, and a conveyance by way of sale, and yet it seems to me to be obvious that a power of sale is given to a tenant for life by reason of his being tenant for life as I have already stated, and I have in vain searched for any case where the court has held such a power capable of being exercised where there has been an absolute sale of the life estate. In this case, not only is the life estate sold, but the reversion also is sold, and all interest of Mr. Hicks in the estate is absolutely gone. The cases of Tyrell v. Marsh (sup.), Davies v. Bush (sup.), and Walmesley v. Butterworth (sup.), are all cases of mortgage. It does not appear to me to be a matter of technicality, but one of substance. Here the settlor settles an estate on A. for life with remainder to his issue, and in default of such issue to A. in fee; and he gives a power of sale. I call it a power of sale to him; but it is, in fact, a power of sale to the trustees to be exercised at his request, and by his direction in writing; in my opinion this does not differ from a power of sale given to him alone. A. sells all his interest; surely the intention of the settlor was that the power of sale should then become incapable of being exercised, and he never meant that the tenant for life when he is become a mere stranger without any interest in the property should be able so to sell it as to deprive his issue of the full value of the estate. It is true that if there be an ingredient of fraud a collusive sale might be set aside on other grounds, but the difficulty of detecting and proving this is a sufficient reason to induce a settlor not to give such a power to a mere stranger, but to restrict the exercise unless as inseparable from the estate of the tenant for life, and that when he parts with this, the power is gone. It appears to me that if I were to decide in favour of the plaintiff, I should be going a step further than any case has hitherto gone, and a step which the facts of this case show would be likely to lead to much evil and inconvenience. I must therefore dismiss the bill with costs.

ROBINSON v. O'KELL.

[V.C. S.]

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April 25 and 26.

ROBINSON v. O'KELL.

County Court—Mortgage—Wife's chose in action—Parties—Decree of County Court reversed.

A married woman advanced 250*l.* upon the security of a deposit of title-deeds of real estate. Her husband died, and she married a second time. Shortly after her second marriage her husband borrowed some money upon a deposit of the same deeds. Subsequently she separated from her husband, and a deed was then executed, whereby the husband released to his wife all his interest in her real and personal estate. The husband became bankrupt, and his assignee, having paid off the second mortgage, obtained possession of the deeds. Upon the death of the first mortgagee the bankrupt's assignee filed a plaint in the County Court, making the mortgagee's executors the only defendants, and claiming to be paid the 250*l.*, or in default that the property might be sold. The County Court judge, overruling an objection taken that the bankrupt's wife was a necessary party, made the order prayed.

Held (reversing the decree of the court below), that the wife was a necessary party, and that the case must stand over in the County Court, with liberty to the plaintiff to amend his plaint by adding parties.

This was an appeal from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Cheshire, pronounced under the following circumstances:

On the 25th March 1859, Mrs. Pater, a married woman, lent to Mrs. Jardine, also a married woman, a sum of 250*l.*, at 4½ per cent., on the security of a deposit of the title-deeds of certain freehold property. Mr. Pater died in 1862, and in 1867 Mrs. Pater married a Mr. Lloyd, who shortly afterwards obtained possession of the title-deeds and deposited them with a Mr. Houghton, to secure a sum of money then due to him. In Jan. 1868, Mr. Lloyd was adjudicated a bankrupt. The plaintiff was appointed his assignee, and as such assignee, paid off Houghton and obtained possession of the title-deeds.

In May 1868, Mr. Lloyd and his wife agreed to separate, and live apart, and had ever since continued to do so. At the time of the separation a deed was executed, whereby Mr. Lloyd gave up and released all claim to the real and personal estate of his wife. Mrs. Jardine died a widow in Sept. 1868, having, by her will, devised and bequeathed all her estate to the defendants, whom she appointed her executors.

She had never paid off the money advanced to her on the security of the title-deeds by Mrs. Lloyd, and after her death the plaintiff, as Lloyd's assignee, filed a plaint against her executors, praying that they might be ordered to pay to him the principal sum and interest due on the mortgage, or, in default, that a decree might be made for the sale of the real estate comprised in the deeds, and satisfaction of the debt thereon, together with the costs of the suit.

When the cause came on to be heard in the County Court, it was objected, on behalf of the plaintiff, that Mrs. Lloyd ought to have been made a party to the plaint, the judge, however, overruled the objection, and, without any evidence being adduced by either of the parties to the suit, but upon admissions, made an order, according to the form No. 24 in the schedule to the County Court Rules 1867, to the effect prayed by the plaint.

Hence this appeal on behalf of the defendants.

The question on the appeal turned principally upon the necessity of making Mrs. Lloyd a party.

Cozens Hardy for the appellants, contended that the mortgage debt was a chose in action which had never been reduced into possession by Mr. Lloyd, and that it was now the property of Mrs. Lloyd under the separation-deed. But even assuming that the suit itself was an attempt by Mr. Lloyd to reduce the debt into possession, Mrs. Lloyd ought to be a party to it. The plaint was clearly demurrable on that ground, and in fact the defendants by their statement in answer to the plaint, had in effect demurred to it.

W. Pearson for the respondent, argued that where there was a question for want of parties, there must be a claim averred, and neither in the plaint nor elsewhere in the pleadings was there an averment of any claim on the part of Mrs. Lloyd. Further, if Mrs. Lloyd were a necessary party, she could be brought before the court by a supplemental plaint, and then she would be bound by these proceedings; but even if she were brought before the court, she could not assert any right, and therefore the appeal ought to be dismissed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The admission in this case shows that Mr. Pater, the first husband of Mrs. Lloyd, allowed her to deal with the 250*l.* by lending it, as if it had been her own, to Mrs. Jardine. On Mr. Pater's death, the money, therefore, became his widow's property, and on her marriage with Mr. Lloyd, a chose in action, liable to be reduced into possession by him. Mr. Lloyd, however, has become bankrupt, and his assignee now claims the property, but if it has not been reduced into possession by Mr. Lloyd, or if Mrs. Lloyd asserts any right to it, under the separation-deed, her presence before the court is clearly requisite. The proper order, therefore, to be made, is this, the court being of opinion that Mrs. Lloyd is a necessary party to the suit, the decree of the court below must be reversed, and the case must stand over in the County Court, with liberty to the plaintiff to amend his plaint by adding parties as he may be advised. There will be no costs of the appeal, but the deposit must be returned.

V.C. MALINS' COURT.Reported by G. T. EDWARDS and G. I. F. COOKE, Esqrs.,

LINES v. LINES.

Will—Construction—“All my personal estate and effects” comprehending real estate—Intention.A testator gave his “personal estate” to his executors, with a direction to collect the rents of his real estate, and gave all the residue of his personal estate and effects of every kind and description to T. L. :Held, that the testator, by directing the executors to receive his rents, with a mere gift of personal estate, showed what he meant by those words; and that, therefore, the residuary legatee took all the residuary real estate.

The question in this case was whether a gift of all the testator's “personal estate and effects,” having regard to the whole of his will, passed his real estate to the legatee. The bill was filed by the plaintiff as heir-at-law of the testator, claiming all his residuary real estate, and a common administration decree had been made; the present point being reserved to be argued on the cause coming on, as it now did, on further consideration. The testator by his will gave to his executors (therein named) all his personal estate, and he directed them, his said executors, from time to time, to collect, get, and receive the rents of his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments; and thereout to pay annuities to certain persons named, and the will concluded as follows:—“And I appoint Samuel Lines my sole residuary legatee; and I bequeath to him all the rest, residue, and remainder of my personal estate and effects of every kind and description.” Under this will the defendant claimed all the testator's real estate, not otherwise given by the will, the plaintiffs claiming it as undisposed of.

Glasse, Q. C. and Shebbare appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that there being no words used in the will sufficient to describe or pass real estate, it was impossible to hold that the residuary gift passed such real estate; and therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to it as undisposed of as the testator's heir-at-law.

Cotton, Q. C. and Speed, for the defendants, insisted that the testator had in the whole context of the will put his own interpretation on the residuary clause. It was impossible to look at the gift to the executors, coupled with the direction with respect to the real estate, without seeing that he intended to give them the real estate, without which they could not collect the rents; and therefore, having used the expressions “personal estate” in the gift to them, it was evident what sense he attributed to those words; and they must have the same meaning applied to them when used in the residuary clause. Moreover the word “effects,” connected with the word “estate,” was sufficient to pass real estate.

Glasse, Q. C. in reply.Authorities cited:—

Dobson v. Bowness, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 404.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case is, whether a gift of “all my personal estate and effects,” included certain real estate. Now, it cannot be disputed that a general gift of residuary personal estate cannot pass real estate, but you must look at every part of a will, and if you find that the testator has described that which is personal estate as real estate, or that which is real estate by terms only importing personalty, that is conclusive upon the court, which is bound to carry out as far as it can, that which he intended. No doubt if this gift stood alone it passed no more than personal estate, because the testator says, “And I appoint Samuel Lines sole residuary legatee of all my personal estate and effects.” What does he call personal estate? To discover that we must look at the whole will. He begins by a disposition which shows an intention not to leave anything undisposed of. He directs his trustees and executors to stand possessed of his personal estate of every kind and description, and he goes on to enumerate what he means, excepting household furniture, plate, linen, and china, and he directs his trustees to collect the rents of his leasehold, freehold, and copyhold property. Therefore when he says “personal estate,” he clearly includes these leaseholds, freeholds, and copyholds, although, of course, leaseholds would be personalty. Unfortunately, he uses language importing personal estate only; but still, if he distinctly shows an intention to pass his leasehold, freehold, and copyhold property, although in one part of the will he may call it personal estate, who shall say that he does not mean it because he uses the same expression, only including personal estate, in another? I think he distinctly shows that he was perfectly acquainted with the nature of his property, and intended the whole of it to pass, both real and personal; for it is clear to my mind that he has interpreted his own words, showing that by the description, “personal estate and effects,” he meant to include real estate. Therefore I am of opinion that the residuary legatee is entitled to the residuary real estate. Doe v. Tofield (sup.) is a leading authority, and there it turned upon the question whether, where there was a gift of all the personal estate, and then of a freehold house, that house passed under the general description. All the court did there was to ascertain that which was not strictly personalty, and laid it down that you must look at every part of the will for the purpose of interpreting it; and if you find in one part that which is personal described by words importing real estate or vice versa, you must give effect to the intention. In this case it appears to me that the testator has distinctly shown that he means by the words “personal estate and effects,” leasehold, freehold, and copyhold property. There must, therefore, be a declaration that the residuary real estate passed.

Re THE UNION HILL SILVER COMPANY (LIMITED).

Company—Winding-up—Notice of meeting—Shareholders out of jurisdiction—Dissentient shareholder—Companies Act 1862, s. 52.

Notice was issued to the shareholders of a company of a general meeting for the purpose of passing a resolution to wind-up voluntarily; the resolution was passed, and confirmed at a subsequent general meeting. Some of the shareholders were resident in America, and consequently could not, in the ordinary course of the post, have received seven days' notice of either of the meetings as required by sect. 52 of the Companies Act 1862:

Held, that this section only applies to shareholders within the jurisdiction, and that therefore the proceedings were valid.

Where resolutions for winding-up a company voluntarily were passed by the shareholders, there being only one dissentient shareholder, the court refused to entertain a petition presented by such shareholder for a compulsory winding-up order, on the ground that the meetings at which the resolutions were passed were not in all respects regular.

Re Beaujolais Wine Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 15, followed.

This was a petition by the Rev. Francis Henry Brett, a shareholder in the Union Hill Silver Company (Limited), praying for a compulsory winding-up order. They company was registered on the 15th Nov. 1866, for the purpose, as stated in the memorandum of association, of purchasing and working certain silver mines known as "The Blazing Star," "The Northerner," and "The Morning Glory," near Austin, Nevada, in the United States of America, and also of purchasing and working any other mines in North America; the capital was to be 60,000*l.*, divided into 6000 shares of 10*l.* each. On the same day articles of association were duly registered, which provided that the regulations contained in Table A of the Companies Act 1862, should be adopted as regulations of the company, and that the directors of the company might issue fully paid-up shares in payment for any property purchased by the company, which shares were to be marked B shares, and were not to be entitled to any dividend until 20*l.* per cent. should have been first paid to the holders of ordinary, or A shares, and also that the directors should purchase the mines mentioned in the memorandum of association. Shortly afterwards a prospectus was issued by the directors, stating that previous owners had already opened the mines to an extent sufficient to prove that their value at the depth reached was equal to the average of the celebrated mines in the best part of the very richest district of the state of Nevada, but that such owners had surrendered them to the company in order that they might be more actively worked, and that it had been estimated that by an outlay of 1200*l.* on each mine for machinery, a profit of 240*l.* per day, or at least 200*l.* per day, would be realised from each mine, being at the rate of 250*l.* per cent. per annum upon the total capital of the company; also that the original owners had taken the whole purchase price of the property in paid-up deferred B shares, and that only a limited number of the ordinary, or A shares, remained unallotted. The petitioner was, as he alleged, induced by this prospectus to apply for, and he accordingly became the holder of five A shares.

The petitioner stated that it was arranged between Frederick William Howes and Edmund Edwards, two of the promoters of the company, on the one hand, and Henry Joachimsen on the other, that Joachimsen should sell his interest in the mines to the company for 30,000*l.* by an allotment to him of 3000 B shares, which arrangement was carried into effect by an agreement dated the 31st Dec. 1866. That on the 10th Feb. 1868 only 473 of the A shares had been allotted, and upon these 4*l.* had been called up, and of that amount the sum of 1099*l.* was in arrear, and its recovery almost hopeless; and that out of the sums actually paid-up, 500*l.* had been paid for promotion money, so that the whole available capital for working the mines was less than 300*l.* On the 8th April 1868, the company issued a circular to the shareholders asking them to subscribe for new shares, and with this circular a new prospectus was issued repeating, in substance the statements in the first prospectus. Another prospectus had also been issued to the same effect. The petitioner then applied for and became the registered holder of seven shares of this new issue, and paid-up 5*l.* upon them; and also became the purchaser for 40*l.* of eight of the B shares. On the 7th Feb. last, when he presented this petition, he was the holder of twelve A shares, with 7*l.* paid-up, and seven out of the eight B shares which he had purchased. On the 22nd Dec. 1868, Joachimsen, who had been appointed manager of the mines, wrote to the directors that the "Blazing Star" mine, the only mine then in operation, had turned out to be unprofitable, and proposed to find other mines in the State of Nevada, which could be advantageously worked by the company.

On the 1st Oct. 1869 the directors issued a report to the shareholders, stating the position and prospects of the company, and with the report issued a notice that the second annual general meeting of the shareholders would be held on the 12th Nov. 1869. About the same time a notice was sent to the shareholders by one of the directors of his intention to propose at the meeting that the company should be wound-up voluntarily. The meeting was accordingly held and the resolution was submitted to the shareholders, but was not passed, being opposed on the ground that time should be given for obtaining further advices from Joachimsen; it was, however, distinctly understood at the meeting that the opposition to the resolution should be withdrawn if satisfactory advices were not received within a certain time. No further advices having been received, the directors, on the 15th March 1870, issued a notice to the shareholders that an extraordinary general meeting would be held on the 24th March 1870, at which a resolution would be proposed that the company should be wound-up voluntarily. The meeting accordingly took place; there were present, either in person or by proxy, twenty-one shareholders, holding 258, out of a total of 335 A shares, and the resolution to wind-up the company voluntarily was carried unanimously, and liquidators were appointed. On the 31st March 1870 notices were issued convening a second extraordinary general meeting, to be held on the 11th April following, for the purpose of confirming this resolution. At this meeting there were present, in person or by proxy, eighteen shareholders, holding 248 A shares. The petitioner did not himself attend this meeting, but his solicitor, Mr. Pulbrook, who had qualified himself by taking one share, was present on his behalf. The resolution for a voluntary winding-up was confirmed by all the shareholders present except Mr. Pulbrook, who voted against the resolution.

The petitioner alleged that the company was a bubble company; that it had long ceased to carry on business, and was unable to pay its debts; but on the other hand, it was stated in evidence that the business of the company had not actually ceased, but was only suspended, and that its debts did not amount to 50*l.* It also appeared that some of the shareholders were resident in New York, and, consequently, could not have received seven days' notice of the meetings of the 24th March and the 11th April, as required by the 52nd section of the Companies Act 1862. On this ground the petitioner contended that the meetings were irregular, and the resolutions therefore invalid.

Glasse, Q. C. and Brooksbank for the petitioner.—This company has ceased to carry on business for more than a twelvemonth; it is altogether a bubble company, and the petitioner therefore asks, under clause 5 of the 79th section of the Companies Act 1862, that it should be wound-up by the court: (Re London and County Coal Company, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 355; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 475.) The resolutions for winding-up the company voluntarily are invalid. Under the 51st section of the Act, the resolutions must be passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths of the members of the company for the time being entitled to vote at meetings of which due notice has been given; and according to the 52nd section no meeting can be held to be duly summoned, unless seven days' notice of such meeting has been served on every member as required by Schedule 1, Table A; here the shareholders resident in America could not in the ordinary course of the post have received the seven days' notice.

Cotton, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, for the company, opposed the petition. The order asked for would cause unnecessary expense. The company has not come within the 79th section of the Companies Act 1862; it is still able to meet its liabilities, and therefore the court cannot make the order: (Re Joint-Stock Coal Company, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 146; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 966.) There was no necessity for serving the shareholders in America with notices of the meetings. The 52nd section can only apply to shareholders within the jurisdiction, and who can be reached by the English post. It cannot mean that a company must suspend the transaction of business until its shareholders in every quarter of the globe have been served. All the shareholders, except the petitioner, are in favour of a voluntary winding-up, and therefore the court ought not to make an order for compulsory winding-up:

Re Beaujolais Wine Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 15.

Glasse, in reply.—It is clear the company cannot continue to carry on its business, and we have therefore a right to a winding-up order, even though the company may not be insolvent: (Re Suburban Hotel Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 737; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22.) All the shareholders ought to have been served with the notices of the meetings. How could the resolutions be regular, if a substantial number of the shareholders were unrepresented at the meetings? It is of great importance that a resolution for winding-up a company should be regular in all respects: (Re Old Bridport Brewery Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App., 191.) Re Beaujolais Wine Company (ubi sup.) differs from the present case.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR—This is a petition for a compulsory order for winding-up this company. The company, it appears, was formed in Nov. 1866 for the purpose of purchasing and working certain mines in Nevada, in the United States. Three prospectuses were issued by the directors at different times, which were in the usual form, holding out great promises and the most brilliant prospects, and by them the petitioner was, as he alleged, led to believe that the profits would amount to about 240% a day, or 250% per cent. per annum. As might well have been expected, he experienced complete disappointment; no profits whatever were made. Looking at these prospectuses, I am inclined to think the statements they contain are not altogether consistent with good faith, and that they are such as honest men ought not to have made; but I am astonished to find that any persons could have been found to embark their money upon such an undertaking. There can be no doubt that these statements are altogether delusive and unfounded, and therefore I think that if the petitioner has been misled by them, his proper remedy was to have filed a bill for the return of his money against the parties who made the misrepresentations, and according to the well known principles of this court as laid down in Chester v. Spargo, 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 314, there would have been no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the directors were bound to return all moneys received by them on the faith of these misrepresentations. That would have been the proper course for the petitioner to take. But instead of adopting this course, he presents a petition for a compulsory winding-up stating he is a shareholder, and by so doing he admits his position. It appears he has paid up 124% and is liable to pay 36% more, but the company offered to exonerate him from this sum and to pay him his costs out of pocket, if he would consent to have his petition dismissed; that offer, however, was not acceded to, and I have therefore now to decide whether this is a case for a compulsory order. Now in all these cases the court must consider what the result of a compulsory order will be. If the result of such an order in this case would be that great expense would be incurred, I ought to refrain from making such an order. Now this company has substantially no property whatever; the whole of their debts do not amount to 50%, it seems perfectly clear that they cannot continue to carry on their business, and therefore they ought to be wound-up. The question is whether they ought to be wound-up under a compulsory order. The facts of the case are these:—A general meeting of the shareholders was held in November 1869, at which a report was read showing the prospects of the concern; a resolution was then proposed that the company should be wound-up voluntarily, but the resolution was not passed, though it was understood by those present that a voluntary winding-up should take place, if more favourable accounts of the company's prospects were not received from Joachimsen, the company's manager. Nothing further having been heard from Joachimsen, an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 24th March last, at which a resolution was unanimously passed that the company should be wound-up voluntarily. On the 11th of this month a second meeting was held at which this resolution was confirmed. The petitioner did not himself attend this meeting, but his solicitor Mr. Pulbrook, who had bought one share to entitle him to be present as a shareholder, attended in order to protect the interests of his client; and therefore I must consider Mr. Brett to have been present by his agent. Mr. Pulbrook was the only shareholder who voted against the resolution, which was then passed. It appears, therefore, that all parties are desirous of a voluntary winding-up except the petitioner. Then this petition is presented. Now, looking at the character of the speculation, the petitioner must have been aware that the concern he was embarking in was a mere lottery, and therefore, open to the greatest peril. No reasonable person could have expected that an investment in such a concern would yield a profit of 250 per cent.; it ought, therefore, to have been brought to an end in the most expeditious and inexpensive manner. The petitioner was well aware that the general feeling of the shareholders was in favour of a voluntary winding-up, but, notwithstanding this, he presents a petition for a compulsory winding-up which can be of no benefit to any of the parties concerned; and he contends that the resolutions for the voluntary winding-up were invalid because some of the shareholders, who were in America, did not receive due notice of the meetings at which those resolutions were passed. This objection is founded on the 52nd section of the Companies Act 1862, which provides that seven days' notice of any general meeting must be served upon every shareholder in the manner specified in Table A of the first schedule to the Act. Now, if the petitioner's construction of this section is right, namely, that every shareholder must have notice of a general meeting, no matter in what part of the world he may happen to be, it is a most inconvenient construction; because a company cannot, without serious injury to itself, delay the transaction of important business until every shareholder in every part of the world has had notice of the meeting at which the business is to be discussed. I think that such a construction would be entirely opposed to the spirit and intention of the Act. It seems to me that the Act has reference only to shareholders who can be reached by the ordinary English post, and that, in fact, it was not necessary to serve these absent shareholders. I am therefore of opinion that this objection to winding-up the company voluntarily is unfounded. The petitioner, at all events, had due notice of these meetings; and the proceedings, therefore, are binding upon him. If the absent shareholders think they are not bound, they may come here at some future time and raise the question. Mr. Glasse says this case is different from that of the Beaujolais Wine Company, L. Rep., 3 Ch. App., 15; but that case seems to me to be exactly similar to the present. There the meetings which took place, though they were irregular, showed the general feeling of the shareholders, and that all parties were desirous of winding-up voluntarily; and, accordingly, the proceedings at those meetings were upheld. In the present case no one appears in support of the petition, and the interest of the petitioner is insignificant. Under all the circumstances of this case, and as no reasonable good would arise from the order to the petitioner or anyone else, I think the petition must be dismissed; but, taking into consideration the misrepresentations in the prospectus, without costs.

Trustee Act 1850—Appointment of new trustees—Alien—Cestui que trust—13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 32.

Where three executors and trustees of the will of a naturalised British subject renounced probate, and declined to act, the court, on the petition of the administrator, and of the persons who would, but for the fact of their being aliens, be coheirs at law, made an order, the Crown not opposing, for the appointment of new trustees, and vesting the real estate in such new trustees.

This was a petition for the appointment of new trustees of the will of Andres Ysidro Breton Martinez, a naturalised Spaniard, who, by his will dated the 29th of March 1856, devised real estate to three trustees upon trusts for sale; the beneficiaries being the testator's two sisters, who were aliens, and would, if British subjects, have been his coheirs at law.

The trustees, who were also appointed executors, renounced probate, and declined to act, but had not disclaimed by deed.

The petition was presented by the administrator cum testamento annexo, and the two sisters.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that under the circumstances he decidedly thought it "fit and expedient" that new trustees should be appointed. PADDON v. WINCH.

Practice—Production of documents.

Pending a contract between mortgagees, selling under a power of sale, and the purchaser, letters passed in which reference was made to an anticipated claim by a third party to a legacy, as being a charge on the mortgaged property.

The claim was afterwards made by bill:

Held, that the correspondence could not be treated in the suit as privileged.

This was an adjourned summons for production by the defendant of certain letters in his possession written before the institution of the suit.

The bill was filed in Oct. 1869 by a legatee whose testator died in 1848, for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that her legacy was charged upon certain freehold property which, in Jan. 1868, had been sold to the defendant Winch by the West of England and South Wales District Bank, as mortgagees with power of sale from the testator's son to whom the property was devised (charged, as the bill alleged, with payment of legacies and interest). The defendant, by his answer, insisted that he was purchaser of the property for valuable consideration without notice; that he was led to believe that the plaintiff's legacy had been long since paid, though out of abundant caution the bank had given him an indemnity against any claim in respect of such legacy.

A summons having been taken out for production of documents by the defendant, the defendant claimed privilege for (amongst other documents) certain letters which had passed between the solicitors and agents for the bank and his solicitors between Aug. 1867 and Feb. 1868, during the negotiations for his purchase.

The defendant's affidavit stated that these letters were "letters referring to the plaintiff's claim for her legacy, which is the subject-matter of dispute in this suit. My solicitor, Mr. Downing, having, as my solicitor, corresponded with Messrs. Chanter and Finch and other the agents of the said bank, concerning the same, such letters were written in anticipation of proceedings being taken in reference to the said legacy."

Graham Hastings, for the plaintiff, in support of the summons, contended that the privilege could not be extended to communications between the defendant's solicitor and third parties before the suit arose, and not for the purposes of the suit; and cited

Ford v. Tennant, 32 Beav. 162; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 733.

Ince, for the defendant, contended that the letters in question were privileged communications, having been written in anticipation of the claim raised by the plaintiff, which was then contemplated, though it had not actually ripened into a suit. He cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion that these documents must be produced. It is quite clear, looking at the dates, that they were not written with a view to the defence of this suit. They were letters that passed between the solicitor of the purchaser and the solicitor of the vendor, in reference to a contract for the purchase by the defendant, in which the legacy claimed by the plaintiff was incidentally mentioned. They could not be said to be letters written in anticipation of the claim raised by this suit, and must, therefore, be produced.

THE WANDSWORTH AND PUTNEY GAS-LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY v. WRIGHT AND OTHERS.

Company—Election of directors—Validity of, impeached—Authority of parties claiming to be duly elected—Retainer on behalf of company by—Costs.

At a board meeting of a company, under the regulations of which three directors made a quorum, two directors and two other gentlemen who claimed to be directors on the ground that at the election of directors the poll which went against them had been unfairly taken, passed resolutions under the advice of a solicitor that he should take legal proceedings to restrain one of the gentlemen in whose favour the poll had been declared (the other being dead) from acting, and they affixed the seal of the company to a retainer for that purpose. The solicitor accordingly filed the bill in Chancery in the name of the company, against the three directors who supported the validity of the poll to restrain the gentleman who had been declared elected from acting. A meeting of shareholders was subsequently held, at which resolutions were passed repudiating the Chancery proceedings.

Held, that the return of the poll was to be considered good until it was brought into question before a proper tribunal, in a proper manner; and that therefore the solicitor having accepted a retainer from persons not authorised to pledge the credit of the company, the bill must be taken off the file, and the costs paid by the solicitor.

This was a motion on the part of the defendants that the bill in the above suit might be taken off the file, having been filed without the authority of the nominal plaintiffs, the Wandsworth and Putney Gaslight and Coke Company; and that Edmund Kell Blyth, the solicitor by whom the bill was filed, might be ordered to pay to the defendants their costs of this suit and of the present application.

The bill in this suit stated that an annual general meeting was held on the 23rd February, 1870, for the purpose (among other things) of electing two directors in the room of Benjamin Wright and Charles Price, who retired by rotation from the direction, and who offered themselves, and were proposed for re-election. John Langton and Henry Palfrey Stephenson were also proposed to fill the office. A show of hands being called for, it was declared in favour of Langton and Stephenson. A poll was then demanded on the part of Wright and Price; Henry Kimber and Joseph Holland were appointed by the chairman, Mr. Symonds Howell, to be scrutineers of the votes. The poll having been taken, the scrutineers reported the number of votes to be as follows: Wright, 3021; Price, 2945; Langton, 2936; Stephenson, 2860. The chairman thereupon declared Messrs. Wright and Price to be duly elected, and the secretary entered the above result in the minutes.

At the first board meeting after the above meeting (Mr. Howell being absent), there were present Messrs. Wilkins, Clarke, Blake, and Wright and Mr. Blyth, the solicitor. Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Langton were also present. Soon after the meeting commenced business, Messrs. Blake and Wright withdrew from the meeting; whereupon those present passed resolutions ordering the minutes of the general meeting to be altered, by making it appear that the scrutineers had reported the numbers of votes in favour of Messrs. Langton and Stephenson, instead of Messrs. Price and Wright. They also passed resolutions authorising Mr. Blyth to take legal proceedings to restrain Mr. Wright from acting, (Mr. Price having meanwhile died); and they affixed the seal of the company to a retainer for that purpose.

At the next board meeting, Messrs. Wilkins and Clarke refused to attend, unless Messrs. Langton and Stephenson were allowed to sit in lieu of Messrs. Wright and Price; Mr. Wilkins refused to bring or send the key he had taken away; and Mr. Lass, the secretary, refused to give the chairman the office keys, so that the business of the company could not be carried on.

On the 8th March, 1870, Mr. Blyth filed the bill in Chancery in the name of the company against Messrs. Wright, Howell, and Blake, to contest Mr. Wright's election, and moved for an injunction to restrain him from acting. The defendants at once gave notice of motion to take the bill off the file, on the ground that it was filed without any authority on the part of the company. Both motions were argued on the 17th of March, 1870, when the Vice-Chancellor stated that there was sufficient ground for the counter motion to justify him in not refusing it, until the opinion of a general meeting of shareholders was ascertained, and he therefore did not grant the injunction.

A meeting of the shareholders was accordingly held on the 11th April 1870, when resolutions were passed by the shareholders disavowing the bill in Chancery, and requesting that it be taken off the file, confirming Mr. Wright's election, and the election by the directors of Mr. Robert Jones, C.E., in the place of Mr. Price, deceased, and removing Messrs. Wilkins and Clarke from the office of directors, and appointing Messrs. Ransome and Newsome in their stead. The result of the meeting was brought before the court by the directors, who gave the necessary notice to bring on again their motion to take the bill off the file.

Amphlett, Q. C. and E. Macnaghten appeared in support of the motion, and cited Moxley v. Alston, 1 Ph. 790.

Kay, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C. and Speed appeared for the nominal plaintiffs, and contended that, although Messrs. Langton and Stephenson were not nominally returned to act as directors at the general meeting held on the 28th of February they were de jure and de facto elected. For if the votes which were improperly received for Messrs. Wright and Price were deducted from the return, and those that were improperly rejected on behalf of Messrs. Langton and Stephenson were added to it, it would be found that Messrs. Langton and Stephenson were elected. This being so, they were de jure and de facto directors, and therefore the bill was properly filed, and the company are liable for the costs.

Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461.

Mr. Blyth was not personally represented.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply): I am of opinion that this motion must be granted as asked; the bill must be taken off the file, with costs to be paid by the solicitor. In one respect this bill is entirely new, because I do not recollect ever hearing of a bill in which this court was called upon to try a question of quo warranto upon a scrutiny of votes. In truth, the bill was framed with full notice of that difficulty, because it alleges a direct case of fraud against the scrutineers and the chairman. It is impossible to deny that is the substance of it; that the chairman appointed two partisans as scrutineers, and that the two scrutineers, by a conspiracy between themselves, wilfully falsified the return of the votes by inserting in the list bad votes on the one side, and by excluding good votes on the other. That is what it comes to, they well knowing that to be untrue. Then what appears is this: there was a meeting held, and at present, as far as I have heard the case, if I were sitting merely as scrutineer upon that election, I assume I should come to the conclusion that Langton and Stephenson had a majority of legal votes; that is to say, that I should come to the conclusion that the revocations were sufficient, and, beyond all question, proxies which had not been delivered within forty-eight hours were not admissible. However, what takes place? There was a meeting called, and I think I recollect sufficient of the affidavit brought before me on the former occasion to say this: that at that meeting Mr. Kimber, who seems to have been a legal friend of the chairman, was appointed chairman's scrutineer, the chairman being at the head of one of the parties, and the other person appointed scrutineer was appointed after an appeal to the meeting to name a scrutineer; and his affidavit of what took place at that meeting satisfies me that he went to that meeting without any bias either one way or the other, and had nothing whatever to induce him to act otherwise than impartially. There were those two scrutineers appointed by the meeting. Now, it is said that the Act of Parliament does not provide for scrutineers. The Act of Parliament does not provide for the minutiae of the election,—it simply says that the election is to be at a general meeting. It is like everything else at general meetings of shareholders, the details of the proceedings must be regulated by the persons present, and by the chairman; and if his decision is quarrelled with, it must be regulated by the majority of those present. Of course it must be presumed that they do it all honestly and fairly. The meeting being held—without any dissentient voice—as far as I can make out, the meeting agreed that there should be two scrutineers appointed; that was reasonable and proper. Accordingly, those two gentlemen I have mentioned were appointed for the purpose of taking the votes. The votes were taken by them. There is no entry on the minutes of the proceedings to show that particular persons voted, or what were the number of good votes, or what were the number of bad votes. That has been made out before me upon evidence on the motion. Well, then, that can only be made out on a proper scrutiny. All that appeared upon that which is the legal record of what took place at the meeting was, that the show of hands was in favour of Stephenson and Langton; that thereupon a poll was demanded; and that the chairman declared the poll open, and nominated as scrutineers Messrs. Kimber and Holland. A poll was thereupon taken, when the number of voters present, personally or by proxy, as ascertained by the scrutineers, was as follows—then the number is given. Then “the chairman declared Messrs. Wright and Price duly elected directors of the company.” That is all that took place; there is no dispute whatever in point of fact, that is to say, of the fact that the scrutineers made that return. Then, that being so, it appears to me that de facto, at all events, I must presume that was done at the meeting, and that the meeting did declare—that the chairman, in the name of the meeting, did declare—Wright and Price to be duly elected as directors; and that declaration, being entered on the minutes, appears to me to have exactly the same effect as the declaration of any other poll; that is to say, there is a return made; that return is good until it is brought into question before a proper tribunal in the proper manner,—and thereupon prima facie by that declaration Messrs. Wright and Price were elected at that meeting, subject, of course, to their election being brought in question afterwards. If that had really been done by way of fraud and conspiracy, which is alleged by the bill against the chairman and scrutineers, in all probability this court would have found its arm long enough, notwithstanding the decision of Mosley v. Alston and other cases, to have dealt with such fraud as that; but, in the absence of anything of that sort—and I am bound to say I am quite satisfied there was no fraud of any kind—in the absence of any mistake as to the admission of votes, or the mode in which the votes were taken, the matter would simply come to this: there is the return of the men who had the majority of votes. Well, then, that return is good until it is set aside. Then, how is it set aside? It is set aside by gentlemen who question the return. It appears to me the proceedings of the meeting of the directors on that point were the most extraordinary proceedings that I almost ever heard of. They were gentlemen who knew that they had not been returned as elected, who knew that the minutes of the meeting represented two other persons as being elected; they thereupon take their seats as directors, and, having done so, they proceed to determine that, as directors, they were duly elected. I am rather surprised that the other directors present allowed them to do that. It is quite clear that they ought to have waited until there was a meeting, or to have called a general meeting. I cannot admit a thing of this kind; that in this company a man may say that “although by a mistake on the part of the chairman or the scrutineers I was not elected as director, yet I will go and take my seat, and authorise a bill to be filed by the solicitor of the company, in the name of the company, for the purpose of asserting my right.” That cannot be right. The truth is, there is always a mode of setting things in order in these companies. You can always call a general meeting if there is anything wrong; and, after all, it is the general body alone that this court has to regard. This court does not regard the office of director as a thing with respect to which a man has a vested right to say, “I was elected to the office, and I have a right to hold it.” The office of director is nothing more than that of manager of a company. The company has full power to deal with its directors, to appoint them, to dismiss them, or to re-elect them; and if any dispute arises as to the propriety of the election of a director, the simple course is to call another general meeting, and to get the whole thing set right. I am of opinion that the way in which those two gentlemen (Langton and Stephenson) have acted is certainly without any colour of right in taking their seats at the board before there was any declaration or return of their election; and the solicitor is the person who seems to have advised the proceedings, and accepted a retainer of those gentlemen who were not directors, and were not authorised in any way to pledge the credit of the company. In accepting that originally, he accepted it at the peril of its being avowed or disavowed by a general meeting of the shareholders. A general meeting of the shareholders has disavowed the proceedings, and desired that the bill should be taken off the file, as being not in accordance with the general views of the company. I therefore accede to that application, and order the bill to be taken off the file, and the costs to be paid by the solicitor.

Re HANNAH PACKER.

Acknowledgment by a married woman — Affidavit verifying certificate—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74 — Regulee Generales, Hilary Term, 4 Will. 4.

A married woman, since deceased, duly acknowledged an indenture according to the provisions of the 85th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and a certificate was duly signed by two commissioners, since deceased, who received the acknowledgment, but it was discovered twelve years afterwards that no affidavit of verification had been made at the time, and that the certificate had not been filed.

Upon the production of affidavits by the husband and a practising attorney, the latter of which contained all that was required by the Act itself, but the further matters required by the rules of Hilary Term, 4 Will. 4, were certified by the husband only, all other parties who had knowledge of them being dead, the court allowed the certificate to be filed.

This was an application for leave to file the certificate of acknowledgment of Mrs. Packer, a married woman, now deceased, to an indenture, made the 19th Oct. 1857. The acknowledgment and certificate were duly made, but, by accident, were not filed. No affidavit, as required by the rules of court, had been made at the time, and literal compliance with the rules could not now be performed in consequence of the deaths of the necessary deponents.

It appeared from the affidavit of Elijah Packer, gentleman, the husband of the said married woman, that the parties to the said indenture of the 19th Oct. 1857, were one William Tier (since deceased), himself Elijah Packer, and Hannah his wife (since deceased), of the first part; Elizabeth Tier, widow (since deceased), of the second part; and Mary Padwick, spinster, of the third part. On the day of the date of the indenture it was executed by the said Elijah Packer and William Tier in the presence of each other and one Daniel Smart, solicitor (since deceased), the attesting witness.

This affidavit proceeded as follows:

On the 20th of the same month (Oct. 1857) my said wife Hannah and I attended by appointment at the dwelling-house of William Foster, of Emsworth, and there and then the said indenture was acknowledged by my said wife Hannah before the said Daniel Smart and Charles Beare Longcroft, then of Havant in the said county of Southampton, gentleman (since deceased), two of the perpetual commissioners appointed for the county of Hants for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, pursuant to 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, I being present all the time except during the interval when at the request of the said commissioners I left the room in order to allow of my said wife Hannah being separately examined by the said commissioners apart from me: and that after the said examination had been made I was readmitted to the said room, and was informed by the said commissioners that my said wife had been examined whilst apart from me touching her knowledge of the contents of the said deed, and that she had fully and voluntarily consented unto the same. And I further say that before again leaving the presence of the said commissioners I saw their respective signatures to the said memorandum of acknowledgment and certificate respectively written at the foot of the said memorandum of acknowledgment and at the foot of the said certificate respectively.

That at the time of making such acknowledgment my said wife Hannah was of full age and competent understanding, and knew the said acknowledgment was intended to pass her estate in the premises respecting which such acknowledgment was made for the purpose of securing by way of mortgage to the said Mary Padwick the sum of 700*l.* and interest, and subject thereto, for enabling her to dispose of her estate and interest in the said premises to such uses and in such manner as she, notwithstanding her then present or any future coverture, should at any time, or from time to time, by any deed or deeds, or by will or codicil appoint, and that the said indenture contained an express declaration that the direction for the reconveyance of her moiety or interest in the same premises, in the proviso for redemption therein contained, to such uses as aforesaid, was intended to enable her to dispose of the same moiety as if she was sole and unmarried, but without prejudice to the security thereby made; and that the premises comprised in the said indenture were certain freehold hereditaments situate at Emsworth aforesaid, and fully described in the first part of the schedule to the said indenture, and as being then in the occupation of the said William Foster, and certain copyhold hereditaments also situate at Emsworth aforesaid, fully described in the second part of the said schedule, and as being then in the occupation of the said William Foster.

That the said Daniel Smart prepared the said indenture, and was solely concerned for all parties thereto, and after the acknowledgment thereof by my said wife Hannah, the said indenture and the certificate of the acknowledgment thereof, were taken charge of by the said Daniel Smart for the purpose of completing the said acknowledgment.

That the said Charles Beare Longcroft, one of the said commissioners, was not in any manner interested in the transaction giving occasion for such acknowledgment, or concerned therein as attorney, solicitor, or agent, or as clerk to any attorney, solicitor, or agent so interested or concerned.

That I know and was well acquainted with the said Charles Beare Longcroft for many years prior to his death, and am well acquainted with his handwriting, and I say that the signature "C. B. Longcroft," subscribed at the foot of the memorandum of the acknowledgment of the said indenture, is of the proper handwriting of the said Charles Beare Longcroft; and that the signature "C. B. Longcroft" subscribed at the foot of the certificate of acknowledgment of the said indenture by my said wife Hannah is of the proper handwriting of the said Charles Beare Longcroft.

That I knew and was well acquainted with the said Daniel Smart for many years prior to his death, and am well acquainted with his handwriting, and I say that the signature "Daniel Smart," subscribed at the foot of the memorandum of acknowledgment of the said indenture, is of the proper handwriting of the said Daniel Smart, and that the signature "Daniel Smart" subscribed at the foot of the certificate of acknowledgment of the said indenture by my said wife Hannah, is of the proper handwriting of the said Daniel Smart. And I further say that the signature "Daniel Smart," indorsed on the said indenture as the witness attesting the execution of the same indenture by the said William Tier, me, the said Elijah Packer, and my said wife Hannah, and the said Elizabeth Tier respectively, is of the proper handwriting of the said Daniel Smart.

That my said wife Hannah afterwards by her will, bearing date the 1st Oct. 1858, in exercise and execution of the authority given to her by the said indenture, appointed that from and after her decease all that her undivided moiety of all that and those the piece or parcel of land and hereditaments situate at Emsworth aforesaid, specified in the first schedule to the said indenture, and subject to the same indenture, and also all other her real estate whatsoever and wheresoever, should be and remain to the use of me her said husband, my heirs and assigns for ever. And by the said will she also gave, devised, and bequeathed all that the estate and interest in a certain copyhold estate situate at Emsworth aforesaid, specified in the second schedule to the said indenture, subject as therein mentioned unto me her said husband, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely.

That my said wife Hannah died on or about the 16th Oct. 1858.

That the said William Tier, one of the parties to the said indenture died on or about the 25th March, 1860.

That the said Elizabeth Tier, another of the parties to the said indenture died on or about the 13th Nov. 1860.

That the said Charles Beare Longcroft died on or about the 6th May 1859.

That the said Daniel Smart died on or about the 5th July 1859.

That the sum of 700*l.* intended to be secured to the said

Mary Padwick by the said indenture together with an arrear of interest is still due and owing on the said security.

That I have contracted for the conveyance of the equity of redemption of and in the moiety of the said freehold and copyhold hereditaments comprised in the said indenture and by the said will of my said wife, devised to me my heirs and assigns as aforesaid to the said William Foster, and that I was not aware until informed of the fact on or about the 17th March last by Mr. James Stening of Portsea, and Emsworth, my present solicitor, that the said certificate had not been filed in this honourable court, and that no affidavit in verification of the certificate by either of the said commissioners could be found.

That I am now required by the parties interested in the said sum of 700*l.* secured by the said indenture to perfect the said acknowledgment, and the perfecting thereof is also necessary in order to enable me to complete my contract for the conveyance of the said moiety of the said freehold and copyhold hereditaments to the said William Foster.

There was also produced an affidavit of James Stening, an attorney and solicitor practising at Portsea and Emsworth, who had succeeded to the practice of the said Daniel Smart. In this affidavit he deposed that he knew and was well acquainted with the said Daniel Smart, Charles Beare Longcroft, Wm. Tier, and Elijah Packer, and with the handwriting of all of them; that every signature of each of them on all the documents alluded to was in the proper handwriting of each respectively. The affidavit also contained the following:

That I knew and was well acquainted with Hannah, the wife of the said Elijah Packer for thirty years prior to her death in the year 1858, and that at the date of the execution of the said indenture the said Hannah Packer was of full age, that is to say, of the age of fifty years or thereabouts, and of competent understanding.

That at the request of the said Elijah Packer I have caused diligent search to be made amongst the documents and papers of the late Daniel Smart which came into my custody after his decease, and the said certificate of acknowledgment was found on or about the 5th March last in one of the deed boxes formerly of the said Daniel Smart, and that diligent search has since been made for an affidavit in verification of the said certificate, but none has been found nor any draft thereof, and I verily believe that no such affidavit is to be found.

Certificates of death of all the deceased persons mentioned in these affidavits were also produced; the certificate and memorandum of acknowledgment were both duly drawn up.

Sect. 85 of the Fines and Recoveries Act 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74) provides:

That every such certificate as aforesaid of the taking of an acknowledgment by a married woman of any such deed as aforesaid, together with an affidavit by some person verifying the same, and the signature thereof by the party by whom the same shall purport to be signed, shall be lodged with some officer of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, to be appointed as hereinafter mentioned; and such officer shall examine the certificate, and see that it is duly signed, either by some judge or master in Chancery, or by two commissioners appointed pursuant to this Act, and duly verified by affidavit as aforesaid, and shall also see that it contains such statement of particulars as to the consent of the married woman as shall from time to time be required in that behalf; and if all the requisites in this Act in regard to the certificate shall have been complied with, then such officer shall cause the said certificate, and the affidavit to be filed of record in the said Court of Common Pleas.

Sect. 89 requires the Court of Common Pleas from time to time to make such order and regulations as the court shall think fit, touching the various matters dealt with by the Act.

By No. 4 of Regule Generales, Hilary Term, 4 Will 4, it is ordered that:

The affidavit verifying the certificate to be made pursuant to the said Act, and which certificate shall be in the form contained in the said Act, shall be made by some practising attorney or solicitor of one of the courts at Westminster, or of one of the counties palatine of Lancaster or Durham, and that in all cases it shall be deposed in addition to the verification of the said certificate, that the deponent knew the person or persons making such acknowledgment. And that at the time of making such acknowledgment, the person or persons making the same was or were of full age and competent understanding; and that one at least of the commissioners taking such acknowledgments, to the best of his (deponent's) knowledge or belief, is not in any manner interested in the transaction giving occasion for the taking of such acknowledgment, or concerned therein as attorney, solicitor, or agent, or as clerk to any attorney, solicitor, or agent so interested or concerned; and that the names and residences of the said commissioners, and also the place or places where such acknowledgment or acknowledgments shall be taken, shall be set forth in such affidavit. And that previously to such acknowledgment being taken, the deponent had inquired of such married woman whether she intended to give up her interest in the estate to be passed, and also the answer given thereto; and where any such married woman in answer to such inquiry shall declare that she intends to give up her interest without any provision, the deponent shall state that he has no reason to doubt the truth of such declaration, and he verily believes the same to be true. And where any provision has been agreed to be made, the deponent shall state that the same has been made by deed or writing, or if not actually made before, that the terms of the intended provision have been reduced into writing, which deed or writing he verily believes has been produced to the said judge [master, or commissioners.]

By a subsequent rule of Trinity Term in the same year, it was ordered that

Where such parts of the affidavit verifying the certificate of acknowledgment, taken in pursuance of the late Act of Parliament respecting fines and recoveries, as state the deponent's knowledge of the party making the acknowledgment, and her being of full age cannot be deposed to by a commissioner, or by an attorney or solicitor, the same may be deposed to by some other person, whom the person before whom the affidavit shall be made shall consider competent so to do.

F. M. White submitted that upon the affidavits produced all the requirements of the statute were carried out, and it appeared also from these affidavits that no other evidence but that of the husband was procurable of the matters of which the rules required verification. In the case of Ex parte Stevens, 3 Hodges 13, the court allowed a certificate and affidavit to be filed two years after the acknowledgment.

BOVILL, C. J.—The affidavits, I think, show a sufficient compliance with the terms of the Act of Parliament, and the order asked for should be granted. The certificate is in proper form, and the signatures of both the commissioners are verified by the affidavit of a practising attorney; it appears also by that affidavit that the attorney knew the person making the acknowledgment, and he deposes that she was at the time of full age and competent understanding. But as to the other matters required by the rule, the husband is the only person who is able to state that one of the commissioners was disinterested, or that his wife intended to give up her interest; he, however, does this satisfactorily, and describes a conversation with the commissioners on the subject immediately after the acknowledgment was made. This was a substantial compliance so far as the Act is concerned with what is required to render an acknowledgment valid. It is certainly not a literal compliance with what is required by the general rules, nor is it in accordance with the usual practice. The practice, however, has not been unbroken, and the case referred to shows that the rules have not been always strictly complied with; and in this case I do not doubt the propriety of transgressing them again.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, although I have formed it with some hesitation. It is clear from the affidavits that we have the best evidence procurable of what was said at the time, and I think it is not likely that such a conversation would have been stated unless it really took place. It may be said that the application was out of the usual time, but the answer to that is, before this such an objection has been held to be not insuperable. In granting the order asked for, we shall, I think, be acting in accordance with the manifest truth and justice of the case.

BRETT, J.—I also have some difficulty in agreeing to grant this application, because it is clear that the rule of court has not been complied with; unless the circumstances of a case are most exceptional, we ought certainly to insist upon compliance with the rules; but the statute does not say that the rules are to be treated as part of the enactments; and they are therefore mere rules of practice for the convenience of the officers of the court; and although the court should insist upon their being carried out when it is possible to do so, and except under peculiar circumstances, yet I think that no affidavits can be produced which would show facts creating a better justification for our making the order.

Application granted.

EVERARD v. KENDALL.

County Courts—Admiralty jurisdiction—Ship—Vessel—Dumb-barge—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

A dumb-barge, being a vessel propelled by oars only, is not a "vessel" within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), or a "ship" within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4; so that where there is a collision between two dumb-barges no County Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in the matter.

The County Courts do not take a new and original Admiralty jurisdiction under the Acts 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, but merely a portion of that jurisdiction which was formerly enjoyed exclusively by the High Court of Admiralty.

This was an application for a prohibition against the judge of the City of London Court exercising the Admiralty jurisdiction of the court in a case where the defendant's dumb-barge had "sat on the head" of the plaintiff's dumb barge.

Lanyon, for the defendant.—This question turns on the construction to be put upon the 4th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, gives to certain County Courts, to be appointed by Her Majesty for the purpose, a limited Admiralty jurisdiction in certain cases. The City of London Court is one of the courts so appointed. One of these cases is "as to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision," where the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* The statute of 1868 throughout uses the word "vessel," and "vessel" is defined in the general orders made in pursuance of the Act as "every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars only." The City of London Court, then, has no jurisdiction in this case under the statute of 1868, as a dumb-barge is not a vessel within the meaning of the Act. The 3rd section of the Act of 1868 is amended by the 4th section of the Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), so as to "extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* The question then arises whether the word "ship" used in this section has a more extensive meaning than the word "vessel" used in the Act of 1868, so as to include a dumb-barge. It is submitted that the word "ship" used in the one Act means precisely the same as the word "vessel" in the other; and, if that is disputed, then, as the Acts in question transfer a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty to the County Courts, we must look to the doctrines and practice of that court for the meaning of the word "ship." Tried by that test, "ship" means a vessel used in navigation propelled otherwise than by oars, and does not include a dumb-barge.

The Bilbao, 1 Lush. 149; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338;

Day showed cause in the first instance. The County Courts take an original Admiralty jurisdiction under sects. 2 and 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and not a jurisdiction delegated from the Admiralty Courts. What has been said as to the doctrines and jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty has therefore no application to the present case. Under this statute, the County Courts may take cognisance of matters over which the High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction. [KEATING, J.—What say you, then, to the 7th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, which provides that, where it appears that the claim exceeds the prescribed amount, the County Court judge shall transfer the case to the Court of Admiralty? How could that be done, if it were one of these matters, in which the latter court has no jurisdiction.] A jurisdiction in the case is impliedly given by the section to the High Court of Admiralty. The matter then stands thus: the Act of 1869 was never meant to limit that of 1868, and the latter gives the County Court jurisdiction in this case. With regard to the definition of the word "vessel" contained in the general order, the orders in question are of no binding force in this case, as they were made in pursuance of sects. 35 and 36 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and those sections do not give the Lord Chancellor and the judge of the High Court of Admiralty any power to define the words used in the Act, or to restrict the jurisdiction given under the Act.

KEATING, J.—Cause has been shown in the first instance against an application for a prohibition, with a view to deciding a question arising on the construction of the Acts of Parliament, which transfer a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty to the County Courts. It appears that a collision has taken place between two barges in the Thames. These barges are confessedly boats that are propelled by oars only, and the question is how far the County Courts have admiralty jurisdiction in such a case. I think that the Acts cannot be said to have invested them with such a jurisdiction. I do not know whether it was the intention of the Legislature to give it; at any rate, we must take the Acts as we find them in deciding the question how far the language of the Acts invests the County Courts with the jurisdiction claimed for them. Looking at the Acts of 1868 and 1869, I cannot assent to the extremely ingenious argument of Mr. Day, that it was the intention of the Legislature to create in the County Courts a new and original admiralty jurisdiction in cases of collision. On the contrary, it appears to me that the Legislature has given the County Courts no jurisdiction in such cases, except where the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction. Now, it is admitted that the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction in the case of vessels like these, and there is, to my thinking, nothing in the Acts of Parliament to give the County Courts jurisdiction in cases where the Court of Admiralty would not have it. Sect. 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, provides that any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have power to try and determine certain causes, enumerated in the four sub-sections appended to the clause. It is suggested by Mr. Day that the causes here mentioned are not such as, but for this Act, would be termed "Admiralty causes," but that for the purposes of this Act, they are to be considered Admiralty causes, and, but for the Act, would not go by that name. I would not say that the argument is wholly destitute of foundation; but, looking at the whole of the Act, I cannot assent to it. It appears to me that the 7th section of the Act is wholly inconsistent with such an interpretation. There it is clearly provided that where during the progress of an admiralty cause in a County Court it appears that the subject matter exceeds the limit in respect of amount, the County Court judge shall remit the case to the Court of Admiralty. If that is so, it goes far to show that the Legislature intended by these Acts simply to transfer a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty to the County Courts. It may possibly be that if a cause, which could not be commenced in the Court of Admiralty, is remitted to that court under the 7th section, the section would impliedly give the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction. But that is a strained construction of the Act, and argues a clumsiness in the wording of the Act of Parliament which we ought not to attribute to it. Looking at the other provisions of the Acts, it seems to me clear that Mr. Day's argument cannot be supported. They may confer a jurisdiction over some matters, over which the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction, but it appears to me clear that they did not intend to enlarge the jurisdiction of the County Courts as to cases of collision. It is remarkable that the definition of the word "ship" given by any of the Acts relating to the Court of Admiralty excludes a dumb-barge, and there is no definition of the word in any Act which could include it. As then, at the time of the passing of the Acts of 1868 and 1869, the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the case of a collision between dumb-barges, and the Legislature, by Acts passed in those years, transferred a portion of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in cases of collision to the County Courts; if the Legislature had intended to give to the latter courts a more extended jurisdiction than that enjoyed by the Court of Admiralty, so as to enable them to entertain a question like the present, we should expect to find a clear expression of that intention in the Act. We find no such expression, and must, therefore, hold that no such jurisdiction was given. That it was not given may be a casus omissus; still, that does not alter the question. It is not necessary, in the view I take of the case, to decide how far the general rules framed under the Act of 1868 are of binding authority. My judgment is entirely independent of their efficacy, and is founded on a general view of the Acts.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jurisdiction claimed on behalf of the County Courts depends upon two statutes, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. The former Act provides that the Queen in Council may appoint certain County Courts to have Admiralty jurisdiction, and assign to the courts so appointed a certain district. I think that that is confined to Admiralty jurisdiction. The 3rd clause provides that certain specified causes shall be tried by the County Courts to whom such jurisdiction shall have been assigned. The object of that clause is to select certain portions of admiralty jurisdiction which are fit to be transferred to the County Courts. The causes to be transferred are enumerated in the four sub-sections appended to the clause. What is the meaning of the words "damage by collision or otherwise?" In considering that question, there is nothing to guide us but a general view of the Act. As far as the subject-matter of the Act is concerned, the words mean damage by collision by ships. What then, at the time of the passing of this Act, was a "ship" as understood in the High Court of Admiralty, and as defined in the statutes relating to that court? It is considered that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is confined to vessels propelled otherwise than by oars. I can see no intention on the part of the Legislature to alter the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty by any definition of the word "ship." In 24 Vict. c. 10, the word "ship" is defined, and the definition limits its meaning in the way I have mentioned. In 1868, both according to its original jurisdiction and under 24 Vict. c. 10, the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction over ships propelled solely by oars. The same state of things prevailed in 1869. The 4th clause of the Act of 1869 does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the County Courts, so as to make it embrace dumb-barges. The object of the clause was to extend the jurisdiction of those courts, so as to include a claim for damages arising from a collision between ships. The Legislature could have had no object in saying "to ships," except that, without those words, the language of the Act would have been too general, and, by using those words, it confined the jurisdiction of the courts to the subject to which the jurisdiction was meant to extend. It seems to me that the words "by ships" employed in this section were used to limit the jurisdiction to ships as defined in the Admiralty Court Act, and known in that court by that name. These are the only statutes on which reliance can be placed, and on a general view of them I am of opinion that the word "ship," as used in this section, does not include a dumb-barge. I agree with my brother Keating that it is not necessary for us, for the purposes of this decision, to give a binding force to the general orders of 1868, though, to say the least of them, they are strong indications of what, in the opinion of two very high authorities, was the interpretation to be put upon the Act.

BRETT, J.—In this case, as I understand it, there was a collision between two barges, in other words, damage done by a barge to a barge, and that damage was done not within the district over which the ordinary jurisdiction of the City of London Court extends. But the barge that was the cause of the injury coming within that district, was seized by the judge of that court, who claimed jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the case under the 4th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. The 3rd section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 gives to certain County Courts, to be nominated by the Queen in Council, the powers of a Court of Admiralty—to institute proceedings in rem. The question for us now to decide is, whether the 4th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51 gives that power to the judge of the City of London in the present case. It is suggested that it does, for that, whereas the Act of 1868 applied only to some vessels, the Act of 1869 applies to all cases of collision by ships, and consequently includes a collision between barges. That depends on the construction to be put on the word "ship," as used in the Act of 1869. As by those Acts Admiralty jurisdiction is given to the County Courts, we must see what is the meaning of the word "ship" in the Court of Admiralty. Now it is clear that in that court the word "ship" would not include a dumb-barge. I should be inclined to think that it was not the intention of the Legislature to enlarge the jurisdiction of the County Courts in cases of collision as to the kind of vessels with which the courts have power to deal, but simply to enlarge their jurisdiction by giving them power to institute proceedings in rem. Then, as to the Act of 1868, hope it is not necessary to determine whether that Act gave to the County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction at all. I think it did not. The foundation of all Admiralty jurisdiction is the power to commence proceedings by seizure, and that power I do not think the Legislature intended to give. The 3rd section of the Act transferred to the County Courts, to be tried in a particular way, certain classes of cases which before were triable in the Court of Admiralty. Amongst these we find specified (subsect. 3), "Any claim for damage cargo or damage by collision." This evidently means damage done on the water; and sects. 21 and 22 show that it is damage done by "vessels." There is nothing to show that those sections applied to any other vessels than those of which up to that time the Court of Admiralty took cognisance. What were they? The Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction in all cases of collision by ships. What vessels does that word include? Only those that are propelled otherwise than by oars. The statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, gave to the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction in the case of any damage done by a ship or sea-going vessel. The case of The Bilbao, L. T. Rep. N. S. 338, decided that that meant vessels not propelled by oars. That being so, the Act of 1868 must be understood as relating to collisions by or to vessels not propelled by oars. If that is the meaning of the Act of 1868 it is also the meaning of that of 1869. It cannot possibly be said that, because the word "vessel" is employed in the Act of 1868, and the word "ship" in that of 1869, the latter statute applies to collisions between vessels not contemplated in the former Act, and not recognised as ships by the Court of Admiralty under either its original jurisdiction or that conferred by statutes. I come, then, to the conclusion that the collision in the present instance was not between "ships" within the meaning of the Act of 1869, and therefore that the City of London Court has no jurisdiction in this case; and no County Court has jurisdiction in such a case as this, unless the collision took place within its ordinary jurisdiction.

SINCLAIR v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

SINCLAIR v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Payment of money into court—Satisfaction of judgment—Abuse of legal process.

Upon an arbitration a large sum was awarded as damages to the plaintiff; judgment for the amount was signed on the 9th Sept.; and on the same day a summons was taken out by the defendants for the purpose of questioning the validity of the award; on the 26th Oct. an order was made by a judge at chambers that proceedings should be stayed until the 5th day of the next term, "defendants bringing into court by Thursday the amount of the award." This amount was accordingly brought into court, and at the beginning of the next term a rule moved by the defendants to set aside the award was refused. Various disputes took place about taxation of costs and the regularity of the judgment, but no obstacle was placed by the defendants in the way of plaintiff's taking the money out of court, and on the 2nd Dec. they wrote to him saying that the money remained there at his peril. On the 1st Feb. following, defendants obtained an order under which this money was paid over to the plaintiff:

Held, that although perhaps the judgment could not be said to have been satisfied by the payment of this money into court, according to the terms of sect. 17 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, yet the court would not permit such an abuse of its process as to make the defendants under the circumstances pay interest beyond the 9th Nov., the day on which the plaintiff might have obtained the money himself.

This case has been previously reported upon another point: (21 L. T. Rep. 752.)

A rule nisi had been obtained on the defendants' behalf, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why all proceedings in the action should not be stayed, and why satisfaction of judgment should not be entered on payment or tender of costs of so doing by the defendants.

It appeared from the affidavit of the defendants' attorney, upon which the rule was moved, as follows:—

The action was brought to recover the sum of 47,304l. 13s. 1d., alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff on a balance of accounts delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants.

The action came on for hearing before Bovill, C. J., at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, on the 23rd Feb. 1869, whereupon a verdict by consent was taken for the plaintiff subject to the award of Thomas James Clark, Esq., one of Her Majesty's counsel.

The arbitrator commenced his sittings on the 5th April, and the arbitration occupied many days.

The arbitrator made his award on the 31st Aug. 1869, finding for the plaintiff on all the issues joined, and awarding to him damages amounting to 28,850l.

On the 9th Sept. 1869, under the advice of counsel, I took out a summons to show cause why proceedings should not be stayed to enable defendants within the first four days of the succeeding Michaelmas Term to move to set aside the said award on certain grounds specified in such summons.

The said summons was returnable on the 10th Sept., and I attended the same with counsel. A clerk of the plaintiff's attorneys attended, and requested that the summons might be adjourned, and I consented to such adjournment.

After several further adjournments for the convenience of either side, it being the Long Vacation, the summons was heard on the 26th Oct. 1869, and the following order was made by the late Mr. Justice Hayes:

"Upon hearing counsel on both sides I do order that all proceedings in this action and in the award be stayed until the fifth day of next term, defendants bringing into court by Thursday the amount of the award; costs to abide the event of proceedings in court on motion. I certify for counsel.—Dated the 26th Oct. 1869."

On Thursday, the 28th Oct. 1869, the amount of the award, 28,850l., was accordingly paid into court by the defendants.

The court was moved by Mr. Keane, Q.C., on behalf of the defendants, on the 8th Nov. last—the case having been put into the reserved list—for a rule nisi to show cause why the award should not be set aside or remitted back to the arbitrator; but the rule was refused.

The plaintiff's attorneys, by their clerk, attended the hearing of the said application, and made a charge for such attendance in their bill of costs.

The bill of costs of the plaintiff's attorney was delivered to me for taxation on the 18th Nov. last, and the same was shortly afterwards taxed; and an allocatur was taken on the 23rd Dec. last for 934l. 15s. 10d.

On the 14th Jan. 1870 plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for the master to review his taxation upon three grounds—

1. Allowance of only one counsel;
2. Disallowance of the costs of Queen's counsel;
3. Reduction of the arbitrator's fees.

Cause was shown against this rule by Mr. Keane, Q.C., on behalf of the defendants, the 26th Jan. last.

The rule was discharged as to the arbitrator's fees, but was made absolute as to two counsel being allowed. The master appointed the 29th Jan. to review his taxation pursuant to the rule, and the matter was accordingly gone into and disposed of on that day.

The said sum of 28,850l. was paid into court, to await the issue of the application for a rule to send the award back to the arbitrator; and, on such application being refused, the money remained in court, as I believe, at the disposal of the plaintiff.

On the 2nd Dec. 1869 it came to my knowledge that the plaintiff had not taken the money out of court. I then informed plaintiff's attorneys that the money lay there at the risk of their client, and that the defendants would refuse to pay interest after the date of the disposition of the application for the said rule, but they were ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part to enable plaintiff to take the money out of court.

On the 1st Feb. last an order was made by Master Kaye directing the plaintiff to take out of court the said sum of 28,850l. pro tanto; and, in pursuance of such order, the plaintiff took the said sum out of court.

On the same day the plaintiff's attorneys applied to the defendants for payment of 1672l. 8s. 9d., being, as they alleged, the balance due to the plaintiff, in addition to the money taken out of court. This balance included the amount of plaintiff's costs and 480*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* for interest from the 9th Sept. 1869 to the 2nd Feb. 1870, upon the sum of 30,041*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, stated to be the amount of the judgment.

The defendants were willing to pay interest upon the sum paid into court from the day when judgment was signed, namely, the 9th Sept. 1869, to the day when the rule they applied for was refused, namely, the 8th Nov. 1869, and also interest upon the taxed costs from the said 9th Sept. 1869, to 2nd Feb. 1870; the amount of such interest was 211*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, but they declined to pay the remaining 268*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, being the amount of interest claimed from the 8th Nov., last mentioned, to the 2nd Feb. 1870, in respect of the amount paid into court.

Accordingly, on the said 2nd Feb., they took out a summons calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why further proceedings should not be stayed on payment of the sum of 1403*l.* 14*s.* in satisfaction of the balance of judgment, debt, and interest. This sum was the balance claimed by the plaintiff less the 268*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* mentioned in the last paragraph.

On the 5th Feb. 1870, the said summons was heard before Mr. Justice Willes, and the following order was made:—

"Upon hearing the attorneys or agents for plaintiff, and counsel for defendants, I do order that upon payment of 1403*l.* 14*s.*, all further proceedings herein shall be stayed until the 5th day of next term.—Counsel."

This sum of 1403*l.* 14*s.* was on the day of the date of the said order paid to the plaintiff's attorneys, and a receipt for the same was endorsed upon the order by the plaintiff's attorneys.

It appeared from the affidavit of one of plaintiff's attorneys in answer, as follows:

Judgment was signed in this action on the 9th Sept. 1869 for the sum of 28,850*l.* debt, and costs which were to be taxed. The plaintiff's attorneys' bill of costs was delivered to the defendant's attorney on the 18th Nov. last. There were five meetings before the master to tax the said bill of costs, and I, during such taxation before the said master, on several occasions remarked to the defendant's attorney that the adjournments were matter rather for the consideration of the defendants than for the plaintiff, inasmuch as the judgment was carrying interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, which would exceed the costs of the witnesses, with respect to whom the defendant's attorney was raising objections.

The said taxing master gave his allocatur for costs on the 23rd Dec. last, and the plaintiff's attorneys on the same day served a summons to review the taxation of the plaintiff's costs, which summons was from time to time adjourned, and was ultimately dismissed on the 6th Jan. last.

Upon the hearing of the said summons I applied to the learned judge who heard the summons to order that the sum of 28,850*l.* in court should be paid out of court to the plaintiff, but the judge refused to make any such order on the ground that the summons did not contain any notice of application for such order.

On the 1st Jan. last the defendant's attorney sent to the plaintiff's attorneys a cheque for 934*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, the amount at which the plaintiff's attorneys costs had at that time been taxed.

This cheque was returned the same day to the defendant's attorney, inclosed in a letter from the plaintiff's attorneys, in which they said, "the judgment is for 29,784*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, and we are prepared to receive that sum with interest at 4 per cent. from the 9th Sept. last, the day on which the judgment was signed. As you are aware, however, we have applied to review the taxation of costs, and we can only receive payment without prejudice to that application."

In answer to that letter, the defendant's attorney wrote on the 4th Jan.:

I know of no judgment properly signed in this case; what your clerk did on the 9th Sept. was irregular, and he was told at the time, as on subsequent occasions, that it was a nullity. You are aware that the amount of the award (28,850*l.*) paid to the court under the order of the judge, has been at the disposal of your client since the 9th Nov. last, the day following that on which the motion allowed by the judge to be made was disposed of. It is of course of no importance to the company how long your client chooses to remain out of his money (as I presume from your note he has hitherto elected to do), but it has been explained to your representative on many occasions during the last six weeks or two months that the company repudiated all liability to interest and would not pay it.

The plaintiff's attorneys replied to the last-mentioned letter as follows, on the 5th Jan.:—

We are this morning in receipt of your letter of yesterday's date. We think you have written under a complete misapprehension. You will recollect that at the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to a reference, and that the arbitrator had power to direct the amount for which the verdict was to stand. This he did by his award. The judgment signed by us on the 9th Sept. was perfectly regular, and now stands. You have long known of the judgment. If you had any ground for doing so, you should have promptly applied to set it aside. As to the amount paid into court by way of security, you are wholly mistaken in supposing that it has been at the disposal of our client since the 9th Nov. last. It is not now at his disposal, and cannot be obtained by him. To avoid any possible misunderstanding, we beg to inform you that we shall insist upon the validity of the judgment, and upon payment of the amount with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the judgment. If your clients are not prepared to pay this amount so soon as the question as to the taxation is settled, we are instructed to issue execution, and we shall do so.

Various letters to the same effect passed between the attorneys of the parties, and on the 14th Jan. a summons, taken out on the defendant's behalf to set aside the judgment on the ground that the same had been irregularly signed, was heard before Mr. Justice Willes, and dismissed with costs.

On the same day, the 14th Jan., this court granted a rule nisi, on the plaintiff's application, to review the taxation of the plaintiff's attorneys' costs. The said rule was made absolute on the 26th Jan., and the taxation of costs was finally completed on the 1st Feb. last.

In the interval more letters passed between the attorneys, in which the defendants suggested that the plaintiff should take the money out of court pro tanto, without prejudice, and the plaintiff expressed willingness to accept that sum directly from the defendants, stating at the same time that the money in court was merely a collateral security for the payment in full by the defendants.

On the 1st Feb. a claim was made by the plaintiff's attorneys as follows:

The amount of the judgment in this case is ... £30,041 15 10
Interest upon it from 9th Sept. to 2nd Feb. ... 480 12 11

30,522 8 9
Amount in court to be received 2nd Feb. 28,850 0 0
£1672 8 9

for which we shall be glad to receive a cheque in the course of to-morrow.

The order made by Willes, J. referred to in the affidavit for defendants was made on the application of the defendant's attorney, and he might at any time previously have made the same application.

In pursuance of that order, the rule nisi above mentioned had been obtained by the defendants, and now came on to be argued.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C., and Watkin Williams, for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule. By sect. 17 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, "every judgment-debt shall carry interest at the rate of 4*l.* per centum per annum, from the time of entering up the judgment . . . until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment." The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to interest up to the day upon which the judgment was satisfied. Merely bringing money into court as collateral security to abide the issue of a motion cannot be said to have been satisfaction of this judgment. There was no duty upon the plaintiff's part to take the money out of court; but it devolved upon the defendants to pay to the plaintiff, as they eventually did, the amount of the judgment against them. The only question for this court is whether the judgment was satisfied before the 2nd Feb. [BOVILL, C. J.—Not exactly. We have to see there was no abuse of the process of the Court. M. SMITH, J.—Surely substantially there was satisfaction of the judgment when the money was paid into court?] The plaintiff demands his legal rights, and he says his misconduct has not been such as to make him suffer as a penalty the loss of this interest. At all events the defendants were in the wrong as much as the plaintiff, and, by the law, a debtor is bound to take every step to discharge his debt.

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C. and Marriott, for the defendants, supported the rule.—After the payment of the money into court the defendants could not possibly make any profit out of it, whilst the plaintiff might at any time have taken it out and invested it at a higher interest than that which he now claims from the defendants. The plaintiff's attorneys said in effect throughout the correspondence, We will complete the taxation at our leisure, and when we receive the final allocatur we will issue execution for the whole debt and costs and the interest upon both. It was held by the Court of Exchequer in Hews v. Pyke, 1 Dowl. 322, that if money be deposited in court in lieu of bail above, pursuant to the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 71, and the plaintiff obtain a verdict, he must limit his execution to the surplus of his demand beyond the sum deposited; and it was said at the end of the judgment: "The just interpretation of the direction in the Act, that the sum deposited shall remain in court 'to abide the event of the suit,' is that the plaintiff, if he succeeds, shall not be entitled only, but bound to resort to that in the first instance, and can issue his execution for the surplus only." The defendants are entitled to this rule on two grounds: first, the judgment against them was satisfied pro tanto, when this sum was paid into court, or, at all events, on the 8th Nov.; secondly, this court has discretionary power over its process, and to allow the plaintiff interest after the date to which the defendants are willing to pay it, would be an abuse of legal right, even if the plaintiff possess that right.

BOVILL, C. J.—If the question in this case had been whether by the strict and technical rules of law this judgment was satisfied by the payment of the money into court, I should think that our answer must have been against the defendants; but what we have to decide with regard to this rule does not depend upon that. The Act of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 17, certainly provides that a judgment-debt shall carry interest from the time of entering, until it shall be satisfied; but the court has always had the power to control its proceedings, and to take care that injustice is not done to either party, for instance, if money due is tendered to a creditor, the court will prevent an execution being levied. This is a stronger case than a tender, for, as I understand it, the money was brought into court for the purpose of being paid over to the plaintiff, if a certain motion to be made by the defendants were unsuccessful; no judge nor counsel, nor attorney could, I think, understand the effect of the order in a different sense. On the 8th Nov. a rule to set aside the award was applied for and refused, and there was nothing on the following day to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining possession of the whole sum: there is indeed nothing suggested as a reason for his not having then taken it. The money was in court, and if, having the means of obtaining the money, the attorney for the plaintiff had thought fit to issue execution, the court would, according to the case of Hews v. Pyke, have set aside the execution and refused to allow the costs, for it would have been an abuse of the process of the court. I cannot conceive what object the plaintiff could have had in not taking the money out on the 9th Nov. Having referred to the master, I find that if the plaintiff's attorneys had then taken out a summons, and had obtained the defendant's consent, which they were ready to give, and had attended at chambers, the order would have been made as a matter of course, and the costs of the summons and attendance would have been afterwards allowed them on taxation. This miserable dispute must have arisen, I suppose, from temper, or from one attorney's clerk putting his knowledge of law against that of another attorney's clerk; and the result has been that to one side or the other there must be a loss of all interest upon a large sum of money for three months, and a loss of the amount of costs incurred by the correspondence, and expenses attending this rule. Under the circumstances, it would be the sanction of an abuse of the proceedings of the court if we were to compel the defendants to pay interest upon the money in court for the period after which the plaintiff might have taken it out. The rule therefore will be made absolute.

KEATING, J.—I have not heard the whole of the arguments, but I entirely concur with what has been said by my Lord.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to consider whether there could have been set up a plea of payment in satisfaction of judgment, although I certainly think that substantially when paid into court the money was allocated in satisfaction pro tanto of the judgment obtained by the plaintiff. This is a stronger case in the defendant's favour than Hews v. Pyke, because the money was here paid in for a special purpose; it is, however, unnecessary to decide the exact effect of that payment, because it is clear to my mind that the judgment was substantially satisfied. From the 8th Nov. no obstacle was made by the opposite side, and the plaintiff might at any time have obtained the sum of money in court. We ought, therefore, to prevent an abuse of any strict legal right which the plaintiff might have, and the rule should be absolute.

BRETT, J.—I doubt if the judgment can be said strictly to have been satisfied either on the 8th Nov. or on the 2nd Dec., but when I find that the plaintiff might have had his money without opposition, had it not been merely for temper or some other unexplained cause, I think the court ought to interfere, and order satisfaction to be entered.

Rule absolute.

An application by defendants for costs was refused, no claim having been made for them in the rule.

Magistrates' law—Beer licence—Granting certificate for—Qualification of house—"Rated in one sum"—House situate in two townships—Rated in two separate sums—Sufficiency of such rating—Extraparochial or other place—3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, ss. 1 and 4—Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), ss. 1 and 8.

By sect. 1 of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, "no licence to sell beer, &c., by retail, shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house in which he shall apply to be licensed; nor shall any such licence be granted in respect of any dwelling-house which shall not, with the premises occupied therewith, be rated in one sum to the rate for the relief of the poor of the parish, township, or place in which such house and premises are situate, on a rent or annual value of 15l. per annum at the least, *within any city . . . parish, or place, the population of which shall exceed 10,000." And by sect. 4 of the same Act, "in any extra-parochial or other place, where no rates are made or collected, the excise officers are authorised to grant a licence to any person to retail beer, &c., in a dwelling-house of the real rent or annual value of 15*l., according to the situation thereof, as aforesaid."

*The appellant was the owner of a house, part of which was situate in the township of C., in the city of M., and was rated thereto on an annual value of 8*l.*, and the other part of which house was situate in the township of M., not within the said city, and was rated to such township on an annual value of 8*l.* 10*s.* Both townships, which each contained a population exceeding 10,000, were situate in the same parish and Poor-Law Union, to which union the rates of both townships, though separately levied and collected, were paid over.*

The justices having refused the appellant's application for a certificate for the renewal of a beer licence, under the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27) on the ground that her house was not sufficiently rated within the city of M. in the amount required by sect. 1 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, it was, on appeal against that decision,

*Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Martin, Channell, and Cleasby, B.B.), that the justices were right in their decision. The appellant's house, though rated in two separate sums of 8*l.* and 8*l.* 10*s.* was not rated in "one sum of 15*l.* at the least," and so did not come within the words of sect. 1 of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and was not therefore within that Act; nor did it come within sect. 4 of that Act, as an "extraparochial or other place where no rates were made or collected."*

This was a special case in the matter of an appeal by Ann Jennings against the justices of the City of Manchester.

At the Brewster Sessions at Manchester, in and for the city of Manchester, on 22nd Sept. 1869, application was made by the applicant for a certificate for the renewal of a beer licence under "the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869" (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27) and was refused by the justices of the said city, on the ground that the dwelling-house in respect of which the application was made was not rated within the said city in the amount required by sect. 1 of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61.

Due notice of appeal was given, and by consent of the parties, and by order of Willes, J., of 8th Feb. 1870, the following case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

First, part of the dwelling-house is situate in the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, in the city of Manchester, and is rated thereto on an annual value of 8*l.*; secondly, the other part is situate in the township of Moss Side in the county of Lancaster, a township not within the city of Manchester, and is rated to the said township of Moss Side, on an annual sum of 8*l.* 10*s.*; thirdly, both townships are situated in the same parish and in the same union for the maintenance of the poor, to which union the rates of both townships, though separately levied and collected, are paid over; fourthly, the population of the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock exceeds 10,000, according to the last Parliamentary census; fifthly, the population of Moss Side, according to the last Parliamentary census, exceeds 10,000.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances above stated, the house was sufficiently situated and rated within the meaning of sect. 1 of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, so as to authorise the justices of the city of Manchester to grant the applicant a certificate of the renewal of her beer licence, under the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.

If the opinion of the court shall be in the affirmative thereof, then it is agreed between the parties that the certificate is to be granted. If the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the refusal of the certificate is to be confirmed.

Appellant's points for argument.

First, that the Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, was passed to amend the Act to permit the sale of beer, and must be construed liberally so as to effect that object; secondly, that the appellant's house is sufficiently rated within the spirit, if not within the letter, of sect. 1 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61; thirdly, that the appellant's house, not being wholly within either of the townships of Chorlton-upon-Medlock or Moss Side, and there being no rates levied for the parish in which both townships are situated, is within sect. 4 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and must be treated as an "other place" within the meaning of that section.

The following sections of the Acts of Parliament, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, referred to in argument and the judgment of the court, are material.

By the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61 (an Act to amend the Acts relating to the General Sale of Beer and Cider by Retail in England) it is enacted by sect. 1:—

That no licence to sell beer or cider by retail under the recited Acts (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85), or this Act, shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house in which he shall apply to be licensed, nor shall any such licence be granted in respect of any dwelling-house which shall not, with the premises occupied therewith, be rated in one sum to the rate for the relief of the poor for the parish, township, or place in which such house and premises are situate, on a rent or annual value of 15*l.* per annum at the least, if situated . . . within any city . . . parish, or place, the population of which, according to the last Parliamentary census, shall exceed 10,000.

And after reciting that in some extraparochial places no assessments were made or rates collected for the relief of the poor, and it was expedient to provide for persons obtaining licence in such places, it was enacted by sect. 4:—

That in any extraparochial or other place, where no rates are made or collected for the relief of the poor, it shall be lawful for the proper officers of excise, authorised to grant licences, to grant licences to any person to retail beer or cider in a dwelling-house which, with the premises occupied therewith, shall be of the real rent or annual value of 15*l.*, according to the situation thereof as aforesaid; and in such case the person applying for such licence shall produce to, and deposit and leave with, the proper officer of excise granting such licence, a certificate in writing, signed by the inhabitant householders of the township or place, certifying that the party applying is the real resident in and occupier of the dwelling-house sought to be licensed, and also certifying the true and real annual value of the same, with the premises occupied therewith, according to the best of their judgment and belief.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), by sect. 4 provides that no licence or renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of beer, cider, or wine under the provisions of the therein recited Acts (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 27) shall be granted, except upon the production, and in pursuance of the authority, of a certificate granted under this Act, and that any licence granted or renewed in contravention of the present enactment shall be void.

Sects. 5, 6, and 7 relate to the granting of certificates authorising licences for the sale of beer, &c. on or off the premises, the justices by whom they are to be granted, the form of such certificate, and the notice to be given by applicants of intention to apply for them.

By sect. 8 it is enacted that all the provisions of the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, as to the terms upon which, and the manner in which, and the persons to whom, grants of licences are to be made by the justices at the said general and licensing meeting, and as to appeal from any act of any justices shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act, subject to this qualification, that no application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises shall be refused, except upon one or more of the following grounds, viz. (amongst other grounds), "(4.) That the applicant, or the house in respect of which he applies, is not duly qualified as by law is required." And the section goes on to provide that "where an application for any such last-mentioned certificate is refused on the ground that the house in respect of which he applies is not duly qualified as by law is required, the justices shall specify in writing to the applicant the grounds of their decision."

Ex.]

REG. v. WILLIAM ROE.

Ambrose, for the appellant.—By the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), the granting and the renewing of licences for the sale of wine and beer is vested in the justices. But the statute regulating the qualification upon which the certificate, authorising the granting of the licence, is to be issued, is the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and the first section of that statute provides that the house in respect of which the applicant desires to be licensed must, in a place where the population exceeds 10,000, be rated at 15*l.* per annum. [MARTIN, B.—The statute says rated in one sum. Do you mean to contend that two separate sums of 8*l.* and 8*l.* 10*s.* are "one sum"?] I would hardly go so far as that. But I would refer to the 4th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. It must be remembered that it is an Act to amend the previous Acts relating to the sale of beer and to afford greater facilities for carrying on that trade. The appellant's house is situated in two townships, part of it being in one and part in another, but the whole of the house is in one parish, for which parish no rates are levied. It is submitted, therefore, that it comes within the words in sect. 4, of "an extraparochial or other place." Were the words "other place" not there, this, perhaps, could not be contended for, but it is analogous to an extra-parochial place, and so comes within the provision of sect. 4. It will be said by the respondents that this is a house in the township of Chorlton. That, however, is not so; a part of the house is there, no doubt. The whole house is situate in the parish of Manchester, where no rates are levied. [MARTIN, B.—This is a case apparently not provided for, and how can we amend the defect of the Legislature? The appellant may have the benefit of being under the care of two clergymen, but she has not the benefit of being entitled to a licence for a beer house. CLEASBY, B.—The statute says, "any place not rated," &c. But this house is rated in 8*l.*] Not so; only a part of the house. The words of the 1st sect. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, are, "parish, township, or place." Now we are in no township. [CLEASBY, B.—Your argument is that a house must be situated somewhere, but part of a house may be nowhere.] Yes; it is analogous to an "extraparochial place." The intention of the Legislature was not to deprive people of their beer, but to extend the facilities for their getting it, and the Act should have a large and liberal construction given to it. The house is sufficiently rated within the spirit, if not the precise letter of sect. 1 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, but if not it comes within sect. 4.

C. Hopwood, for the respondents, contra, was not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—I believe that we are all of opinion that the justices were quite right in the decision to which they came in this case. According to the arguments and views expressed by Mr. Ambrose it might perhaps be well that Parliament should alter the section of the Act in this respect; but that is for them to do, not for the court. It is said, that we ought to construe the Act "liberally," though there are, I fancy, many persons who would say that we ought to do just the contrary. However, in my judgment, our duty is to construe it neither liberally nor illiberally, but fairly and reasonably, according to the plain and ordinary signification of the language used. Now, the Act expressly says (sect. 1 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61), that "no licence to sell beer or cider by retail shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder, and occupier of the dwelling-house in which he shall apply to be licensed, nor shall any such licence be granted in respect of any dwelling-house which shall not, with the premises occupied therewith, be rated in one sum to the relief of the poor of the parish, township, or place in which such house and premises are situate, on a rent or annual value of 15*l.* per annum, at the least." Now, unfortunately for the appellant, her house does not come within that requirement, for it is not rated "in one sum of 15*l.*," but in two distinct and separate sums of 8*l.* and 8*l.* 10*s.*, making together 16*l.* 10*s.* It does not, therefore, fall within the Act. For my own part, I think that in construing Acts of Parliament we ought not to give a fanciful or conjectural meaning to the words used by the Legislature, but to adhere to their plain, ordinary, and common sense meaning. For these reasons, the decision of the justices will be affirmed, and our judgment be for the respondents.

CHANNELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The case, in my opinion, is determined by the 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and is not within the 4th section of that Act on which Mr. Ambrose has relied. I am sorry to be obliged to come to this conclusion in the present case, but I see no way of escaping from it.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The argument urged before us is, that parts of a house are not equivalent to a house.

REG. v. WILLIAM ROE.

Birds feræ naturæ—Indictment—Evidence.

The prisoner was indicted for stealing one dead partridge, and the proof was that the partridge was wounded, but was picked up or caught by the prisoner while it was alive but in a dying state:

Held, that the indictment was not proved.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace of our sovereign Lady the Queen for the county of Derby, holden at Derby on the 4th Jan. 1870, before Thomas William Evans, Esq. (chairman), Robert Sacheverell Wilmot Sitwell, Esq. (deputy chairman), and other justices, &c.:

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. WILLIAM ROE.

[C. CAS. R.]

Whereas at the present sessions William Roe has been tried before me upon an indictment of which the following is a copy :

Derbyshire, to wit. The jurors of our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that William Roe, on the 16th Sept. 1869, feloniously did steal, take, and carry away one dead partridge of the goods and chattels of George Newdigate, Esq., against the peace of our Lady the Queen, &c.

Second count. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said William Roe, on the said 16th Sept. in the year aforesaid, feloniously did receive one dead partridge, of the goods and chattels of George Newdigate, Esq., then lately before feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away by a certain evil disposed person, he the said William Roe well knowing the said last-mentioned goods and chattels to have been feloniously stolen against the form of the statute, &c.

Third count. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said William Roe on the said 16th Sept. in the year aforesaid feloniously did steal, take, and carry away one dead partridge, of the goods and chattels of Francis William Newdigate, against the peace, &c.

On the 16th Sept. last, Colonel Henry Newdigate, Major George Newdigate, and the Rev. Mr. Howman, were out shooting at Kirk Hallam, in this county, on land belonging to Colonel Francis William Newdigate, accompanied by his keeper, Mr. Hancock.

A covey of partridges rose, and was fired at by the Rev. Mr. Howman; one of the birds came back round Major Newdigate, who fired at it. The bird crossed a canal, towered, and fell in a field belonging to Colonel Francis William Newdigate, and over which he had the right of shooting, but in the occupation of his tenant.

The prisoner, who was a boatman, and on the canal bank, entered the field, and either picked up or caught the bird.

The evidence as to the condition of the bird when caught or picked up was conflicting, but it was afterwards given to the keeper by the prisoner, and was dead at the time.

Counsel for the prisoner contended that there was no case to support a charge of larceny; that if there was a single spark of life left in the bird when picked up by the prisoner it could not be larceny.

It is uncertain who gave the bird its mortal wound.

I left to the jury the following questions :

1. By whom was the bird shot?—Answer. No evidence to prove by which of the party the bird was shot.

2. Are you of opinion the bird was dead when picked up, or was it in a dying state, and so disabled that it could not escape?—Answer. We believe the bird was alive, but in a dying state, and so disabled that it could not escape.

3. Are you of opinion that the prisoner took the bird fraudulently, and with intent to deprive the owner of it?—Answer. Yes.

The opinion of the court is asked.—First, whether the bird picked up by the prisoner in a dying state and so disabled that it could not escape was the subject of larceny? Secondly, whether the property in the bird was sufficiently laid in Col. Francis William Newdigate?

R. S. W. SITWELL, Deputy Chairman.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

C. H. Roe for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. If the partridge was a bird feræ naturæ, it was reduced into possession by being killed, and became, therefore, the subject of larceny. [WILLES, J.—It does not appear that it was dead when the prisoner picked it up or caught it, or by whom the mortal wound was given so as to reduce it into possession. It may have been the boatman who was the immediate cause of its death.] The partridge was in a dying condition, and therefore a property was acquired in it ratione impotentiae. In 2 Black. Com. 391, it is said that "a man may be invested with a qualified, but not an absolute, property in all creatures that are feræ naturæ either per industriam, propter impotentiam, or propter privilegium. A qualified property may also subsist with relation to animals, feræ naturæ, or ratione impotentiae on account of their own inability. As when hawks, herons, or other birds build in my trees, or coneyes or other creatures make their nests or burrows in my land and have young ones there, I have a qualified property in those young ones till such time as they can fly or run away, and then my property expires, but till then it is in some cases trespass, and in others felony for a stranger to take them away." In Blades v. Higgs, 31 L. J. 152, C. P.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 798, it was held that if rabbits be started and killed on the land of another, they are the property of the person on whose land they are killed, and not of the captor :

Instit. Book 2, c. 1, s. 13 (Saun. Ed.) ;

Sutton v. Moody, 1 Ld. Ray 250.

[HANNEN, J.—The charge is for stealing a dead partridge, and the proof is that the prisoner took a live partridge.] This partridge was so disabled as to have lost all power of escape, and was therefore to all intents a dead bird. If it is to be taken to be alive, it was reduced into possession by the person who shot it. It was in a field where it could not escape. In Churchward v. Studdy, 14 East, 249, it was held that "the plaintiff's dogs having hunted and caught on the defendant's land a hare started on the land of another, the property was thereby vested in the plaintiff, who might maintain trespass against the defendant for afterwards taking away the hare. And so it would be, though the hare being quite spent had been caught up by a labourer of the defendant for the benefit of the hunters:" (Earl of Lonsdale v. Rigg, 26 L. J. 196, Ex.) [WILLES, J.—Suppose the bird had been shot by a third person, and the keeper picked it up and appropriated it to his own use, would that have been larceny or embezzlement?] Embezzlement. [WILLES, J.—I think that is the right view. If so, the bird has not been reduced into possession by the master.]

BOVILL, C.J.—The prisoner was indicted for stealing one dead partridge, and the only question now is whether the allegation as to that matter was properly proved. The property is laid in different counts to be in George Newdigate and Francis William Newdigate. If the indictment had simply alleged that the prisoner had stolen one partridge it would have been bad, for, to make a partridge the subject of larceny, it must be shown either that it was dead, or if alive that it was reduced into possession, or that it was under the owner's control. In this indictment it is alleged that the partridge was dead. This allegation is not a matter of form merely, but it is one of substance, as was held long ago in Rough's case, 2 East, P. C. 607. The proof on the trial was that the bird was wounded and was either picked up or caught by the prisoner. At the time it was picked up or caught by the prisoner it was alive, but in a dying state, i.e., the prisoner caught, while it was alive, a wounded partridge. The proof therefore fails to establish the charge in the indictment that the prisoner stole one dead partridge. If the partridge had been reduced into possession there might have been some ground for charging a larceny in a different form, but we cannot enter into the question on the present indictment. The conviction, therefore, cannot be sustained.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. By the decision in Blades v. Higgs, it was never intended that poachers should be put on the same footing with felons. I entirely concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. I wish, however, to state for myself that I am not satisfied that if the partridge had been dead when picked up by the prisoner it would have been sufficiently reduced into possession so as to sustain the charge of larceny. I illustrated my view in the course of the argument, by the keeper picking up a dead bird and embezzling it.

BYLES, J.—It was necessary to allege in the indictment that the partridge was either dead or, if alive, that it was reclaimed, or in captivity, or reduced into possession. The indictment here states that it was dead, whereas it is found by the jury that it was alive. The indictment, therefore, was not proved, and the conviction cannot be sustained.

HANNEN, J. and CLEASBY, B. concurred.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF THE UPPER HALF HUNDRED OF CHART AND LONGBRIDGE.

Bridge—Liability to repair—Hundred—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 5, does not transfer to parishes the liability to repair a bridge, which the inhabitants of a half hundred have always repaired out of the hundred rate made on the half hundred.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace, held at St. Augustine, near Canterbury, on the 29th June 1869, James Adams and Charles Tanton, es representing the inhabitants of the upper half hundred of Chart and Longbridge, in the county of Kent, were tried upon an indictment which charged the said inhabitants with permitting one of the hundred bridges to be out of repair.

It was proved to the satisfaction of the jury that the bridge in question was situate within the upper half hundred of Chart and Longbridge, that it was out of repair and dangerous, and that from time immemorial the repairs of that bridge and all other hundred bridges within the upper half hundred had always been done at the expense of the inhabitants of the half hundred, out of a hundred rate made and levied in the said upper half hundred.

Primâ facie everything was proved which would entitle the Crown to a verdict, but it was contended on the part of the defendants that since the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, hundred bridges are repairable as highways by the parishes in which they are respectively situate, and that the inhabitants of any hundred or other division of a county are no longer indictable for the non-repair.

The jury found the defendants guilty, and the court decided upon reserving the point raised for the consideration of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, and respited the judgment until the decision shall be given.

The opinion of the court is requested upon the following question, viz. :—

Whether a public bridge, which has from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary been repaired by a hundred, is, since the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, not repairable by the said hundred?

If the court shall be of opinion that it is repairable by the hundred the verdict is to stand; if otherwise, the verdict is to be set aside and a verdict of Not Guilty entered.

THOMAS SYDENHAM CLARKE,

Biron, for the defendants.—In considering this case, it is necessary to regard the course of legislation upon the subject of bridges. Generally speaking parishes are liable for the repair of the highways within them, but in the case of bridges, county bridges (which are bridges in connection with the main highways), have been, from time immemorial, repaired only by the county rates, while hundred bridges, or bridges in connection with bye-roads or highways less used, have been by prescription repairable by rates on the hundreds, or a collection of parishes. In the Highway Act, 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, there is a series of provisions giving facilities to surveyors of the highways for getting materials for the making and repair of highways. That statute makes no mention of bridges, and the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 1, was passed for the purpose of extending those provisions to surveyors of county bridges (eo nomine). Then the 54 Geo. 3, c. 90, was passed to extend the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, to bridges and other works maintained at the expense of the hundreds. County and hundred bridges are also spoken of (eo nomine) in the 55 Geo. 3, c. 143, s. 5. The Legislature, therefore, has distinctly recognised the two classes of bridges. This 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, has not been repealed, so far as relates to bridges, by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Merionethshire, 6 Q. B. 343;

Reg. v. Brecknockshire, 15 Q. B. 813.

By the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 5 (the interpretation clause) it is enacted that in the construction of that Act the word "highways" shall be understood to mean "all roads, bridges (not being county bridges), carriageways, cartways, horseways, bridledways, footways, causeways, churchways, and pavements." There being, then, a recognised distinction between county bridges and hundred bridges; hundred bridges by virtue of that enactment in 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, are now to be treated as highways, and are governed by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. Then the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 21, enacts "that if any bridge shall hereafter be built, which bridge shall be liable by law to be repaired by and at the expense of any county, or part of any county, then and in such case all highways leading to, passing over, and next adjoining to such bridge, shall be from time to time repaired by the parish, person, or body politic or corporate, or trustees of a turnpike road, who were by law, before the erection of the said bridge, bound to repair the said highways: Provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend to exonerate or discharge any county, or any part of any county, from repairing or keeping in repair the walls, banks, or fences of the raised causeways to any such bridge, or the land arches thereof." Sections 22 and 27 were then referred to. Section 62, which prescribes the proceedings by which highways repairable by any persons or bodies corporate, ratione tenuræ, or otherwise, may be made parish highways, does not control the enactment in sect. 5. [Willes, J.—You must show by negative evidence that the hundred is not now liable to repair its bridges.] It is contended that sect. 5 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, removes the liability to parishes to repair hundred bridges as well as its highways.

Barrow for the prosecution.—It was found that the bridge had always been repaired by the inhabitants of the half hundred. It's either a half hundred bridge or a county bridge; and in either case the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, does not apply. The term county bridge has no real meaning; it only means a bridge repairable by the inhabitants of the county. The interpretation clause of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, defines "parish" to mean, among other things, "wapentake, division, or any other place or district maintaining its own highways." Therefore, if the bridge is repairable by the parish, construing parish by the interpretation clause, it is still repairable by the wapentake, division, or district within which it is situated. [He was then stopped.]

ROBERTSON v. SMITH AND OTHERS—In the Goods of R. R. PEEL.

BOVILL, C. J.—In dealing with the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, we must consider the state of the law previously existing to which it has reference. Previously there was one set of statutes regulating highways, and another regulating bridges. The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, was an Act for the consolidation of the laws relating to highways, and does not refer to bridges. That Act seems to relate to highways only as distinguished from bridges; but by the interpretation clause the word “highways” is to be construed to mean, among other things, “bridges not being county bridges.” Now it is contended that under that clause county bridges only being excepted by it, a hundred bridge must be considered as part of the highway. The words “county bridge” is not a term known to the law, but is merely a compendious word for a public bridge. It is not stated in the indictment that this was a county bridge, or that there was any liability on the inhabitants of the county to repair it. There may be a liability on the part of the inhabitants of the hundred, or a division of the county, or of the inhabitants of a county, to repair a bridge. There is no difference in principle, all bridges over a stream are county bridges although repairable by a hundred or division of the county. In some of the statutes a distinction is made between county bridges and hundred bridges as pointed out in the argument by Mr. Biron. But there is nothing in the affirmative enactments of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, to take away the liability of persons to repair a highway under previous statutes, and there is no reason for holding that it was intended to take away the liability to repair public bridges, which particular divisions of a county were liable to repair. The conviction will therefore stand.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

ROBERTSON v. SMITH AND OTHERS.

Will—Codicil—Deed of gift.

A testator executed a codicil to his last will and testament, in which he gave certain specified sums as a deed of gift to certain persons. The court Held, that the bequest was meant to take effect after death, and granted probate of the codicil.

F. Craven, late of Holloway, died 8th Nov., 1868, leaving a duly executed will with the following codicil:—“I make a free gift to Maria Robertson of 60*l.*, and to John Virtue of 50*l.*, being the sum deposited by me with the Islington branch of the London and County Bank.”

The codicil was attested by two witnesses, one of whom was Mr. Virtue, who therefore forfeited his legacy if the paper were held to be testamentary. The question before the court was whether this codicil was intended to operate as an immediate gift, or not to take effect until after the death.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—Lord PENZANCE.—In this case the paper cannot be admitted to probate unless it can be shown that the intention of the testator was that the gift which he makes should depend on his death. The question is, how are you to get at that intention? Looking at all the circumstances of the case, I have no doubt that the testator did intend that the gift should take effect on his death. It was a sum of money which he had in the savings bank—he was dying when he made the provision, and I think he made it in contemplation of his death, and that he did not intend to strip himself of his property if, contrary to all the expectations, he survived.

Will—Executor wrongly described—Ambiguity.

The testator by his will nominated “Francis Courtenay Thorpe” as one of his executors. The only person answering to the description was a youth of twelve, but there was every reason to believe that the testator intended to appoint his brother Thomas Corbet Thorpe.

The Court however held that there was no ambiguity, and declined to go into evidence to ascertain which of the two the testator really intended to appoint.

R. R. Peel, late of Hampton, in the county of Middlesex, died July 9, 1869, having duly executed a will on Jan. 28, 1869. One of the executors appointed in the will was “Francis Courtenay Thorpe, of Hampton aforesaid, gentleman.” The only person corresponding to that description was Francis Courtenay Thorpe, a nephew of the deceased, and a minor, aged 12. The testator, however, had a brother, Francis Corbet Thorpe, gentleman, of Hampton. In the same month that the will was executed the testator had asked this brother to be one of his executors, in conjunction with two other gentlemen who were afterwards nominated in the will as executors and trustees, and the brother consented to act. The attorney who drew the will from the instructions of the deceased made an affidavit, in which he stated that he had no doubt the testator intended his brother Francis Corbet Thorpe to be his executor, and that the name of “Courtenay” had been inserted by a mistake.

Dr. Spinks now moved for probate to Francis Corbet Thorpe, as one of the executors of the deceased. The description in the will could not apply to a youth of twelve, and there was, therefore, an ambiguity which would justify the court in looking into the facts, to ascertain what the intentions of the testator were.

Lord PENZANCE.—If the court is at liberty to look into the facts there is no difficulty whatever in deciding that the person the testator really meant was the father; but the question is whether the court is so at liberty. So far as I can see the description “Francis Courtenay Thorpe, of Hampton aforesaid, gentleman,” is a description that does apply to this youth of twelve. He has the christian names therein given, he lives at Hampton, and he is a gentleman, and I can see no ground on which the court can entertain the question as to what the testator meant. He has given a description which, when it comes to be applied to the facts, corresponds with an existing person, and does not correspond with any other existing person. There is, therefore, no ambiguity, and the court is not at liberty to exercise its discretion so as to investigate the question which of the two the testator meant

MILLER v. MILLER.

Restitution—Decree for renewal of cohabitation—Refusal of the wife to obey the decree—Sequestration.

In a husband's suit for restitution of conjugal rights the court pronounced a decree ordering the wife to return to cohabitation. She went abroad, and refused to obey the decree, and her address being concealed by her friends, it was impossible to serve it on her, and substituted service on her attorney was ordered.

The court, without requiring the preliminary process of attachment, issued a writ of sequestration against the separate estate of the wife, with the view of enforcing her obedience to the decree.

This was originally a husband's suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and at the hearing the court decreed that the respondent should return to cohabitation, and subsequently condemned her in the costs incurred by the petitioner. The respondent was abroad, and her friends had concealed her address. The court, on proof of this, allowed substituted service of the decree on her attorney, but she had not obeyed it.

Dr. Spinks (Dr. Tristram with him) now moved on behalf of the petitioner that a writ of sequestration be issued against the separate estate of the wife for the purpose of compelling her to return to cohabitation.

Dr. Deane (Hemming and E. Browning with him) on behalf of the respondent, opposed the motion. The property against which the sequestration is asked is in the hands of trustees and cannot be reached:

Dent v. Dent, L. Rep. 1 P. & Div. 366; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 252;

Sharpe v. Cumano, L. Rep. 1 P. & Div. 622;

[Lord PENZANCE.—The court has nothing to do with that. A general writ of sequestration is asked for in order to compel the respondent to return to cohabitation, and it may be that when the writ is issued the sequestrator can find nothing to seize.] By the practice of the Court of Chancery a writ of sequestration must be preceded by an attachment:

Morgan and Chute's Chancery Statutes and Orders, Order 29, rule 1537;

Braithwaite's Records and Writ Practice, 239. 241;

Seton on Decrees, 1224.

The practice was modified in the case of ecclesiastical decrees by 2 & 3 Will 4, c. 93, and exception has also been made in the case of debtors by the Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62); Sykes v. Dawson, L. Rep. 1 Eq. Cas. 228. In cases where plaintiffs have shown that an attachment would be a worthless preliminary, the court has dispensed with it, but that has always been done ex parte. The party must show that he is in a position to issue an attachment, and that is not the case here, because there has been no personal service: (Hope v. Carnegie, L. Rep. 7 Eq. Cas. 26; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624.) [Lord PENZANCE.—It would be unreasonable to say that if a party keeps abroad you cannot serve an attachment, and that without an attachment you cannot have a writ of sequestration.]

Dr. Spinks, in reply, relied on Dent v. Dent and Clinton v. Clinton, in submitting that this court could issue a writ of sequestration without issuing an attachment previously. In Hope v. Carnegie, it did not appear that the lady's address was ever known although she was abroad; but here the lady's address had been persistently concealed by her friends and solicitor. To require personal service under such circumstances would be to say that the court should not have power to enforce its own decrees; but by rule 16 (Rules and Regulations 1866) substituted service was permitted where personal service could not be effected, and that had been done in this case.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Lord PENZANCE.—This case involved the question whether the court could properly issue a writ of sequestration with a view of compelling a party to the suit to obey its order. That question depended upon another, and it was this, whether courts of equity, whose powers in this respect are by the Probate Act conferred upon this court, have or have not been in the habit of issuing writs of sequestration for such a purpose? It was not denied that they had; but it was said that it was the universal practice in courts of equity before such an order could be made that it should be preceded by the issuing of a writ of attachment. Now it would certainly be a very unfortunate state of things if that were so, because it would lead to the necessity for issuing a writ of attachment, which in many cases would be a mere idle proceeding, as a preliminary to taking the only step which would be of any use; for if a person who was in contempt was out of the jurisdiction, the issuing of a writ of attachment would be of no avail. What courts of equity have been in the habit of doing is this, to look upon this writ of sequestration as a further measure to be resorted to if the writ of attachment, which is the ordinary method of enforcing its orders and decrees, should prove unsuccessful. Where the writ of attachment would be productive of any benefit it would first be tried before they resorted to a writ of sequestration; but it would be rather singular if where a writ of attachment would be entirely useless, they should insist upon it before granting a writ of sequestration. Upon looking into the cases I do not find that the proposition, as regards the practice of courts of equity which has been contended for, has been maintained. In the case of Hodgson v. Hodgson a decree was made ordering the defendant to pay a certain sum of money into court, and to pay the costs of the suit. Previous to the decree the defendant had gone to Australia. The plaintiff, by mistake, issued an attachment into the county of Westmoreland, instead of in the county of Lancaster, in which the defendant had resided before going abroad, and a return had been made of non est inventus. The court was then moved that a writ of sequestration might issue without a return to an attachment in the county of Lancaster, and the Master of the Rolls said, "It would be an idle form to issue another attachment. Take the order." I am quite of the same opinion as the Master of the Rolls; it would have been a very idle proceeding indeed to have issued an attachment under such circumstances. Again, in Butler v. Matthews, 19 Beav. 549, the question was, whether the party, being out of the jurisdiction, the court should proceed and take the bill pro confesso. The Master of the Rolls said, "To obtain a decree pro confesso you must proceed with the greatest care." The case stood over for consideration, and two cases having been produced in which it was held that when a defendant was out of the jurisdiction an attachment need not be issued, the order was made. That, no doubt, is only an analogous case, but it proceeded on the same principle, that where a writ of attachment would be of no use it need not issue. In the case of Re The East of England Bank, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 10 Jur. N. S. 1093, which is a more recent case, and very much to the purpose, application was made to Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., for a writ of sequestration, without attachment, against Mr. W. Hall, who had been placed upon the list of contributories to the bank, and who was abroad. The learned judge said, "If the practice is, that in order to obtain a writ of sequestration, you must first get a writ of attachment, the effect is, that there is no provision for sequestration in the case of persons who are not resident in England;" and he made the order for a writ of sequestration to issue without any previous writ of attachment. That is a direct authority in favour of what appears to me to be the more sensible course to pursue. I shall order the issue in this case of a writ of sequestration, it being understood that the court does not now enter into the question as to what property may or may not be affected by it. That is a question which may arise hereafter, and when it does it will have to be argued. I do not decide it now. The writ of sequestration will issue with costs.

SAUNDERSON v. PERRIN.

March 29.—Dr. Tristram.—The application for the writ was on the ground of non-compliance with the decree of the court, and for nonpayment of costs. We have since learned that the costs were paid the day before the motion, and we are, therefore, not entitled to the writ on that head.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—It was not granted for that, but for the disobedience of the wife to the monition of the court in not returning to cohabitation.

SAUNDERSON v. PERRIN.

Interpleader—Equitable assignment—Common Law Procedure Act 1860.

A., being indebted to B., gave him a written authority addressed to C., from whom certain sums of money were accruing due to A., authorising C. to pay those sums to B. Notice of this instrument was given to C.

Held, first, that the authority was not such an order for the payment of money as would require a stamp; secondly, that it was an equitable assignment of the moneys in C.'s hands to B., creating a lien or charge upon them which might be successfully set up by C. when served with a garnishee order by a subsequent judgment-creditor of A.; thirdly, that a mistake appearing on the face of an interpleader issue as to the statute under which it is directed does not invalidate the issue.

Interpleader issue directed on the application of the Planet Permanent Building and Investment Society which had been served with a garnishee order upon a judgment obtained by the defendant against one Francon.

The issue was in these terms:

James Saunderson affirms, and Edward William Perrin and John Thomas Perrin deny, that on the 7th Feb. 1870, he the said James Saunderson was entitled to a lien on the amount in the hands of the Planet Permanent Building and Investment Society as against C. D. Francon. And it has been ordered by Master Henry John Hodgson pursuant to the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 58, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, that the said question shall be tried by a jury, and such said jury shall find what, if any, was the amount of the said lien as aforesaid. Therefore let, &c.

Finlay for defendant.

Saunderson the plaintiff, having advanced moneys to Francon, a builder, the latter gave him the following authority:

120, Holborn-hill, London.

22nd July, 1867.

To the Directors of the Planet Permanent Building and Investment Society.

Gentlemen,—I hereby authorise you to pay to Mr. James Saunderson of the above address all moneys coming to me in respect to my contract with you for building houses in Napier-terrace, Battersea, and to accept his receipt for the same, which I hereby acknowledge shall be a sufficient discharge to you.—I am, yours truly,
E. P. FRANCON.
(Witness) Ed. G. Burton.

Notice of this document was given to the society on the day following its date.

LUSH, J. ruled that it was not an order for the payment of money which would require a stamp.

At the close of the case for the plaintiff,

Finlay submitted that no case had been made out; that the document was a mere authority to pay moneys coming to Francon in respect of the houses in Napier-terrace, and might be revoked. It was not an order or it would have needed a stamp, and it was not an equitable assignment. [LUSH, J.—It is an authority from a debtor to pay a debt owing by him to another person, why is not that an equitable assignment?] In Bell v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 15 Beav. 553, the Master of the Rolls said, "If a creditor employ a person to collect the debts due to him, and inform the debtor that such person has authority to receive the debt due, this would not be an assignment of the debt to the agent, even though the agent should be a creditor of his principal; but the debtor might with propriety and without risk, afterwards pay the debt to the creditor, or to any fresh agent whom he might appoint to receive it." [LUSH, J.—That is quite intelligible; there an agent was employed to collect a debt, but here Francon did not make Saunderson his agent to collect a debt. The intent is manifest.] The order might be revoked by Francon at any time. [LUSH, J.—Suppose it could be—it has not been revoked.] But to constitute a good equitable assignment it must be irrevocable. [LUSH, J.—This is not an order merely to receive the money as agent, but to receive it on his (Saunderson's) own behalf—that constitutes an equitable assignment.] He then argued that as the case was an interpleader issue the plaintiff must make out a legal title. He cited from 2 Chitty's Archbold, p. 1394 Frost v. Heywood, 12 L. J. N. S. 242. [LUSH, J. referred to 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126 (The Common Law Procedure Act 1860), s. 29,—"Whenever in proceedings to obtain an attachment of debts . . . it is suggested by the garnishee that the debt sought to be attached belongs to some third person who has a lien or charge upon it, the judge may order such third person to appear before him, and state the nature and particulars of his claim upon such debts," and sect. 30.] There is here no evidence of lien.

Clay, contra, cited Lett v. Morris, 4 Sim. 607:—A. having contracted to pay to B. 2360*l.* by instalments, B. signed and gave to C., for valuable consideration, a paper authorising A. to pay part of each instalment to C., and 460*l.* to be reserved in A.'s hands out of the balance of the contract, and

LEE v. MEREST.

[ARCHES.]

C.'s receipt was to be a discharge to A.; A. was served with notice of the order on the day on which it was signed: Held, that the writing was an equitable assignment of the sums mentioned in it to C.

LUSH, J.—I quite agree; that case is precisely in point.

Finlay asked that leave might be reserved for him to move upon the points raised.

LUSH, J.—I cannot give leave because that would import I have a doubt, and I have none.

Finlay.—The issue on the face of it purports to be under the Interpleader Act.

LUSH, J.—That is a mistake, but it does not invalidate the issue, which is really under the garnishee clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860.

LEE v. MEREST.

Simony—Stat. 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 12—Evidence—Sentence.

The defendant was presented to a living by W., who had shortly before bought the advowson, on May 27, 1868. On June 10 M. brought an action against the defendant for 350l., and judgment went by default "by arrangement between the parties." Execution was issued, and 5l. was levied. On Aug. 3 the defendant was instituted on the presentation of W. These circumstances, taken in conjunction with certain suspicious letters written by W. to the defendant, and with the fact that the defendant did not offer himself as a witness to rebut the above evidence, were Held, to prove that the presentation to the living was the result of a corrupt and simoniacal contract between the parties, and that the defendant was therefore guilty of simony under the stat. 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 12.

The defendant, having also been convicted of threatening to publish a libel upon W., with intent to extort money, the sentence, in addition to the penalties for simony by sect. 2 of the stat. of Anne, was of deprivation from the ministry, and from the performance of all clerical functions within the province.

This was a suit instituted under the Church Discipline Act, promoted by John Benjamin Lee against the defendant, the Rev. James John Merest, vicar of Upton-Snodsbury, in the county of Worcester, for having entered into a simoniacal contract for procuring the then next presentation to the vicarage of Upton-Snodsbury, and for having been corruptly and simoniacally presented to the same; and also for having pleaded guilty, at the Worcester Assizes, on March 4, 1869, to a charge of unlawfully threatening to publish a libel upon one Murray Richard Workman, with intent thereby to extort money from him.

The Bishop of Worcester sent the case by letters of request to this court.

This was the first proceeding in an ecclesiastical court against a clerk for simony under the stat. 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 12.

The articles were in the following form:—

1. That by the laws, canons, and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm, all clerks and ministers in holy orders are particularly enjoined and required to be grave, reverend, and orderly in their general deportment and behaviour in every respect, and to abstain from any excess whatever, and from anything that may give rise to scandal and evil report, and always to do the things which shall appertain to honesty, and to endeavour to profit the church of God, and to forward the progress of true religion, bearing in mind that they ought to excel all others in purity of life, and to be examples to other people under pain of degradation or deprivation from their ecclesiastical benefices, suspension from the exercise of their spiritual functions, or such other ecclesiastical punishment as the exigency of the case and the law thereupon may require or authorise.

2. That by the said laws, canons, and constitutions ecclesiastical, if a clerk in holy orders of the Church of England be simoniacally promoted or presented to any benefice or living ecclesiastical, he is deprivable of the same by reason of such simoniacal promotion or presentation, on due examination and proof thereof, and if such clerk shall have been a party or privy to such simoniacal promotion or presentation he shall be adjudged guilty of simony. And moreover by the stat. 12 Ann, st. 2, c. 12, it was enacted and provided that, "If any person shall for money, reward, gift, profit, or advantage, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant, or other assurance, of or for money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit whatsoever, directly or indirectly, in his own name or in the name of any other person, take, procure, or accept the next avoidance of or presentation to any benefice, with cure of souls or living ecclesiastical, and shall be presented, thereupon such presentation and every admission, institution, investiture, and induction upon the same shall be deemed a simoniacal contract; and it shall be lawful for the Crown to present or collate unto such benefice for that one time or turn only; and the person so corruptly taking, procuring, and accepting the said benefice or living ecclesiastical as aforesaid shall thereupon be adjudged a disabled person in law to have and enjoy the said benefice, and shall also be subject to any punishment, pains and penalties prescribed or inflicted by the laws ecclesiastical, in like manner as if such corrupt agreement had been made after such benefice had become vacant."

3. That you the said James John Merest are and have been for some years last past in holy orders of the said Church of England.

4. That by deed, dated the 29th Feb. 1863, the Rev. Henry O'Donnell, clerk, sold and conveyed the advowson of the vicarage and parish church of Upton-Snodsbury, in the county and diocese of Worcester, to one Murray Richard Workman.

5. That the said Murray Richard Workman purchased the said advowson from the said Henry O'Donnell with your knowledge, privity, and consent, with intent to present you, the said James John Merest to the said vicarage and parish church upon the then next avoidance, in pursuance of an agreement made by and between you and the said Murray Richard Workman in that behalf.

6. That about the end of the year 1867, or the beginning of the year 1868, you the said James John Merest made an agreement or promise by which you undertook to pay the said Murray Richard Workman a sum of money or otherwise to reward, profit, or benefit the said Murray Richard Workman, in consideration of his procuring for you the next avoidance of, or presentation to, the said vicarage and parish church, or of his presenting you, or causing you to be presented to, the same, on the then next avoidance thereof.

7. That you were thereupon and in pursuance of such agreement or promise of or for a sum of money, reward, profit, or benefit, as in the last preceding article mentioned, presented to the said vicarage and parish church by the said Murray Richard Workman on the next avoidance thereof, which said avoidance took place by and upon the resignation of the said Rev. Henry O'Donnell on or about the 25th March 1868.

8. That in or about the month of June 1868 it was agreed between you and the said James John Merest and the said Murray Richard Workman that in consideration of the said Murray Richard Workman obtaining for you the said next avoidance of, or presentation to, the said vicarage and parish church, or of his presenting, or causing you to be presented, to the same on such next avoidance as aforesaid, the said Murray Richard Workman should commence an action against you in the Court of Exchequer of Pleas at Westminster to recover the sum of 350l. as and for money lent to you by the said Murray Richard Workman, and that you should suffer judgment by default in the said action; and that on the 10th June 1868 an action was accordingly commenced in the said court, in which the said Murray Richard Workman was plaintiff, and you, the said James John Merest was defendant; and on the 22nd June 1868 the said Murray Richard Workman signed judgment against you in the said action for the sum of 350l. and costs.

9. That on the 3rd Aug. 1868 you, the said James John Merest, were, upon the presentation aforesaid, admitted and instituted to the vicarage and parish church of Upton-Snodsbury by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Worcester after you had made and subscribed the declaration against simony required by the Clerical Subscription Act 1865.

10. That by reason of the premises you the said James John Merest have been guilty of the offence of simony, and have knowingly entered into a simoniacal contract, and have by reason of an agreement or promise of, or for a sum of money, reward, gift, profit, benefit, or advantage taken, procured, or accepted the next avoidance of presentation to the said vicarage and parish church, and have been presented to the same thereupon.

11. That by reason of the premises you the said James John Merest have been corruptly and simoniacally promoted and presented to the said vicarage and parish church.

12. That you the said James John Merest were on the 19th Feb. last committed for trial at the then next assizes for the county of Worcester on a charge of knowingly and feloniously sending to the said Murray Richard Workman a letter, demanding money with menaces and without reasonable or probable cause.

13. That at the assizes for the said county, held at Worcester on Thursday, the 14th March last past, you the said James John Merest were acquitted on the charge in the last preceding article mentioned, no evidence being offered in support of the same by the said Murray Richard Workman; but you, the said James John Merest, then and there pleaded guilty to and were convicted of a charge of unlawfully threatening the said Murray Richard Workman to publish a libel upon and touching and concerning him, the said Murray Richard Workman, with intent in so doing to extort money from the said Murray Richard Workman, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and you were thereupon ordered to enter into your own recognisances in the sum of 250*l.* to appear and abide the judgment of the court when called upon.

14. That by reason of the premises there exist great scandal and evil report concerning you, the said James John Merest; and you have caused great scandal to the Church of God and your holy order to the hindering of the progress of true religion.

15. That by reason of the premises and of a certain Act of Parliament, passed in the session of Parliament holden in the 3rd and 4th years of Her present Majesty, being an Act for better enforcing church discipline, and of the letters of request under the hand and seal of the Lord Bishop of Worcester, in whose diocese you hold preferment, you were and are subject to the jurisdiction of this court.

16. And in part supply of proof of the matters hereinbefore alleged, and for all other lawful purposes herein, the proctor for the promoter annexes hereto, and prays to be taken and read as part hereof a paper writing marked A., being a true and authentic copy, certified under the hand of the proper officer in that behalf, of the original record, proceedings, and conviction of the said James John Merest, had, done, and made at the assizes for the county of Worcester, hereinbefore mentioned, or referred to in the 12th and 13th preceding articles, and also a paper writing marked B., being an office copy of the præcipe for the writ of summons in the action, in the 8th preceding article mentioned, and also a paper marked C., being a duly certified copy of the extract of the judgment signed in the said action in the 8th preceding article mentioned.

17. And the proctor for the promoter further propounds and alleges articles and objects that all and singular the premises are true public, and notorious, and he prays that, on legal proof thereof, the right honourable the official principal, or other the judge of this court, will be pleased to declare that the said James John Merest has offended against the said laws, statutes, constitutions and canons ecclesiastical in respect of the matters hereinbefore alleged, or of some one or more of them, and that he has incurred the sentence of degradation, or deprivation, or suspension from the ministry and from the performance of all clerical functions whatsoever within the province of Canterbury, and that he be involved in the pains and penalties of law for having been convicted and having caused such scandal as aforesaid, and that he be duly and canonically corrected and punished according to the gravity of his offences and the exigency of the law, and also that he be condemned in the costs made and incurred on the part and behalf of the said John Benjamin Lee, the promoter in this cause, and be compelled to the payment thereof, and that the said James John Merest is a disabled person in law to have and enjoy the said vicarage, and parish church of Upton-Snodsbury, and that his presentation to the said vicarage and parish church, and his admission and institution upon the same were and are utterly void and frustrate, and of no effect in law.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 29.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the office of the judge is promoted by the secretary of the Lord Bishop of Worcester against James John Merest, clerk in holy orders, and de facto vicar of the parish of Upton-Snodsbury in the county and diocese of Worcester. The case is sent by letters of request to this court, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, in the first instance. The offences charged against the clerk are two: first, that of simony, by reason of his having corruptly and simoniacally obtained presentation and institution to his vicarage; and, secondly, that of conduct unbecoming a clergyman in unlawfully threatening the Rev. Murray Richard Workman to publish a libel upon him with the intent of extorting money, of which offence he was duly convicted at the assizes for the county of Worcester held on March 4, 1869. This conviction for this offence was duly proved before me by the record of the conviction produced by the clerk of indictments on the Oxford Circuit. Upon the charge of simony the evidence may be briefly stated as follows: A certain Mr. O'Donnell was patron and incumbent of the benefice of Upton-Snodsbury at the beginning of the year 1868. He sold the advowson to the Rev. Murray Richard Workman, at whose prosecution the defendant has been convicted for the offence which I have mentioned. The deed of conveyance was produced and read before me. The date was Feb. 29, 1868; the purchase-money was 400*l.* Mr. O'Donnell resigned the living on March 24, 1868, and his resignation was accepted on the following day by the bishop. On May 27, following the defendant was presented by Mr. Workman to the benefice. On June 10 Mr. Workman brought an action against the defendant for the sum of 350*l.*, and on the 22nd recovered that sum—judgment being allowed to go by default “by arrangement,” as Mr. Workman in his evidence said, between the parties. Mr. Workman afterwards issued execution on his property, and levied 5*l.* On Aug. 3 the defendant was instituted upon the presentation of Mr. Workman to the benefice. The dates of these transactions, taken in conjunction with their character, and with the profession of the parties, all of whom I regret to say were clergymen, are calculated of themselves to excite a grave suspicion of corrupt practices connected with the presentation to this living. That suspicion has been turned into complete proof by the evidence, which has been adduced before me. The defendant, who has appeared in the suit by a proctor, has not appeared by counsel or in person before me in court; he has declined to plead any defence or give any issue but by his proctor, who is still before the court, has prayed justice. It appears from the evidence, that some quarrel took place between Mr. Workman and the defendant, from which probably has arisen the means of unravelling this transaction. Certain letters were produced in evidence before me, and were proved to have been used before the magistrates who committed the defendant for trial at Worcester. Among these letters were two which Mr. Workman proved were in his handwriting and were produced to him by the defendant's solicitor, when he, Workman, was cross-examined by the solicitor. The first letter bore date Nov. 19, 1867, and is as follows:—

Church and School Gazette Office, 10, Southampton-street, Strand, W.C.

My dear Sir,—As all the smaller livings are very dear in proportion, and your capital not sufficient to obtain one with possession, I propose getting some assistance for you, but in doing this I act without your knowledge, or my endeavours might be abortive. Hence I am silent for your own sake, and you also must be the same. Suffice it to say that the course I propose will cost you nothing. I wish to have Marston, in Derbyshire, for you, but, failing that, a rectory in North Devon, with 160*l.* and a house. This, however, is dearer, and Marston must be had if possible. You should not attempt Branksea when the weather is bad.

—Yours faithfully,

The Rev. J. J. Merest.

names of any living mentioned to you or your succession will be prevented.

The second letter was dated Dec. 19, 1867, and is as follows:

Church and School Gazette Office, 10, Southampton-street, Strand, W.C.

My dear Sir,—I enclose a copy of another letter for the bishop, which please send at once. The whole affair has been so far conducted very cleverly, and I am anxious for you not to spoil it by the least injudicious act or word. I have no time for more upon this subject to-day. As regards Upton-Snodsbury the income is from tithe and glebe, and the present net 120*l.* about; capable of improvement. There is only single duty, and each rector has either held a curacy of 80*l.*, or made that extra by occasional duty. It is three miles from Spetchley, and six miles from Worcester. There is no house at present, but there will be one shortly, and in the mean time you can have reasonable lodgings either at Spetchley or nearer into Worcester. It is a very nice place indeed; to my mind you could not have a more eligible little living. It is the presentation, not advowson. You have not enough money for the latter, and these small livings are all much dearer in proportion. In fact, they are most difficult to get hold of at all, and the trouble and difficulty I have for you cannot well be told. I spoke of Marston, but you would have to wait some time for it, and Upton is nicer. I withheld the name, having promised to do so till I heard definitively from your uncle, but he will render no help, and you want a small sum. I have now applied elsewhere, and if I can arrange all things I shall have to see you. I can help you to improve the income of Upton, and you can go to it at once. It is the cheapest and nicest thing I can get for you, and for some time to come the only one likely.—Yours faithfully, M. R. WORKMAN.

The Rev. J. J. Merest.

Your uncle's allowance will not come till Jan. 6, and he must not be asked for it. I enclose a check for 5*l.*

Mr. Workman said he had no doubt he had received answers to these letters, but he had not kept them. Taking these letters with their history, as proved in this court, in conjunction with the dates and the transactions to which I have referred, especially the transaction by which judgment for 350*l.* was recovered "by arrangement" between the presentee and the patron, it would be difficult to doubt that the presentation to this living was the result of a corrupt and simoniacal contract between the patron and the presentee. But that difficulty becomes a moral impossibility when it is remembered that it was competent to the defendant, as his proctor must have informed him, to have entered the witness box and have rebutted by an explanation if such were in his possession, the otherwise irresistible influence of guilt arising from the testimony and the circumstances to which I have adverted. I am of opinion that the promoter of my office has proved both the charges laid in the articles against the defendant. It is not necessary that I should refer to authorities for the purpose of establishing the jurisdiction of this court in cases of simony. That authority both as it rests upon the general ecclesiastical law, and upon the statute law, cannot be gainsaid; though happily the reported instances in which it has been exerted have been few and far between. The cases will be found collected under the title "Simony," in the last edition of Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 3. By the general law, and by the 40th canon of 1604, as by the stat. 31 Eliz. c. 6, the offence of simony is considered as one of a very grave character; and though the oath formerly taken under the 40th canon by the presentee against simony has been abolished by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 122, by the 2nd section of that statute a solemn declaration against simony has been substituted for it. The defendant, though not technically guilty of perjury, must have deliberately used upon a very solemn occasion a very solemn declaration, which he knew at the time he made it to be absolutely false. The stat. 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 12, has not, as far as I am aware, ever been put in force by the Ecclesiastical Court. By the second section of that statute, the obtaining by a clergyman the next avoidance of, or next presentation to, any benefice is treated as a simoniacal contract, and the presentation and institution are to be utterly void, frustrate, and of no effect in law, the simoniacal presentee is to be adjudged a disabled person in law to have the same benefice, and the Crown is to present for the next turn. I see no reason why this statute should not be put in force by this court; but I found my sentence as well upon the general ecclesiastical law as upon the statute law. I must, in accordance with the exigency of the law, pronounce that the defendant is a disabled person in law to have or enjoy the vicarage and parish church of Upton-Snodsbury, that the presentation thereto, and his admission and institution therefore are void and frustrate, and of no effect in law; and having regard to all the circumstances of this case, and the offence of misconduct, apart from the charge of simony proved against him, I must pronounce upon the defendant a sentence of deprivation from the ministry and from the performance of all clerical functions whatsoever in the province of Canterbury; and I must also order this sentence to be promulgated in the usual manner by affixing the same to the door of the church of Upton-Snodsbury for the usual time. I must further condemn the defendant in the costs of this suit. I shall also direct the registrar to apprise the Queen's proctor of this sentence in order that Her Majesty may exercise the right of presentation to the vacant benefice given by this statute.

Re THE EUROPEAN BANK (LIMITED); Ex parte THE ORIENTAL COMMERCIAL BANK (LIMITED).

Winding-up—Overdue bills of exchange—Purchase and subsequent sale—Equities affecting subsequent purchaser—Right to follow bills—Appeal motion—Completion of evidence—Practice as to costs.

P., with moneys of the O. Bank, of which he had been manager, but which, at the time of the purchase of certain bills by him, was being wound-up, purchased overdue bills of exchange drawn upon, and accepted by, the E. Bank, which was then also in liquidation. Two days after he sold these bills to the E. C. Co., then but recently incorporated, of which, by the articles of association, he was sole director:

Held, that P. must be taken to have acted in this last purchase, not as a partner in, but as an agent for, the E. C. Co., which was, therefore, not affected with notice of the fraud committed by him on the O. Bank, for he could not be taken to have disclosed his own fraud.

But, inasmuch as the bills were overdue when the E. C. Co. took them, that Co. had no better title than P. himself had; and if they had remained in his hands the O. Bank might clearly have followed their moneys into them.

Although the practice of the court admits new evidence on an appeal motion, yet where there was in the court below an incomplete case which was not completed until the appeal, no costs will be given to the successful appellant.

CHAN.] Re EUROPEAN BANK (LIMITED); Ex parte ORIENTAL COMMERCIAL BANK (LIMITED). [CHAN.]

This was an appeal by the liquidator of the Oriental Commercial Bank against an order of Malins, V.C., directing that a sum of money due from the European Bank upon certain bills of exchange drawn upon and accepted by them, which that bank (now in liquidation) was ready to pay, should be paid to the Eastern Commercial Company instead of the appellants, by whom it was claimed.

The evidence was considerable, but the judgment of Giffard, L.J., contains all that it is necessary to state in this respect, except that the Eastern Commercial Corporation was a company not registered until two days before the purchase on its behalf of the bills of exchange in question; that, by its articles of association, Mr. Demetrio Pappa, formerly the manager of the appellant's company, was appointed the first director thereof, there being no other; and that he was paid for the transfer of the bills out of the assets of the Eastern Commercial by means of a cheque drawn and signed by himself as its director.

Jackson and W. W. Karlake supported the appeal contending that the moneys paid for the bills clearly belonged to the appellants, and were fraudulently appropriated by Pappa; that as Pappa was a member of the Eastern Commercial, that company had notice of his fraud; and that that company could stand in no better position than he would have stood in if he had not parted with the bills, because they were overdue when he transferred them.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he was of opinion that the Eastern Commercial Bank were not affected through Pappa by the fraud he had committed on the Oriental Bank, and directed counsel for the respondents to confine themselves to the other points of the case.

Pearson, Q.C., and Locock Webb supported his Honour's order.

W. W. Karlake having replied,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—This is an appeal from an order of Malins, V.C., dismissing a summons taken out by the Oriental Commercial Bank. That summons had reference to certain bills drawn on, and accepted by, the European Bank. The holders are the Eastern Commercial Bank. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that the holders were entitled to the proceeds of the bills, and that the Oriental Commercial Bank had failed to prove their case. The European Bank is in liquidation, but willing to pay whoever is entitled. It is alleged on the part of the Oriental Commercial Bank that the bills in question were bought with their moneys by Demetrio Pappa, and that the Eastern Commercial Bank had notice of this through Demetrio Pappa, and that, whether they had notice or not, they can stand in no better position than Demetrio Pappa would have stood in if he had not parted with the bills, because they were overdue when he transferred them.

The first question to determine is whether Demetrio Pappa bought the bills wholly or in part with the moneys of the Oriental Commercial Bank. The bills are several in number for different sums, amounting in the whole to 1000*l.*, and he bought them on the 21st March 1867, for 15*s.* 4*d.* in the pound, when they were overdue. Demetrio Pappa, in his evidence before the Vice-Chancellor, swore in general terms that he bought them with his own moneys. He had an account with the National Bank of Scotland in the name of Geo. John Pappa, called "Geo. Jno. Pappa's Trust Account," and this account, he says, is his. It appears that there was paid in to this account, under date of the 19th March 1867, the sum of 2594*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.*, and drawn out under date of the 21st March as against that the sum of 2300*l.* The 2300*l.* was applied in the purchase of a number of bills, of which the bills in question formed part. The other bills were bills on the Oriental Commercial Bank for 2000*l.* The 2300*l.* was made up in part of a sum of 2094*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.*, which is clearly traced by an affidavit made and filed since the case was before the Vice-Chancellor. The purchase of the bills on the Oriental Commercial Bank for 2000*l.* and on the European Bank for 1000*l.* as one transaction, is proved by the affidavit of Arthur Cooper. [His Lordship then went through the evidence, which showed that John George Pappa, a cousin of Demetrio Pappa, was sent by him to Patras and elsewhere in the Mediterranean, to collect assets of, and debts due to, the Oriental Commercial Bank; that this was after the winding-up petition in the matter of that bank had been presented, upon which Arthur Cooper was appointed liquidator; that John George Pappa returned to London in March 1867 and handed the moneys he brought back with him to Demetrio Pappa—in all about 2094*l.* in bills upon London houses, and his reason for handing them to his cousin and not to the liquidator was that he had been sent out by the former and had to account to him; that the bills he so handed over he had bought with moneys which he had collected on account of the bank.] His Lordship then stated: This is how the question stood before the Vice-Chancellor, in whose opinion the case was not conclusively proved, but since the hearing before him fresh affidavits have been filed, one of which traces the whole transaction, and it is proved to demonstration that the 2094*l.* was the amount arising from the discount of bills belonging to the Oriental Commercial Bank, and that these, with a further sum of 500*l.*, constituted the sum which appeared in the trust account under date 19th March 1867, and that the sum of 2300*l.*, under date the 21st March on the other side of the account, was drawn out and applied in the purchase of the bills from Melas Brothers, of which the bills in question, amounting in all to 1000*l.*, formed part, the rest being bills for 2000*l.* on the Oriental Commercial Bank. To speak plainly, and in such a case there ought to be plain speaking, Demetrio Pappa has sworn that which is not true, and has applied to his own purposes the moneys arising from the discount of bills, which bills he knew belonged to the Oriental Commercial Bank.

Now, at all events, the facts have been proved, and it remains to be seen what the law is as applicable to these facts. The bills and moneys belonging to the Oriental Commercial Bank were not received either by J. G. Pappa or Demetrio until after the presentation of the petition for winding-up that bank; therefore no question of account as between the bank and Demetrio Pappa arises. The 237*l.* which was paid over by Jno. G. Pappa to the liquidator has nothing to do with this matter; it is no way concluded by any receipt given by or settlement of accounts with the official liquidator, and if the bills in question were now in the hands of

CHAN.] Re CONSTANTINOPLE AND ALEXANDRIA HOTELS CO. (LIMITED); EBBETT'S CASE. [CHAN.]

Demetrio Pappa, beyond all question the Oriental Commercial Bank could follow their moneys into them, and assert a right to a proportional part of the proceeds. Is, then, the Eastern Commercial Company in any better position than Demetrio Pappa would have been? In my opinion they were not affected with notice through Demetrio Pappa. He purchased the bills before the Eastern Commercial Company was formed. He stood in the relation of vendor to that bank, and though he was managing director and something more, and paid himself by cheque, he is not in the position of a partner in an ordinary firm, but of agent acting for the bank as his principal. He cannot be taken to have disclosed his own fraud. Kennedy v. Green therefore applies; but the want of notice is not conclusive on the case. The bills were overdue when the Eastern Commercial Company took them—there were equities affecting the bills, and the Eastern Commercial Company has no better title, either legal or equitable, than Demetrio Pappa had. The law on this subject cannot be better stated than by Malins, V.C. in Ex parte Swan, in pp. 359 and 360 of his judgment.

In this case there is an equity attaching directly to the bills. The result, therefore, is that the Oriental Commercial Bank can follow their moneys into the bills in the possession of the Eastern Commercial Company precisely in the same way as though Demetrio Pappa had not parted with them. I have not calculated the exact amount which was applied in payment of these bills, but the amount applied in payment of them and the other bills was 2300*l.*, and the 2300*l.* was drawn against a sum of 2594*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.*, which was made up of a sum of 2094*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* belonging to the Oriental Commercial Bank, and of 500*l.* belonging to Demetrio Pappa, and it must be taken, according to the case of Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De G. M. & G. 372, that those two sums contributed rateably. It will follow that the Oriental Commercial Bank is entitled to so much of the proceeds of the bills as is represented by their proportion of the purchase-money, and the Eastern Commercial Company by so much as is represented by the 500*l.*—the proportion will be somewhere about four-fifths and a fraction on the one side, and a fraction less than one-fifth on the other. There will be a declaration to this effect and payment accordingly. The amounts can be calculated.

As regards costs, the European Bank are in the position of plaintiffs in an interpleader suit, and must have them both here and below out of the fund. The other parties must bear their own costs. The Oriental Commercial Bank have failed in part, that is as regards the 500*l.*, and they completed their case by evidence which was not before the Vice-Chancellor. The practice of the court admits of the introduction of new evidence on an appeal motion; but where there is an incomplete case in the court below, and a complete one only on the appeal, I shall, as a general rule, adopt the course of refusing to give any costs.

The order of the Vice-Chancellor will be discharged, and the order I have suggested substituted for it. If the additional evidence had been before him, I gather from his judgment that his order would have been the same as that which I now make.

Re CONSTANTINOPLE AND ALEXANDRIA HOTELS COMPANY (LIMITED); EBBETT'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Contributory — Infant — Confirmation.

An infant applied for shares in a company, and they were duly allotted to him. Five months after he attained 21. Fourteen months after that, the company was ordered to be wound-up, and during that period the infant did nothing to repudiate the shares which were registered in his name:

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that the infant was liable as a contributory, inasmuch as he could not be heard after what had taken place to say that the contract to take the shares was voidable by him.

This was an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls fixing a Mr. Ebbetts on the list of contributories of this company in respect of 150 shares which were registered in his name. The hearing before the Master of the Rolls is reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574, and it is only necessary now to state that Mr. Ebbetts applied for the shares when he was an infant; that they were duly allotted to him and registered in his name; and that the order to wind-up the company was not made till fourteen months after Mr. Ebbetts attained twenty-one. During that period of fourteen months he took no steps to repudiate the shares. The Master of the Rolls held that he must be placed on the list of contributories and from this decision he appealed.

Ince, argued the appellant's case, relying mainly on some new evidence to show that notice of allotment was never given to the appellant.

Bevir, for the official liquidator, was not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that, assuming notice of allotment to have been given to the appellant this was as clear a case as possible. For more than a year after the appellant attained twenty-one, the company continued to carry on business as a going concern, and during that period he never took any steps to repudiate, and in that state of things he could not afterwards be heard to say the contract to take the shares was voidable on his part. As to the question of allotment, the evidence failed to show that notice of the allotment was not given to the appellant. It was to be regretted that the practice upon appeal motions admitted of an entirely different case being brought forward on appeal from that which was made on the original hearing, and the present case was an instance of the mischief resulting from that practice. His Lordship, without hesitation, dismissed the appeal with costs.

Re THE PANAMA, NEW ZEALAND AND AUSTRALIAN ROYAL MAIL COMPANY (LIMITED); Ex parte THE OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR.

Company — Borrowing powers — Debenture — "Undertaking" — Charge on — Priority among creditors.

A company, having power to borrow money upon mortgage of its property, or effects, or upon bonds or debentures, or upon such other security as the directors might think fit, issued so-called "Mortgage Debentures" under their common seal, charging the said "Undertaking" and all sums of money arising therefrom, and all the estate, right, title and interest of the company therein, with payment of the sum borrowed and interest. The principal was to be repaid on the 2nd January, 1870; but, in the year 1868 the company was ordered to be wound-up:

Held (affirming the decision of Malins, V.C.), that the word "Undertaking" had reference to all the property of the company, not only that which it possessed at the date of the debenture, but everything which might afterwards become its property, and therefore that the debenture holders possessed a priority over the general creditors.

So soon as the company had to be wound-up, the rights of the debenture holders attached, and put them in as good a position as if, their interest and principal being unpaid, they had filed a bill to enforce their debentures against the company's property.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of this company, which is now being wound-up in the chambers of Malins, V.C., against an order whereby his Honour decided that the holders of certain debentures issued by the company were a charge upon the property of the company which gave them a priority over the general creditors.

In the month of June 1866, the company were in need of money, and the board of directors being empowered to borrow money for the purposes of the company, either upon mortgage of the whole or any part of the property or effects of the company, or upon bonds or debentures of the company, or upon such other security, and upon such terms and conditions as they might from time to time think fit, issued a circular inviting applications for the issue of debentures, which referred to the large number of steam vessels and other ships belonging to the company, and the original costs of such vessels and ships, and pointed out that they afforded ample security for the sums intended to be raised.

The debentures issued were in the following form:

The Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company (Limited).

Mortgage Debenture, 100l.—No. 403.

By virtue of the powers contained in our articles of association, we the Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company (Limited), in consideration of the sum of £1. paid to us by _____ are held and firmly bound, and do hereby for ourselves, our successors and assigns, charge the said undertaking, and all sums of money arising therefrom, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the company therein, with payment to the said _____, his executors, administrators, or assigns of the said sum of 100l., together with interest for the same at the rate of 6l. for every 100l. by the year, the principal sum to be repaid on the 2nd Jan. 1870, and the interest to be payable in the meantime half-yearly, on the 1st Jan. and the 1st July in each year, until the repayment thereof.

Given under our common seal this 4th Jan. 1870.

Interest, as stipulated, was paid on such of the debentures as were issued until the 1st July 1868, soon after which day the winding-up order was made. The question which was the subject of the appeal then arose between the holders of the debentures on the one hand, and the company's general creditors, represented by the official liquidator on the other, and the learned Vice-Chancellor having pronounced the decision above stated, the official liquidator appealed.

Cole, Q.C., and Lindley, supported the appeal, relying upon Pearson, Q.C., and Hastings, in support of his Honour's order were not called on.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said: This is an appeal from an order of Malins, V.C., by which he has declared that the mortgage debentures issued under the seal of the company are a charge upon the proceeds of the sale of the company's vessels and other property. Now before going to the terms of the mortgage deed itself, one may first of all deal with the cases; and of course the cases which have been quoted as to policies of insurances can have no application to the present; for the policies of insurance have a very different effect, and are of a very different nature to these debentures. Neither can Gardner v. The London, Chatham and Dover Railway Company have any application to this, because in that case there was a particular, peculiar subject matter over which it was held that the debenture operated—that is to say, a permanent railway which it was well known to everybody was permanent and could not be touched by judgment-creditors, and could not be mortgaged or sold, or dealt with in any way. And all that Gardner's case decided was, that in that particular instance, having regard to the position of the parties, there was a particular subject-matter which was intended to be affected by the instrument, and no other. The same thing might be said of the other cases which have been referred to. What I have to decide in the present case is simply this—what are the rights of the debenture holders, the state of things being that the company is being wound-up, and that the whole of its property is being realised? I confess that I can have no doubt whatever as to what the effect of the debenture is. First of all, as regards the power given to the company, there was a power given to mortgage and a power to raise money by debentures; but of course the company might include in one and the same instrument a mortgage and a debenture—that is to say, a mortgage and a bond. Accordingly they did issue what they called a mortgage debenture, which was in substance a bond, and a charge upon their property for the sum borrowed on bond. The terms of the instrument are not an assignment, but a charge; the company charge the undertaking, and all sums of money arising therefrom, and all estate, right, title, and interest of the company therein, with payment of the principal sum and interest. I asked in the course of the argument what could be the subject-matter of that charge, and the answer given was that there were valuable contracts, and that all that the charge was meant to cover was the income arising from the business being carried on, and that it would not extend to property such as the ships and other matters of that sort, which were absolutely essential to the carrying on of the concern. I cannot accede to any such proposition as that. I have no hesitation in saying that in this particular case, and having regard to the state of this particular company, the word "undertaking" had reference to all the property of the company, not only such as existed at the date of the debenture, but whatever might afterwards belong to the company. And I take the object and meaning of the debenture to be this, that the word "undertaking" necessarily implies that the company will go on. I take it that even the debenture holder could not interfere until either the interest which was due was unpaid, or until the period had arrived for the payment of his principal, and he continued unpaid; and I take it that the meaning and object of the undertaking was this, that the company might go on during that interval; and furthermore, if the debenture holder chose to stand by, that he would not be entitled to any account of mesne profits, or of any dealing with the property of the company in the ordinary course of carrying on their business. I do not at all say this of such things as sales of property or mortgages of property, but the ordinary application of funds and property which came into the hands of the company, as, for instance, the ordinary using of their coals and other matters of that description. I see no difficulty in giving that effect to this instrument, and I cannot see that any difficulty will arise from its being so construed. But the moment you come to this, that the company has to be wound-up, and the property has to be realised, that moment the rights of these parties beyond all question attach, and they are in quite as good, if not in a better, position than if, their interest being unpaid and their principal being unpaid, they had filed a bill. My opinion is that even if the company had not stopped they might have filed a bill, and they could not have been in a worse position than a judgment creditor. I cannot see, having regard to the position of these parties, why they could not have filed a bill and realised their securities if the company did not choose to pay them their principal and interest. But seeing that the company is being wound-up, and that all I have to determine is simply between them and the general creditors, I hold that under these debentures they have a charge upon all property of the company, past and future, by the use of the term "undertaking," and that they stand in a position superior to that of the general creditor, who can touch nothing until they are paid.

The application must be refused with costs, and the matter will go back to the Vice-Chancellor.

Re THE ESTATES COMPANY (LIMITED AND REDUCED).

Companies Act 1867—30 & 31 Vict. c. 131, s. 10—Company limited and reduced—Reduction of capital—Change of name—Time for which the words "and reduced" ought to be used.

When an order is made by the court, under the powers conferred by the Companies Act 1867, confirming resolutions passed by a Company for the reduction of its capital, as a general rule the company will be ordered to continue to use the words "and reduced" as part of its title for three months from the date of the order: (Re Sharp, Stewart, and Co., L. Rep. 5 Eq. 155; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197.)

This company passed resolutions under the Companies Act 1867, to reduce their capital. A petition was then presented for an order to confirm these resolutions. An order accordingly was made by Stuart, V.C., but his Honour was of opinion that the company ought to continue to use the words as part of their title until the date of their dissolution or previous winding-up, and directed accordingly. (See 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119.) From this direction the company appealed.

Greene, Q.C., and Wickens, on behalf of the company, urged that three months from the date of the Vice Chancellor's order was a sufficient period for the use of the words "and reduced" as part of the company's title. That was the period fixed by Hatherley, L. C., when Vice-Chancellor, in Re Sharp, Stewart, and Co., L. Rep. 5 Eq. 155; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197. It would be an injury to the company to have to use the words "and reduced" as long as they existed. There was no reason for a longer period than three months in the present case, as the company was entirely an English one, and had no foreign creditors or shareholders.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he should fix the same period as was fixed by Wood, V.C. in Re Sharp, Stewart, and Co., viz., three months from the date of the order, for the use of the words "and reduced" as part of the company's title.

Ex parte GOODIER; Re GOODIER.

Bankruptcy—Order of discharge—Refusal to grant—Contracting debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them—F frivolous or vexatious defence to an action or suit—Patent suit—Defence—Costs—The B. A. 1861, s. 159, cl. 3.

In order that a bankrupt's order of discharge may be refused under sect. 159 of the B. A. 1861, on the ground that he could not have had, when any of his debts were contracted, any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same, it is necessary that the debts in question should be strictly debts arising out of contract. It is not enough that they be debts provable in the bankruptcy.

The costs payable by an unsuccessful defendant to a patent suit, though provable by the plaintiff in the defendant's bankruptcy, are not a debt arising out of contract.

*A suit was instituted by B. against G. to restrain the latter from infringing B.'s patent, and for an account and other consequential relief. The validity of the patent had been already established at law in an action against another infringer. G. defended the suit, and at the hearing issues were directed by the Master of the Rolls to try the validity of the patent. On the trial a verdict was found in favour of G. B. moved for a new trial, and the motion, though resisted by G., was successful. The new trial took place, and a verdict was found in favour of B. After this G. moved for a new trial, and his motion was refused by the Master of the Rolls and also by the Lord Chancellor on appeal. A decree was then made granting a perpetual injunction against G., and he was ordered to pay the costs of the suit. An inquiry as to damages was also directed. During the proceedings, G. executed an assignment for his creditors, and the defence of the suit was after that carried on at the cost of other persons who were interested in contesting the validity of the patent, though it was conducted in the name of G. After the decree was made, G. became a bankrupt. The costs of the suit, including those of the trials at law, amounted to more than 12,000*l.* G. had scarcely any other debts, but his assets were only about 50*l.* B. waived his right to damages, and proved in the bankruptcy for the costs:*

Held (reversing a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy) that the costs of the suit were not a debt contracted by the bankrupt, and also that the bank-rupt's defence of the suit was not frivolous or vexatious. Held, therefore, that he was entitled to an immediate order of discharge.

This was an appeal from an order of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy refusing to grant to Mr. James Goodier, a bankrupt, any order of discharge. The adjudication of bankruptcy was on the 18th of March, 1869, and proceeded upon a petition presented by the bankrupt himself on the same day. The bankrupt filed the usual accounts, and passed his last examination. His balance-sheets, filed with the proceedings, showed that his debts amounted to 12,221*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, his assets to 53*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*; but the only debt which was proved was the sum of 12,216*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* due to Messrs. Benjamin and Walter Bovill, being the amount due to them for costs under an order and decree of the High Court of Chancery in a suit commenced by the late George Bovill (whose executors they are), and continued by them until its termination against the bankrupt, as the sole defendant.

After a lengthy examination of the facts the Chief Judge concluded his judgment thus:—

"I am asked now to decide whether, having regard to the manner in which, and the circumstances under which, the debt proved has been contracted, the bankrupt has contracted any of his debts at a time when he could not have had any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same. Considering the condition to which he had reduced himself in Aug. 1866 (while as yet the amount of costs incurred was comparatively small), and that he must be taken to have known that, from that time at least, if the decision should be against him, he had no means of satisfying any costs for which he might become liable, while the utmost success in the litigation would be simply to defray some of the costs which his solicitor and the millers incurred in his name, but on their behalf—and seeing that the debt due for costs is provable and has been proved in this bankruptcy—I am of opinion that on this head the case falls within the provisions of the 159th section. Another question to be decided is whether the bankrupt has put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense, by a frivolous or vexatious defence to a suit for recovering a sum of money due from him. In four different courts, before four different judges, the plaintiff's right has been established, and by the ultimate decree his right to be paid by the defendant the money claimed by the plaintiff at the time when the bill was filed, and which was then a debt, although the amount of it was not then ascertained, has been decreed. The evidence satisfies me that the defence, at least from the month of August 1866, has been merely vexatious; that the bankrupt has lent his name to the proceedings which have been carried on with the full conviction that, if the plaintiff should ultimately succeed, he could not procure payment of the money for which he sued the bankrupt, nor of the costs which had been incurred, either from the bankrupt or from those persons whom he had permitted to use his name for a merely vexatious purpose. Upon the principles upon which the law of bankruptcy has always been administered, it has been established that when a bankruptcy has been resorted to, not for the legitimate purposes of bankruptcy, but to answer and cover some merely ulterior or foreign purpose, the mere name and colour which may have been adopted are not effectual to accomplish such purpose. Various Acts of Parliament have been passed modifying and regulating the proceedings, and embracing cases not before contemplated, and combinations of circumstances which the earlier statutes had not provided for adequately; but I am not aware that the primal original principles upon which the administration of the law in bankruptcy is founded have ever been abrogated, and, as I read the law, a bankruptcy which has been instituted and prosecuted, not for the legitimate purpose for which that law was established, is as it has always been, an abuse of the law and of the proceedings in the court in which it has been practised. It is needless to consider in the case what might have been the decision if an application had been made to dismiss the petition upon the ground that it had emanated from a debtor who had substantially only one creditor, and who, having no estate to distribute, had resorted to the court for the purpose only of defeating the just rights of that creditor; for no such application has been made to me. To grant the order of discharge in the present case would confer upon the bankrupt a full and unqualified immunity from every claim that his creditors could make; to withhold that order is merely to leave him liable to satisfy, if by any change in his fortunes he shall be able to satisfy, demands the justice of which is open to no question. He is in no danger in any event of personal imprisonment, and I cannot conceive that, having regard to his conduct, and to the provisions of the statute, he is for any reason entitled to the protection and immunity which he claims, as to any property which he may hereafter become possessed of or entitled to. Under these circumstances, having given the best consideration I can bestow to the case before me, I am forced to the conclusion that the bankrupt, upon the grounds I have before stated, has disentitled himself to the protection which would be afforded by an order of discharge. I must, therefore, refuse the order of discharge for which he has applied."

From this decision Mr. Goodier appealed.

Little, Q.C. and Ford North, on behalf of the appellant, argued that it was settled by previous decisions, that to bring a bankrupt within the provision of sect. 159, the debt in question must, in the strictest sense, have arisen out of contract.

Ex parte Glass, re Boswall, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S., 407; Re New and Thorne, 31 L. J. 87, Bank.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 732;

Ex parte Crabtree, re Taylor, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S., 361;

Ex parte Griffiths, re Griffiths, Ib. 705;

Re Clayton, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 342; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 13.

The debt in this case was simply one for costs and even the suit itself was not one to recover a debt. Moreover, the circumstances properly considered showed that the bankrupt's defence to the suit was not frivolous or vexatious.

De Gex, Q.C., and Bagley, for the respondents, argued that the cases cited for the appellant were distinguishable from the present case. In a patent suit the plaintiff in equity in effect adopted what had been done by the defendant, and, treating him as his agent, asked an account of the profits which he had made. And with regard to the costs, each party to an action entered into an implied contract with his adversary to pay his costs if unsuccessful. An implied contract was enough to satisfy the words of sect. 159. Moreover, the suit was one to recover a sum of money. The prayer of the bill asked for an account and payment of what should be found due. And the defence was frivolous and vexatious at any rate after the second trial, the validity of the patent having been affirmed in the year 1867 in several other suits, e.g., Bovill v. Crates and Bovill v. Smith. They referred to

Without calling for a reply :

Lord Justice GIFFARD said: I have had a full opportunity of considering this case during the course of the very able arguments that have taken place on both sides. Certainly if it had stood under the old law, and the case had been left to my discretion, I should not have been disposed to differ from the Chief Judge; but my hands are completely tied by the 159th section of the Act of 1861. I have no doubt that the cases which have been decided upon the subject were more or less present to the learned judge's mind when he decided this case, because he goes into reasoning for the purpose of pointing out how in his opinion the matter is brought within the Act of Parliament. Now, I think it may be as well first of all to consider the cases which have been decided under the 159th section of the Act. The first of those cases is Ex parte Glass; Re Boswall, in which there was the most flagrant conduct on the bankrupt that there could possibly be. I may call it shockingly flagrant and criminal conduct. There was an action for damages, and although it was a debt certainly proveable under the commission, inasmuch as the verdict was before the proceedings in bankruptcy, the court held that it could not take into consideration the conduct of the bankrupt in respect to that. Then there have been the cases of Re New and Thorne, of Ex parte Crabtree, and of Ex parte Griffiths, and I believe in all these cases, although some of them were for damages for seduction, others of them were for damages which had been recovered in the Divorce Court, the court held that these cases gave no jurisdiction whatever to interfere. And although, in one of them at all events, the bankrupt had made himself a bankrupt with the sole view of escaping liability in respect of these damages, the court with reference to that could not help itself. But if these bankruptcy proceedings and those bankruptcy proceedings had stood till there was an application for a discharge, the bankrupt was entitled to his discharge, unless it could be proved that he had committed some one of the offences pointed out in the 159th section. Now, in this case it is alleged that two offences have been committed. I quite agree that what the court has to do is this: the court has to proceed to consider the conduct of the bankrupt before and after adjudication, and the manner and circumstances in and under which his debts have been contracted. The court is to consider that, but it is not to found itself entirely upon that consideration—it must go on further, and what the Act of Parliament says is this, that if the court shall be of opinion that the bankrupt has done certain specified things, then the court may refuse his discharge. Now, the first offence charged against this bankrupt is that "he could not have had, when any of his debts were contracted, any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same." As I understand the learned judge, he is of opinion that if the debt was proveable in the bankruptcy it would come within the meaning of that clause. That is in opposition, undoubtedly, to the decided cases. The mere fact of a debt being proveable will not bring it within the meaning of the section. It must be, in some sense or other, a debt "contracted"—that is to say, not a debt which is the result, at all events, of proceedings in tort. What the amount of the debt in respect of the user of the patent in this case would have been I do not know. The user of the patent prima facie would be a tort, but there is a good deal in Mr. De Gex's argument that where there is a tort of that description the plaintiff may waive the tort, and affirm the act, and take it as being quasi ex contractu. There is a good deal in that, but there is not before me a single fact or any means of ascertaining what amount was due, whether it was 5*l.* or 50*l.*, in respect of the actual use of the patent—nothing but the costs of the suit, and I do not hesitate to say that the costs of the suit are not a debt "contracted" within the meaning of the clause. Nor can I draw any distinction between costs in a suit and damages given in proceedings in the Divorce Court, or damages for a malicious injury, as in Re Boswall. I am satisfied that the costs alone stand entirely in the same category as the cases of damages, and that defending the suit and thereby incurring costs is not contracting a debt within the meaning of the 159th section, and the cases have laid it down that merely because the debt is proveable in the bankruptcy is not enough to bring it within the section.

That disposes of the first part of the case. I have then to come to the second part of the case which is this: Has, or has not, the bankrupt put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense by a frivolous or vexatious defence to any action or suit to recover any debt or money due from him? I think doubts might be entertained whether this is not altogether outside the section, but I do not at all found my judgment on any such doubts. I quite admit Mr. De Gex's proposition, founding it on that case of the action at law where coals were improperly taken from another man's land and sold, and then an action was maintained for money had and received, but although I admit, for the purposes of this decision, that it is possible that a suit affirming the use of a patent, and asking for an account in respect of profits, would be a suit within the meaning of this clause; yet, on looking at all the circumstances of the case, to say that this defence was frivolous or vexatious would, I think, be going far beyond anything that this court would be justified in doing. Just observe, for a moment, what the grounds are upon which it is said by the learned judge in the court below that this defence was frivolous and vexatious. What he says is this, "That subsequently to Aug. 1864 this gentleman gave up his business as a miller, that he was brought to a standstill, that he was quite aground, that he had no money to go on, and could not go on, and his solicitor says to him, there are persons in communication with me who have great interest in contesting this patent; they will supply the money for going on with this litigation, if you will allow the litigation to go on in your name." The first thing that would occur to one would be this—if a number of gentlemen were ready to supply the money for the purpose of going on with this litigation, they, at least, one would think, must have had some opinion that there was a chance of success in that litigation, for it is quite manifest that it was not done to assist Mr. Goodier, but for the purpose of having the patent declared invalid. It is manifest, also, that such must have been the opinion of Mr. Wynne, the bankrupt's solicitor, and the position of Mr. Goodier at the time undoubtedly was this, that supposing he had stopped at that moment he would have been entirely at Mr. Bovill's mercy, and Mr. Bovill might have made him a bankrupt, or done anything he chose with him. He must have known that, and supposing that it had stopped there, the costs would have amounted to 3000*l.* or 4000*l.* I cannot say, nor do I think, that this gentleman was not advised at that time that there was a reasonable prospect of success, nor can I say but that the litigation was at that time of a very doubtful character. The records of all the courts in the kingdom show that if there is one thing which is more uncertain than another, it is the questions with respect to patents, and still more so is litigation uncertain with respect to a patent for a combination, more especially where that combination is of a most complicated character. In this case no doubt the validity of the patent had been more or less affirmed by at least one decision in the Court of Queen's Bench before the suit was instituted against this gentleman. But the suit was instituted against him, replication was filed, evidence was entered into, the case was heard before the Master of the Rolls, and probably, principally because there appears to have been some evidence on which the plaintiff had not satisfied the court, the Master of the Rolls thought himself bound to direct an issue. He came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding Sir J. Rolt's Act, and although there had been a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench affirming the validity of this patent, yet that he was not entitled at the solemn hearing of the cause, on evidence given and replication filed, to do more than grant what was really an interim injunction, and to direct an issue. Up to that time I cannot say there was anything either frivolous or vexatious in the defence to that proceeding. Then, what is the next step? The issue is tried, and upon one material point, unquestionably, of the several issues directed in the case, there is a finding against Mr. Bovill. Then Mr. Bovill moves for a new trial in consequence of that finding. Am I to say that when a man has been to a jury under those circumstances, and been successful to that extent, that it is frivolous or vexatious in him (because he happens to be a poor man, and not to have the means of paying), to resist the motion for a new trial, and to see whether he cannot hold that verdict which he has obtained from the jury? I cannot come to any such conclusion. Then a new trial was granted. Is there anything frivolous or vexatious in his going again before another jury to see whether he cannot obtain the same result from another jury which he had obtained from the jury before? I cannot say there was anything frivolous or vexatious in that second trial, although the result of the trial happened to be adverse to the defendant. Then there was a motion for a new trial before the Master of the Rolls, which, as he said he had a bias in the case, was not discussed before him, but was refused pro formâ, and was taken at once before the Lord Chancellor. Does the Lord Chancellor say that the motion before him was frivolous or vexatious, or that there was no ground for it, or that the case was not open to argument, or that it was not a matter on which different persons might fairly and reasonably entertain a different opinion? He says nothing of the sort. I am therefore of opinion that there was no offence within the meaning of the statute in the shape of a frivolous or vexatious defence to a suit such as this. As I have said, I do not think it necessary to say that certainly this is a suit within the meaning of the Act, although if it had been the only question I had to determine upon it I should certainly have taken time to consider and have reserved my judgment; but, assuming it be a suit within the meaning of the section, still I say that when he has come to a particular stage of the proceedings, those proceedings being matters about which reasonable people might entertain a reasonable doubt, and advice might be given in one way or another, and a number of persons are ready to subscribe to the litigation because they think the result of it may possibly put an end to this patent, I cannot by possibility say that this is a frivolous or vexatious defence. That being so, I think this gentleman is entitled to his discharge. I can only say, as I have said in a former case, it is to be regretted the law was in that state, and it is matter of congratulation that the present state of the law is very different to what it was under the statute of 1861.

Re STREET (a Solicitor).

Solicitor and client—Taxation—Time of application—Payment—Order to tax—5 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 41.

The 41st section of the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act (5 & 7 Vict. c. 73), does not apply to a bill of costs which has not been delivered.

Accordingly, where a solicitor, who was trustee for sale of three estates belonging to the same cestuis que trust, sold the estate at different times, and after each sale retained the amount of his bill of costs out of the purchase-money, and obtained a receipt from the cestuis que trust, who also signed the accounts, but the solicitor did not deliver the bills of costs till some time afterwards:

Held, that, notwithstanding the fact that more than twelve months had elapsed between the delivery of the first bill, and the taking out of the summons to tax, the three bills must be taxed.

Adjourned summons. This was an application for an order to tax three bills of costs relating to the sale of three estates, of which the solicitor, Mr. Street, was a trustee for sale, empowered by the trust-deed to charge for business done by him as solicitor. The three sales were completed in Aug. 1867, Sept. 1868, and July 1869 respectively; on the completion of each sale Mr. Street retained the amount of his bill of costs out of the purchase-money, and sent to each of the cestuis que trust an account crediting him with his share of the purchase-money, and deducting his share of the costs. He then paid the balance to the cestuis que trust, each of whom gave him a written receipt for his share and signed the account. The bills of costs were delivered on the 30th Dec. 1868, the 25th Feb. 1869, and the 18th Aug. 1869 respectively. The solicitor of the applicants made an affidavit in which he deposed that various items in each of the bills were in his opinion overcharges.

The summons for taxation was taken out on the 10th Jan. 1870, and the application as to the first of the three bills was resisted on the ground that it had been paid more than twelve months before the summons was taken out, and as to all the bills it was resisted on the ground that they had been paid under the 41st section of the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), which provides that the payment of a bill of costs shall in no case preclude the court or judge to whom application shall be made from referring such bill for taxation, if the special circumstances of the case shall in the opinion of such court or judge appear to require the same, upon such terms and conditions and subject to such directions as to such court or judge shall seem right, provided the application for such reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment.

Rasch, in support of the summons, contended that retainer by the solicitor of the amount of his bills of costs out of the purchase-money did not constitute payment under the 41st section of the Act. He cited:

Re Harper, 10 Beav. 284.

Speed, for the solicitor, contended that the cestuis que trust having given a receipt for the purchase-money and signed the accounts, there had been payment within the words of the 41st section of the Act. He cited

Ex parte Hemmings; Re Bischoff and Coxe, 28 L. T. Rep. O. S. 144.

LORD ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that all these bills must be taxed. The 41st section of the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act does not apply to a bill that has not been delivered. Here the amounts of the bills of costs were retained by the solicitor out of the purchase-moneys, and the balance was made over to the cestuis que trust, who severally gave receipts and signed the accounts. This is not the species of payment that can be pleaded under the 41st section of the Act. Moreover, all these sales formed one transaction, and the cestuis que trust would have been justified in saying that they would not pay one bill till they saw them all together; the lapse of over twelve months from the date of the delivery of one of the bills before the summons to tax was taken out, is, therefore, immaterial. This is not a case in which a common order to tax could have been obtained, and it was quite necessary to come here.

Solicitors for the applicants, Tanqueray, Willaume, and Co.

Cohen (with him Jessel, Q.C.), for Bates, contended that as the two debts were admitted, and the amounts of them ascertained, there was a clear right of set-off, which was not affected by the winding-up. He cited:

Castelli v. Boddington, 20 L. T. Rep. O. S. 64; 1 Ell. & Bl. 66;

Luckie v. Bushby, 21 L. T. Rep. O. S. 186; 13 C. B. 864;

Porter v. Cooper, 1 Cr. M. & R. 387;

Re Agra and Masterman's Bank, Anderson's case, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 337; 36, L. J. 73, Ch.;

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Robinson, for the liquidator, contended that there could be no set-off, inasmuch as Bates's claim had not been admitted, and the amount of it had not been ascertained until after the commencement of the winding-up.

LORD ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that there must be a set-off. An ascertained amount is due by the company to Bates, and another equally ascertained amount is due by Bates to the company, and the debts are admitted by both parties. Why then should there not be a set-off? The fact that the company is in liquidation makes no difference. If this were not a case for a set-off, there never could be such a case. The rule is the same both at law and in equity; the amounts of the debts must be ascertained. There must therefore be a set-off, and Mr. Bates must have leave to prove for the balance.

Re PROGRESS ASSURANCE COMPANY; Ex parte BATES.

Company—Winding-up—Set-off—Insurance premiums—Claim allowed after winding-up.

B. insured a ship with a company. The ship was lost, and B. sent in his claim, which was not, however, admitted till after the company had been ordered to be wound-up. B. owed the company a sum for premiums on other policies of insurance. The amounts owing from and to the company were ascertained and admitted:

Held, that B. was entitled to set-off the amount owing by him to the company against the company's debt to him, and that the winding-up did not affect his right.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Edward Bates, that a sum due from him to the Progress Assurance Company, which was being wound-up voluntarily under the supervision of the court for premiums on policies of marine insurance, might be set-off against a claim made by him against the company on another policy, and that he might be allowed to prove for the balance.

In Dec. 1868, Bates effected an insurance with the above company for 2000*l.* on the ship Sarah Sands, for a voyage from Liverpool to Bombay. The ship was lost on her voyage, and in June 1869, before the commencement of the winding-up, Bates sent in his claim which was not, however, admitted till after the winding-up had commenced.

The sum of 166*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* was due from Bates to the company for premiums on policies. Shortly after the commencement of the winding-up, which took place on the 26th June 1869, the liquidator brought an action against Bates for the amount due for premiums, whereupon Bates applied for leave to bring an action for the amount due to him in respect of the loss of the Sarah Sands. The present summons was subsequently taken out by arrangement to settle the question.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 22 and 23.

COOPER v. COOPER.

Election—Power—Valid appointment by deed—Subsequent invalid appointment by will.

A testatrix, who by a deed had validly exercised a power of appointment over certain real estate in favour of her three sons in equal shares, by her will, after affecting to appoint the same property in favour of her eldest son absolutely, gave divers benefits to the second son, and the children of the third son, who had died since the first appointment. This second appointment was, in a suit for the administration of the property, held to be invalid. Subsequently, the eldest son instituted proceedings for the purpose of compelling his surviving brother and the children of his deceased brother, to elect between the benefits conferred upon them by the will and their respective shares under the deed.

Held that there was no case for election.

This cause came on for further consideration upon a question as to whether a case of election arose under the following circumstances:—

William Cooper, by his will dated the 30th May 1840, after making certain specific bequests devised, inter alia, an estate called Pain's Hill, in the county of Surrey, to three trustees, in trust for his wife Harriett Cooper for life; and after her death, upon such trusts and subject to such provisions as were thereafter expressed concerning the residue of his real and personal estate; and after giving certain directions as to the sale of the Pain's Hill estate, and the raising of certain sums of money out of his general, real, and personal estate, and declaring the trusts of such moneys, he declared that the proceeds of the sale of his real estate, and the residue of his personal estate, should be held in trust for all

COOPER v. COOPER.

or any of his children, grandchildren, and issue—to be born prior to such appointment—in such manner and form as his said wife at any time or times, and from time to time, before each and every of his children should have attained the age of twenty-five years, by any deed or instrument in writing to be sealed and delivered by his said wife, in the presence of and attested by two witnesses, should either absolutely or with power of revocation and new appointment appoint and subject thereto, in trust for the younger children in equal shares.

The testator died in Sept. 1840, leaving his widow Harriett Cooper and three sons, viz., the plaintiff William Henry Cooper, Roland Edward Cooper, and the defendant Frederick John Cooper, surviving him. Each of the sons attained the age of twenty-five, the youngest in 1851.

By a deed, dated the 5th April 1841, Mrs. Cooper, the widow, exercised the power given to her by the testator in following manner. After reciting the greater part of the testator's will, she directed that the trustees should transfer the money arising from the sale of the testator's real estates, and the rents, issues, and profits in the mean time, and all the said trust funds and accumulations, and all other his personal property (if any) upon certain trusts for securing certain sums to be paid to her sons, and as to all the rest and residue and remainder of the aforesaid general residuary fund to or in trust for her three sons equally on their attaining the age of twenty-one; and by the same deed she reserved to herself a power of revocation and new appointment by any deed or instrument in writing, to be sealed and delivered by her in the presence of two witnesses.

Mrs. Cooper by her will, dated the 10th April 1841, gave and appointed the Pain's Hill estate to her eldest son, the plaintiff, absolutely; and afterwards, by a codicil, she confirmed the appointment to him, and devised and bequeathed the residue of her real and personal property equally between her said three sons. Subsequently (by another codicil, after reciting the death of her son Roland Edward Cooper, who died in Sept. 1858, leaving three children) she devised and bequeathed two third parts of Roland Edward Cooper's share to his children, and the remaining one-third between her two surviving sons. Mrs. Cooper died in May 1863.

After her death a suit (Cooper v. Mostyn) was instituted by the children of Roland Edward Cooper for the administration of the estate of their grandfather (the testator), in the course of which a question arose whether the Pain's Hill estate was well appointed by Mrs. Cooper to her eldest son, or whether the estate or the proceeds of the sale thereof passed under the appointment of the deed of April 1841. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that the estate was well appointed by the deed among Mrs. Cooper's three sons, and that the power of revocation and new appointment reserved by the deed was not well exercised by the will and codicils, and this decision was afterwards affirmed on appeal by the Lords Justices.

The present suit was instituted by the plaintiff William Henry Cooper, for the purpose of compelling the defendants (his brother Frederick John Cooper and the children of Roland Edward Cooper) to elect between the benefits conferred upon them by the will and codicils, and their respective shares under the deed in the Pain's Hill estate.

The bill prayed for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to claim both the benefits under the will or codicils of the testatrix, and also the shares and interests of them the said defendants under the deed of appointment of and in the Pain's Hill estate, or the proceeds thereof; but that the defendants were bound to elect between the benefits conferred upon them by the will and codicils, and their respective shares under the deed of appointment.

Greene, Q. C., Bristowe, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendants could not take both under the will and the deed of April 1841. It was well established that where there was an invalid execution of a power, the objects of the power could take no other benefit under the instrument affecting to exercise it without being put to their election. The case clearly came within the authorities on the subject. They cited

Whistler v. Webster, 2 Ves. 367;
Reid v. Reid, 25 Beav. 469;
Thelluson v. Woodford, 13 Ves. 200;
Tomkyns v. Blane, 28 Beav. 422;
Woollaston v. King, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 165; 20 L. [T. Rep. N. S. 1003; Ingram v. Ingram, 1 Ves. 159;
Jarm on Wills, 3rd edit., 415;
Sugden on Powers, 578.

Springall Thompson, for the defendant Frederick John Cooper, stated that his client, of his own free will, and out of regard to the plaintiff, elected to accept the benefits under the testatrix's will.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Rawlinson, for the children of Roland Edward Cooper, contended that their title was derivative. They took their share of Pain's Hill from their father, and not from the testatrix's act. The doctrine of election, therefore, could have no application. They referred to

Cavan v. Pulteney, 2 Ves. 544;
Grissell v. Swinhoe, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 291;
Cooper v. Martin, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 47; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268.

Greene, Q. C. in reply.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The case raised by the plaintiff is, as far as I know, entirely new. He claims a right to compel the legatees under Mrs. Cooper's will to elect between the benefits under that will, and their shares under the deed of 1841, in the Pain's-hill estate, or the proceeds thereof. There seems to be an insuperable difficulty against applying the doctrine of election to the case. It does not come within any of the definitions of the doctrine, nor under any of the authorities which have been cited on the subject. In order to raise a case of election it is well settled that there must be a disposition by the person who executes the instrument, or an affected disposition by that person of property over which he has no disposing power; and there must also be a disposition of his own property on such a footing as shows that he had power to dispose of the property of another. Here there is no gift or disposition of property which was not the testatrix's. There is indeed an appointment, and it has been argued upon the authority of Whistler v. Webster (sup.) and other cases, that because that power of appointment has been defeated by a defective or invalid execution a case of election has been raised. In all of the cases referred to, the question was between the person in whose favour there was an invalid execution of the power and those persons entitled in default of appointment; and the case of election arose by reason of there being two gifts under the same instrument, one an invalid gift, and the other a valid one, and upon the presumption that the valid gift was made on the footing that the invalid gift would take effect. There is great difficulty to my mind, in applying the doctrine of election to the execution of powers at all; but it has been so applied, and I think legitimately applied by Lord St. Leonards, who has clearly expounded the principle upon which the doctrine has a proper application. But what has that principle to do with the case of an invalid appointment, when the question arises between the appointee claiming under the invalid appointment, and other persons claiming under the will of the appointor. The persons claiming under the will of the appointor claim by her gift, while the appointee claims under the invalid appointment. It is, therefore, very difficult to see how the doctrine of election can apply. This is not, however, the only or the greatest difficulty. The whole doctrine of election rests upon intention. Now this invalid appointment was preceded by another appointment by the same person, which the court has pronounced to be valid, and the court could only have decided that the first appointment was valid upon an intention expressed to that effect, and upon failure of any clearly expressed intention that the second appointment should be a good one. Therefore, there is an insuperable difficulty and inconsistency, where intention must be the basis, and there are two intentions, one properly and the other improperly expressed, in saying that the court, after giving effect to the one properly expressed, should then, on the doctrine of election, give effect to the other, which is improperly expressed. There is also this further inconsistency. The plaintiff by claiming under the invalid appointment, indirectly defeats the effect of the appointment which the court has declared to be valid. Even if there were no other difficulties, the plaintiff, upon his own doctrine of election, could not succeed. He comes upon an invalid appointment, to disconcert a valid one, and while wishing to disconcert the valid appointment, he wishes also to take a benefit under it, less, however, than he would take under the invalid appointment. He cannot be permitted, upon his own doctrine, to approbate and reprobate, to say that he will take under the valid appointment and also under the appointment which is inconsistent with the valid appointment. These are difficulties that seem to me irremovable. They certainly have not been removed by the arguments addressed to me, or any of the authorities cited. The bill, therefore, as far as it relates to the question of the election, must be dismissed. The question, however, has not been unfairly raised and the costs of all parties will come out of the estate. There will be a declaration to that effect, and the usual directions as to the administration of the estate.

WOOD v. CHART.

[V.C. J.]

WOOD v. CHART.

International Copyright Act (15 Vict. c. 12)—Translation within meaning of—Piracy.

In order to obtain for the author of a work the benefit of the International Copyright Act, and for that purpose to comply with the requisitions in the 8th Section of the Act, it is essential that an actual translation of the work, and not an adaptation, must be registered.

The registration of an adaptation confers no rights under the Act.

This suit was instituted by George Wood, music publisher, to restrain the defendant, H. Nye Chart, from permitting to be performed at the Theatre Royal, Brighton, or elsewhere in the United Kingdom, a piece entitled "Frou-Frou, or Fashion and Passion," or any other translation of the French play of "Frou-Frou," and that the other defendants, Beatrice Binda and Horace Wigan, might be restrained from performing the same.

The following are the facts.

On the 30th October, 1869, Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy published a comedy entitled "Frou-Frou," and on the same day the piece was represented for the first time at the Théâtre au Gymnase, in Paris.

The authors reserved all rights of reproduction, translation, and representation, and in accordance with the 15 Vict. c. 12 (The International Copyright Act), the play was registered and a copy duly deposited in Stationers' Hall, on the 2nd December, 1869. On the 18th January, 1870, the authors assigned to the plaintiff all the rights of representation, whether in English or French, throughout the United Kingdom.

On the 29th Jan. 1870, the plaintiff commenced the publication in the "Musical World" of a translation of "Frou-Frou" entitled "Like to Like," a comedy in five acts, being an English version of MM. Meilhac and Halévy's "Frou-Frou," written by H. Sutherland Edwards. Edwards assigned to the plaintiff all his interest in the English version, and the plaintiff was registered as the proprietor thereof. On the 28th Jan. 1870, the defendant, Beatrice Binda applied to the plaintiff for permission to represent an English version of the French comedy, for which permission the plaintiff required a royalty of 5% for every night the English version was represented.

After various ineffectual attempts by the defendant, Beatrice Binda, to induce the plaintiff to make a reduction in his royalty, on the 31st Jan. 1870, she instructed a Mr. Nimmo to enter for her at Stationers' Hall a manuscript translation of "Frou-Frou," by Benjamin Webster, and to take the necessary steps to get the manuscript translation approved by the Lord Chamberlain for the purpose of representation; and about the same time the defendant, Beatrice Binda, informed the plaintiff of her intention to take a theatre and to bring out a representation of the manuscript translation of Frou Frou, and that she had engaged a company, and had made all other necessary arrangements. The plaintiff still refused his sanction to its representation at any less sum than the royalty of 5% a night. A few days after the defendant, Beatrice Binda, wrote a letter to a Mr. Knowles which he forwarded to the plaintiff, in which she stated, "I certainly cannot give Mr. Wood 5%, nor even 3%, as I can make mine an adaptation, and so escape the letter of the law." The defendant, Binda, soon after called on the plaintiff, and told him that she withdrew all the offers she had made to him, and on the 15th Feb. 1870, she again called on the plaintiff and told him that she had agreed to sell back the play to B. Webster, the younger, who had translated the play for her, and at the same time she told the plaintiff that Benjamin Webster, the elder, was going to bring out the play at once. Thereupon Messrs. Pike and Son, the plaintiff's solicitors, wrote to Benjamin Webster informing him that if he produced the play without the plaintiff's permission, he should take the earliest opportunity of obtaining an injunction against him. The plaintiff heard no more of the production of the play until on the 11th March, 1870, when an article appeared in the Theatrical and Musical Review, containing a passage headed "Theatricals and Music in Brighton," stating that an entirely new version of the Parisian play called "Frou-Frou," was to be performed at the theatre, Brighton, on the following Saturday. Thereupon the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the manager and lessee of the Theatre Royal, Brighton, informing them that Mr. George Wood was the proprietor of the play, and that he would not allow any representations to take place without his sanction, and that if they produced it at their theatre he would obtain an injunction against them at the earliest opportunity. To the letter, the defendant, Beatrice Binda, replied that she was not about to play a translation of the French piece, but an adaptation of the same, and naming Mr. W. Murray as her solicitor.

The characters in the defendants' playbills were the same as those in the French play of "Frou-Frou," and the scenic directions in the acts followed the same order and arrangement as in the French comedy.

The plaintiff and Mr. Sutherland Edwards were present at the first representation of "Frou-Frou, or Fashion and Passion," at Brighton, and were of opinion that it was a literal translation of the original play, and all the incidents connected with it were the same as in the original.

The bill then prayed that the defendants might be restrained from performing or permitting to be performed the play entitled "Frou-Frou, or Fashion and Passion."

Eddis, Q.C., Robertson Blaine, and D. C. Beale appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that the plaintiff had complied with all that was required of him by the 15 Vict. c. 12, to entitle him to sustain the suit. The characters, locality, plot, scenes, and dialogue were substantially the same, the only difference being that in the translation they had been anglicised, and certain speeches had been omitted which were unfit for the English stage.

D'Almaine v. Boosey, 1 Y. & Coll. 302.

Kay, Q.C., and Lindley were for the defendants, and submitted that the plaintiff had not complied with the Act by registering a translation. The so-called translation was simply an adaptation of a French play to the English stage, and not a translation within the meaning of the Act. The plaintiff had not even retained the name of "Frou-Frou," but had called his version "Like to Like," he had also changed the names of the characters, and the locality of the play he had transferred from Paris to London. There were no less than eighty-two speeches omitted in the first act, and fifty-nine speeches omitted in the second act, many of the omissions being most important.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR then called upon Eddis, Q.C. to show that the play which the plaintiff had registered was a translation of the French play of "Frou-Frou."

Eddis, Q. C. in reply, contended that nothing material had been omitted from the plot or framework of the piece, the only omissions being conversations immaterial to the plot, and unfit for an English audience—true, the situations had been changed, but they were only such changes as were necessary to make the play intelligible to English people. It was impossible always to translate literally as was exemplified by the proverb, in silvam ligna ferentes, which was rendered in English, "Carrying coals to Newcastle." He also submitted that the defendants intended to further infringe the copyright by performing the piece in the French language.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—With regard to the last point, it seems to me to be merely an after-thought suggested at the very last moment. There never has been any question between the parties as to the representation of the play in French. With respect to the representation of the English play, the plaintiff has got to make out his title, which depends upon the convention, and upon the Act. Now the Act of Parliament for some reason or other—I suppose a sufficient reason, but I do not know what it may be—has required, in order to give an author or the assignee of that author the particular copyright in question, that the original work shall be deposited in the United Kingdom: and then with regard to works other than dramatic works, it says, "the translation sanctioned by the author or part thereof, must be published in the British dominions, not later than one year after the registration and deposit in the United Kingdom of the original work." That is, the translation of part thereof; and the whole of such translation must be published within three years of such registration and deposit. It contemplates and requires that the whole work shall be translated. But it would not be a compliance with that to translate a quarter, or half, or three quarters of a work that is protected; and then say, "That is all I want protected, that is my authorized translation; and I have published the whole of that part which I have thought right to have translated." The thing is, that the work must be translated, and that translation must be published in the country. And then, for some other sufficient reason, it is provided that in the case of dramatic pieces the translation sanctioned by the author must be published within three calendar months of the registration of the original work. Now, I do not think it is possible to say that that means that anything which the author shall sanction as a translation must be published within three calendar months; that the translation, that is to say, the thing being a translation which has been authorized or sanctioned by the author, must be published within three calendar months of the registration of the original work. Now, it appears to me that the plaintiff in this case has gone out of his course to dig a pitfall for himself; for that which he says he has done is, the original thing being called "Frou-Frou," he has published in England a comedy called "Like to Like"—"Like to Like," a comedy in five acts, being an English version of M.M. Meilhac and Halévy's "Frou-Frou," written by H. Sutherland Edwards." Then he has introduced English characters; he has transferred the scene to England; he has made the alterations necessary for making it an English comedy, and not a translation of a French comedy; and he has left out a great number of speeches and passages—a great deal more in the first act, which would seem to me to imply at first that he was really making an imitation or adaptation, and afterwards was minded more completely to make a translation. The first two acts seem to me particularly to be that which is referred to in the Act itself as an imitation or adaptation. Whether it is a fair imitation or adaptation is another question; but if one wanted to have an example of what is an imitation or adaptation to the English stage, one would have said that this is exactly the thing which is meant—it is an imitation and adaptation to the English stage; that is, you have transferred the characters to England, you make them English characters, you introduce English manners, and you leave out things which you say would not be suitable for representation on the English stage. Now, that is not, in my view of the case, what the Act requires for some sufficient purpose, as I have said before, when it requires that a translation should be made accessible to the English people. It is that the English people should have the opportunity of knowing the French work as accurately as it is possible to know a French work by the medium of the version in English. That seems to me to be what was intended. Having come to the conclusion that this is not a translation, I have also come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has failed in complying with the condition precedent which the Act has imposed upon him to entitle him to sustain this suit. It is said that we ought to give a liberal interpretation to it, and that one ought not to strain the meanings of "translation" or any other word for the purpose of depriving a foreign author of the benefit of the Act. Of course not; one ought to take a liberal view, and one ought not to strain the words, and one must apply and give a natural meaning to them. According to my view of the case, there never would have been the slightest difficulty whatever in the plaintiff obtaining the full benefit of his assignment, and of putting himself in a position to prevent any representation of the French play; or of any English translation of it, if he had simply employed Mr. Sutherland Edwards to do what he could very well have done, namely, have made a translation; that is to say, if he had said, "Now make a translation of this—do not be thinking of adaptation or imitation for the English stage, but make a translation of it;" he could have made a translation, and the translation could have been published in this country; and if that translation had been published in this country, then it would have been quite open to the author, or the person claiming under the author, to have represented that with any abbreviation, excision, alteration, or with any adaptation which he might have thought fit for the purpose of making it more suitable to the English stage. I have no doubt whatever, if he had published the translation, that he could then have acted the thing which Mr. Sutherland Edwards has called a version, and that nobody else could have acted anything like that—anything approaching to that; because I think it right to say upon that, although I say this is not a translation but in my view is rather an imitation or adaptation to the English stage, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that if the author had complied with the condition required by the Act of Parliament, or any other person claiming under the author had complied with that, I should at once have restrained the acting of this very thing as not being a fair imitation or adaptation, but as being a piratical translation of the original work—that that would have been the proper thing for me to have done in this case; but the plaintiff having brought his suit, not having a title, must fail, and must fail, of course, with the usual consequences of the experiment which he has tried, and he must pay the costs. At present I am bound to say I should have thought that the thing complained of is still nearer a translation. I have not heard Mr. Lindley out on that part of the case, and it would have been more easily attacked if the plaintiff had had a proper title. That cannot, in my opinion, make any difference as to the costs, because it is brought by him upon a title which he has not got. He must therefore pay the costs.

THE COMMISSIONERS FOR IMPROVING THE HARBOUR OF SHOREHAM (apps.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF LANCING (resps.)

Harbour—Rateability of works necessary to the right to collect tolls.

By certain local and personal Acts commissioners were empowered to manage and improve a harbour, to make an artificial cut or entrance, to cleanse, scour, &c., the same, to make piers, dams, sluices, &c., and the necessary works for preserving the navigation; in consideration of which they were authorised to take certain tolls the amount of which depended upon their keeping the channel accessible to ships of a certain tonnage. The commissioners had no property in the harbour or its accessories beyond such a special property as would enable them to use legal means for the protection thereof; and they never exercised the powers of purchasing land for the purposes of the harbour which they were expressly empowered to do.

On either side of the entrance to the channel piers were erected for the purpose of keeping the channel open, but for which it would have silted up and become impassable so as to prevent the possibility of earning tolls:

Held, first, that the commissioners were not the occupiers of the entrance to the harbour; and, secondly, that the occupation of the piers and the right to take tolls were too remote to be connected for rating purposes.

Case stated under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The appellants are the commissioners for carrying into execution the 56 Geo. 3, c. lxxxii., intituled "An Act for the more effectual security and improvement of the harbour of New Shoreham, in the county of Sussex," passed in 1816.

The respondents are the parish officers of Lancing, in the county of Sussex.

The respondents made a poor rate for the parish of Lancing, dated the 10th Sept. 1868, in which they charged the appellants as "occupiers and owners of New Shoreham Harbour works, tolls, and dues," in a gross estimated value of 4500*l.*, and a rateable value of 4000*l.*, and the sum of 100*l.* as a rate at 6*d.* in the pound.

Against this rate the appellants gave notice of appeal, and the following are the only grounds of appeal necessary to be stated for the purposes of this case, viz.:

2. That the commissioners are not the occupiers of the said harbour works and other tenements in respect whereof they are in the said rate or assessment rated.

4. That the said harbour works, tenements, tolls, and dues respectively are not rateable to the relief of the poor of the said parish.

5. The other said commissioners are not rateable to the relief of the poor in respect of the said harbour works, tenements, tolls, and dues respectively.

By an Act of 33 Geo. 2, c. xxxv., passed in 1759, certain commissioners were appointed to make a new cut through the sea beach opposite the village called Kingston, and to erect a pier or piers, and to do such other works as should be necessary in order to make and maintain a new and more commodious entrance into the said harbour.

The above works were executed by the commissioners, and by sect. 2 the right and property of all and every the piers and all other works executed in pursuance of the said Act, and the property of the ground whereon such piers and works were erected, as well as all such right and property as then belonging to the harbour of New Shoreham were thereby vested in the said commissioners.

By an Act of 29 Geo. 3, c. 21, passed in 1789, for the purpose of reducing the tolls authorised by the Act of 1759, it was amongst other things recited (as the fact was) that for the purposes of the Act of 1759 piers had been erected, and a new cut made, but that from various causes the channel took a different direction, and then ran into the sea half a mile to the eastward of the place where the piers were erected, and that the said piers had been washed away, and no other works had since been erected, but that the harbour was then in as good a state as it had usually been for many years past.

The new channel referred to in the Act of 1789, as near half a mile to the eastward of the original cut made under the Act of 1589, afterwards from various causes became stopped up, and in 1816 the channel or entrance to the harbour was about a mile to the east of the new entrance made under the Act of that year hereinafter set forth, being the Shoreham Harbour Act now in force, and by which the appellants are constituted commissioners to carry the same into execution.

By sect. 26 of the Act of 1816 (56 Geo. 3, c. clxxxi.), the right and property of all the wharves, quays, and buildings, and of all timber, ironwork, wood, stone, and other materials then belonging to the commissioners, under the therein recited Acts or either of them, are to be purchased for any of the purposes of the present Act, and the property of all and every the works erected in and about the said harbour in pursuance of such Acts or of the present Act, are vested in the said commissioners for the time being.

By sect. 27 of the Act of 1816, the limits of the harbour are defined; and by the same section the commissioners are authorised and required to deepen, cleanse, scour, and enlarge the channel of the said harbour within the limits aforesaid, which they did, and to make a new pier or piers, with the necessary wharfing, to confine the channel opposite to and near the then intended, and since constructed, entrance into the said harbour, which they were thereby required to open and to amend and improve as they might see expedient, and also to make the necessary dams, sluices, platforms, and other works in the eastern division of the harbour, for the purpose of sluicing it, and also such works as should be found necessary to accelerate the closing up of the then entrance of the said harbour, and likewise to construct a dredge boat for removing shoals within the limits aforesaid, and to construct lighthouses, storehouses, storeyards, and other buildings, and to make and effect such other works within the aforesaid limits as should be necessary for improving and preserving the navigation of the said harbour, and the use thereof by the persons trading thereto, and to effect various other works, as in the said section expressed.

The said harbour, so far as the same is used for vessels of burden, is divided into two arms or branches; the western arm commences about half a mile south of Old Shoreham bridge, and runs eastwardly to the new entrance referred to in the said 27th section, which is made between the eastern and western piers also referred to in the same section. The eastern arm, consisting of a canal and basin, extends eastwardly from the said entrance to the Wish. The said entrance is common to both arms of the harbour, and the entire harbour, except at the entrance, is separated from the sea by a bank of shingle, and is about two miles in length for vessels of burden, and its breadth varies from about 100 to 300 yards; the said new entrance is about midway of the whole length of the harbour.

The limits of the port of New Shoreham, are much larger than the limits of the harbour, and extend to the parish of Rottingdean on the east, and the parish of Keene on the west, and comprise a sea frontage of about sixteen miles.

By sect. 55 of the Act of 1816, and by other sections, the commissioners are authorised to purchase land for the purpose of improving the harbour, but their powers have never been exercised, nor any purchase of land or hereditaments made by the said commissioners, except a way in the parish of Kingston to the lighthouse, for the purchase of which 5*l.* was paid.

By sect. 73 of the Act of 1816, after reciting that several persons had agreed to subscribe 40,000*l.* towards carrying the purposes of the Act into execution, it is enacted that the money in the hands of the commissioners, or which should come to them by means of such subscription, should be applied in payment of the expenses of obtaining the Act, and making and improving the harbour and other works hereinbefore authorised, and keeping the same in repair, and of all such damages, costs, and other expenses thereby provided for, and directed to be paid to the said commissioners, and in payment of the interest of such moneys as should be raised by way of mortgage, as hereinafter mentioned, and that when all such charges and expenses as aforesaid should be paid and satisfied, all the money remaining in the hands of the commissioners, together with the rates and duties which should from time to time be received by them by virtue of the Act up to the 30th day of June in each year, should be annually divided in the month of July in each year to and amongst the several persons subscribing as aforesaid, rateably and in proportion to the amount of each person's subscription.

By sect. 82 of the Act of 1816, the commissioners are authorised to borrow on credit of the rates to the extent of 10,000*l.* This power has been exercised to its fullest extent, but the whole amount borrowed has since been paid off.

Sect. 83 of the Act of 1816, enacts that from and after the whole of the piers, dams, sluices, and other works thereby authorised to be made, should be made and completed, there should be paid by every person who should load or unload, or import or export any grain, seeds, goods, wares, merchandises, baggage, parcel, or other article, matter, or thing whatsoever, within the limits of the port of New Shoreham, the several rates and duties contained in schedule B. to the Act; and sect. 84 empowers the commissioners to fix reasonable rates upon the lading, unlading, importing or exporting of any article not enumerated in such schedule.

Sect. 85 of the Act of 1816, provides that until all the works are completed, only one-fourth of the rates and duties shall be paid subject to the provisions made by sect. 86, viz., that as soon as the works are so far completed that vessels of 200 tons may pass and repass in safety between the piers to be made in pursuance of the Act at high water, then and thenceforth one-half of the rates and duties should be payable.

By sect. 87 of the Act of 1816 lower rates are imposed in respect of coals, corn, and certain other articles, landed within the limits of the port, unless imported to or exported from the harbour of New Shoreham.

By the 88th sect. of the Act of 1816 certain articles landed on the beach within the parish of Brighton for the use of the Brighton Town Commissioners are to be charged one quarter only of the rates authorised by the schedule.

The 89th section of the Act of 1816 provides that in the event of the channel of the said harbour falling into so bad a state that vessels of 200 tons cannot any longer pass in safety between the piers into or out of the harbour, and so remain for a year, thenceforth only one quarter of the rates authorised by the schedule shall be payable until such vessels can pass in safety at any time at high water; but the commissioners have from time to time so well cleansed and kept the channel that vessels of 200 tons could always pass in safety between the piers into or out of the harbour at any time at high water. By sect. 90 of the Act of 1816 the duties imposed by the Act, and also all penalties imposed by it, may be levied by distress and sale of the goods of the offender, or person, or persons liable.

By sect. 91 of the Act of 1816 any master, part owner, or other person, eluding payment of any of the rates or dues, is to stand charged with, and liable to, the payment of the same, to be recovered by the commissioners, with treble costs of suit, in any of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster.

By sect. 94 of the Act of 1816 the master, or other person having command of any ship or vessel coming within the said port or harbour, is made subject to the payment of all rates and duties imposed by the Act on such ship, and on the cargo therein contained, which may be discharged or landed within the limits of the said port and harbour, to the collectors appointed by the commissioners, and the master or other person paying such rates is empowered to recover them from the owner of the ship, or the proprietor of the cargo.

By sect. 95 of the Act of 1816 the collector of customs at the port is not to give a discharge or report outwards for any ship in the said harbour of New Shoreham, or within the limits thereof, until all rates and duties have been paid.

By sect. 101 of the Act of 1816 the commissioners are required to hoist a flag on the lighthouse in the parish of Kingston, and exhibit lights on or near the entrance, so as to indicate the depth of water.

By sect. 102 of the Act of 1816 it is enacted that, for defraying the expence of the said lights and lightkeeper, there shall be levied upon all ships or other vessels entering the said harbour after the erection of the said light or lights the sum of 4d. upon every foot depth of water which any such ship or vessel may draw on entering the same to the extent of 12ft., and 6d. for every additional foot which the said vessel shall draw at such time above 12ft.

The commissioners under the Act of 1816, in pursuance of the powers contained in sect 27, formed a new entrance, and made new piers to confine the channel opposite to and near the entrance, and made the necessary drains and sluices for the purpose of sluicing it, and have since formed a canal or basin, and constructed a light house in the parish of Kingston, and are rated to the poor in that parish on an annual value of 8*l*. They have not erected any storehouses or other buildings, but they rent storehouses, &c., in the parish of Kingston, for which they are rated in that parish as occupiers irrespective of the profits derived from the above-mentioned rates and duties; and with a view of preventing persons from taking beach and boulders for ballast from the part of the shore lying west of the harbour, they entered into an agreement in 1847 to become yearly tenants to the owner of the right of soil of and in the land covered with sea beach or gravel at a rent of 5*l*. The commissioners have never removed any beach under this agreement. The piers of the entrance are for the purposes of this case to be taken as situate in the parish of Lancing, and from the entrance of the harbour, and afford facilities for entrance to vessels making use of it.

Some of the articles in respect of which the rates and duties, except the light dues, are authorised to be levied, were formerly landed on the beach within the said port, but not within the said harbour of New Shoreham; and was therefore chargeable with duty at the reduced rates under the 87th and 88th sections of the Act; but much the greater part of the articles in respect of which rates, &c., are authorised to be levied were landed in that part of the port which lies within the limit of the said harbour, and during the last year, and for some time past, the whole (with very slight exceptions) has been landed within the limit of the harbour.

The receipts of the said commissioners for rates and duties levied under the said schedule B, and for the rates or light dues authorised by sect. 102 of the Act are for the purposes of this appeal and case only to be taken at the annual sum of 9000*l*., subject to deductions for labour, repairs, materials, and otherwise, and it is agreed that for the purposes of this appeal and case, only 4000*l*. shall be taken as the net annual revenue or profit, which it is agreed for the purposes of this appeal and case shall be deemed to be derived under sects. 83 and 102 respectively, viz., 3930*l*., under sect. 83, and 70*l*. under sect. 102.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said commissioners are rateable upon or in respect of the said harbour piers and other works, or any or either of them, upon the amount of the net revenue or profits derived from the said rates, duties, and dues, or any portion thereof; and if so, what portion.

Pollock, Q.C. (Archibald and Merrifield with him), for the appellants.—First, the commissioners have no property in the soil of the harbour or any of its accessories. It is true that by sect. 2 of the Act of 1759 the property in the piers and the ground on which they are erected, and the works constructed in pursuance of that Act is vested in the commissioners, but this state of things is now superseded, and sect. 26 of the Act of 1816 gives them only such a property in the wharves and materials as would enable them to protect them from wrongdoers. There is, therefore, no difference between this case and that of the area covered by a navigable river. [BLACKBURN, J.—Are not the commissioners the occupiers of the artificial channel?] In Rex v. The Mersey and Irwell Navigation Company, 3 B. & C. 95, where powers were conferred upon a company for scouring and enlarging a river for the purposes of navigation, and to dig and cut the banks, and to make cuts and trenches through the adjoining lands, Bailey, J., in delivering judgment, says that “the correct view of the case is that they are not the occupiers of land covered by water, but had an easement only in the land.” And to a similar effect are the observations of Parke, J. in the same case. [BLACKBURN, J.—The means of access to the harbour can only be secured by the maintenance of the piers erected at the entrance. Is there no occupation by the commissioners of the entrance?] Even if so, they have no exclusive occupation, but, in fact, they have simply the power of repairing, as appears from sect. 27 of the Act of 1816, which gives directions respecting an already existing channel which they are to keep open, cleanse and amend as occasion may require. Rex v. The Aire and Calder Navigation, 9 B. & C. 820, is also in point, where it was held that the undertakers having an incorporated hereditament only in the bed of the river were not rateable. Then, secondly, as to the piers, it is contended that this is like the case of the dam sought to be rated in Rex v. The Aire and Calder Navigation, 3 B. & Ad. 139, which Lord Tenterden designated an attempt to evade the decision of the court in the case last cited, and held that the undertakers were not rateable as occupiers of the bed of the river, having merely an easement in it; that no rate could be laid upon them for the water of the river made navigable by them, and if so none could be imposed in respect of the dam, for to rate the dam because it kept up the water would be equivalent to rating the water itself. And even if rateable the piers could not be considered as enhanced in value by reason of the tolls:

Lewis (app.) v. The Churchwardens, &c., of Swansea (resps.), 25 L. J. 23, M. C.;
Reg. v. The North and South Shields Ferry Company, 1 E. & B. 140.

Mellish, Q. C. (Gates with him) for the respondents.—The question is not as to the property of the commissioners in the harbour and its accessories; but it is contended that they are the occupiers of all the artificial works enumerated in sect. 83 and the following sections of the Act of 1816, and that whatever they have affixed to the soil for the purposes of their undertaking is rateable exactly as the pipes of a water company or the wires of a telegraph would be. The channel comes within the term "works" in the above section, and is in the occupation of the commissioners. Then, as to the piers, it is clear that it is only by their means that the channel can be kept open; and, consequently, it is upon their maintenance that the right of taking the tolls and dues depends. It is also important to observe that the amount of tolls to be taken varies according to the facilities afforded by the commissioners, as appears by sects. 85 and 89, by the latter of which one quarter of the tolls only is to be taken in case they should suffer the channel to become impassable to ships of a certain tonnage. The piers are, therefore, inseparably connected with the profits derived from the harbour, and are rateable according to their value to the commissioners, who without them would be left without any profits at all, inasmuch as the consequence of their removal would be ultimately that the harbour would become inaccessible.

BLACKBURN, J.—The difficulty in this case consists in the application of the principles upon which property is rateable. By various statutes the commissioners are empowered to take upon themselves the management and improvement of the harbour in question. They are empowered to make an artificial cut or entrance, together with other necessary works, and as pointed out by Mr. Mellish, they are not to charge the full amount of tolls to which they are to be entitled under the later Acts until the works are so completed as to allow vessels of 200 tons to pass and repass; and in the event at any time of the channel of the harbour becoming so choked up as to be impassable for ships of that burthen, then a lower rate of tolls only is to be imposed. The amount of tolls depends therefore upon keeping the entrance clear and open, and it is contended on behalf of the respondents that the amount of tolls thus earned is to be taken into account in rating the property on shore; but tolls per se are clearly not rateable, and can only be so considered when they are connected with and enhance the value of land. The first question for our decision is, are the commissioners the occupiers of the entrance to the harbour, and in my opinion they are not. By sect. 26 of the latest of these Acts the stone, timber, and other materials belonging to the commissioners under the previous Acts, and the property in all works erected in or about the harbour in pursuance of any of the said Acts are vested in the present commissioners, but the object of this seems simply to enable them, in case of need, to prefer indictments and take such other legal steps with respect to such property as may at any time become necessary. Then, by sect. 27, general directions are given to the new commissioners as to the cleansing, deepening, and enlarging the entrance, and the construction of necessary works; but, although by a subsequent section they are expressly empowered to purchase land for the purposes of the harbour, it seems that they have never exercised those powers. I think, therefore, that we should be unduly straining the words of the statute if we held that the property in the entrance to the harbour vested in the commissioners, and that Mr. Pollock's contention that they are not to be taken as occupiers, but simply as exercising the powers given them of keeping the passage clear and open, must prevail. Then, secondly, with regard to the piers, I think these must be taken as works vested in the commissioners, and that in occupying them they occupy the land upon which they are erected. Then comes the main question in this case, viz., are we to hold that the receipt of the tolls and dues is so connected with the occupation of these piers as that the rateable value of the piers is to be considered as enhanced thereby, and if so, to what extent? Upon this point, notwithstanding the argument of Mr. Mellish, that but for the piers the entrance to the harbour would silt up and become impassable, and so no tolls could be earned, I am of opinion that the two things are too remote to be connected for the purposes of rating. The case I put in the course of the argument of fen land in one parish kept and maintained by means of a sea wall erected in another parish seems perfectly analogous to the present question.

MELLOR, J.—The commissioners were empowered to perform certain works connected with the harbour in question; and although they do not appear to have acquired any property in the actual soil, they must, nevertheless, be taken to be in occupation of the piers and the land upon which they are erected, but it seems to me impossible to say that the rateable value of the piers is to be considered as enhanced by the tolls, for the reason given by my brother Blackburn, viz., that the two things are too remote.

LUSH, J.—The rateable value of property is ascertained by arriving at the rent which it would command from year to year, free of taxes, and the other things to be deducted. Toll of themselves are clearly not rateable, and for the reasons already given, I think that the connection between them and the piers is too remote to enable us to adopt the views of the respondents. To arrive, therefore, at the rateable value of the piers, we must ascertain what a tenant would give for them from year to year; and it is clear that the simple occupation of the piers under a yearly tenancy would not entitle the tenant to any profits arising from the harbour.

Ex parte THE LITTLEBOROUGH LOCAL BOARD DISTRICT.

Local Government Act 1858—Adopting same—Taking a poll—Who to preside.

Where a meeting of ratepayers and owners of a place having a known and defined boundary is called for the purpose of adopting the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), the chairman is the person to take the sense of such meeting unless a poll be demanded. But if a poll be demanded, the functions of the chairman will thereupon cease, and such poll should be taken, and all things connected therewith be carried out by the summoning officer.

This was rule calling upon Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them or one of them, pursuant to the 19th section of the Local Government Act 1858, forthwith to publish in the London Gazette a notice given to the Home Secretary by Henry Trewis, the younger, the summoning officer of the Littleborough Local Board District, dated 28th Dec. 1869, that the Local Government Act 1858 had been adopted for the said district of Littleborough, the time for an appeal against such adoption having expired.

The rule was moved upon the following affidavit of Mr. Henry Trewis, the younger, the summoning officer, which was uncontradicted, and which sets out all the facts:—

1. Littleborough was, prior to the 27th July 1869, a place not having any known or defined boundary within the meaning, and for the purpose of the Local Government Act 1858.

2. A petition stating the proposed boundaries of the place, and signed by more than one-tenth of the ratepayers resident within such boundaries, was presented to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and was supported by such evidence as he required; and upon receipt of such petition he directed inquiry to be made as to the genuineness of the petition, and as to the propriety of the proposed boundaries, and fourteen days' notice of the time, place, and object of such inquiry was given within the place to which the said petition referred, and the said Secretary of State afterwards, upon consideration of the matter, and in pursuance of the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858, made order and settled the boundaries of the place for the Littleborough district, which order is dated the 27th July 1869, and thenceforth for the purposes of the said Act, the said district has been and now is deemed to be a place with a known and defined boundary, and might adopt the said Act accordingly, and for the purpose of enabling it so to do, and in further pursuance and in exercise of the powers of the said Act, I was appointed by the said order settling the boundaries the summoning officer, and, therefore, it became my duty forthwith to take all such steps as might be necessary for convening a meeting of the ratepayers to decide as to the adoption of the said Act.

3. A meeting for the purpose of the sections of the said Local Government Act 1858 preceding the 13th section thereof, was summoned by me as such summoning officer as aforesaid for the said district, on the requisition in writing of twenty ratepayers of the said district; and I fixed the time and place for holding such meeting, and I forthwith gave notice thereof by advertisement in two newspapers, viz., in the Observer and Pilot newspapers, respectively published at Rochdale and circulated within the district of Littleborough, and by causing such notice to be affixed to the principal doors of all the churches and chapels in the said district to which notices are usually affixed, and also in many other public places throughout the said district.

4. The paper marked T 1 and shown to me is a duplicate of my said notice convening the said meeting, and the printed newspapers marked T 2 and T 3 now produced to me are the said newspapers in which the said notice was advertised.

5. The said meeting was held on Thursday, the 23rd Sept. 1869, at the National School in Littleborough, within the said district. The said meeting, on its assembling together, chose Mr. John Molesworth, one of its members, as chairman; no adjournment took place, and the said Mr. John Molesworth, as chairman, proposed to the meeting the resolution for the adoption of the said Act within the said district, and the said chairman declared that such resolution was rejected.

6. Thereupon, Mr. Henry Newell, a ratepayer within the said district, demanded that such question be decided by a poll of the owners and ratepayers of the said district, and afterwards I, as such summoning officer as aforesaid for the said district, proceeded to take the said poll by voting papers, in the form A given in the schedule, to the said Local Government 1858, in the same way and with the same conditions as to notice of voting—delivering, filling up, collection, examination, declaration of the result, custody of voting papers, penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with the provisions of the Act, scale of votes, and in all other respects whatsoever as is provided in the Public Health Act 1848, in respect of the election of local boards of health.

7. The printed notice marked T 4, now produced and shown to me, was signed by me in pursuance of the 23rd section of the Public Health Act 1848, and the said notice was published at all the churches and chapels within the said district as required by the said Act, and was placarded throughout the said district; and I duly prepared, signed, and issued voting papers to all the ratepayers and owners within the said district, and afterwards caused them to be duly collected, and, with the assistance of a legal assessor, I scrutinised, examined, and cast up the votes; and I ascertained and determined upon the said poll that the resolution adopting the said Local Government Act 1858, had been passed in the said district of Littleborough by 766 legal votes in favour of, whilst there were only 518 votes against such adoption.

8. Thereupon, and in pursuance of the said Act, I, as such summoning officer as aforesaid, forthwith gave notice in writing under my hand of such adoption as aforesaid, to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and I, as such summoning officer as aforesaid, published a copy of such notice by advertisement for three successive weeks in the said Observer newspaper, which was and is a newspaper circulated within the said district, and by causing a copy of such notice to be affixed on the principal doors of every church and chapel in the said district to which notices are usually affixed, and in many other public places within the said district. The newspapers marked respectively T 5, T 6, and T 7, now produced and shown to me are the newspapers in which the said notice of adoption was advertised. The printed paper marked T 8, now produced and shown to me, is a copy of the said notice of adoption sent to the said Home Secretary.

9. And after such notice of adoption had been so given as aforesaid, and the time for an appeal against the validity of the vote for the adoption of the said Act had expired, I, as such summoning officer as aforesaid, applied to and requested that a notice should be published in the London Gazette by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, that the said Act had been adopted within the said district, but the Home Secretary declined to publish such notice in the Gazette, alleging that the chairman of the said meeting, and not the summoning officer for the said district, was the proper officer and functionary to issue voting papers and conduct the said poll by examining and casting up the votes, although he admitted that I, as summoning officer, and not the said Mr. Molesworth, as chairman of the meeting, was the proper person to sign the said voting papers and the public notices, and to declare the result.

10. For the purpose of this application, and in order that the legal question may be raised and determined whether the summoning officer or the chairman of the meeting was the proper person upon whom was imposed the duty and power of taking and conducting the said poll, and examining and casting up the votes, and declaring the result, it has been arranged that for the purposes of this case it shall be taken to the Court of Queen's Bench that there has not been any appeal against such adoption, and that no question of appeal was or is the excuse or justification for declining to publish the said notice of adoption in the Gazette.

11. I am an owner of property and also a ratepayer in, and am personally resident within, the said district of Littleborough, and in my capacity of owner and ratepayer, independently of, and in addition to, my character as summoning officer as aforesaid, I have required, and still do require, the said notice of adoption to be gazetted by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, which hitherto has been declined.

12. The said Mr. Molesworth, as chairman, applied to me to sign notices and voting papers prepared by himself in the said form A, which, for reasons hereinafter stated, I declined to sign, and it was and is admitted by the Home Secretary that any poll taken by the said Mr. Molesworth, as chairman, would not be, and could not be, legal, unless I, as the summoning officer for the said district, signed the said notices and voting papers. I was asked by the said Mr. Molesworth to sign voting papers which, in some cases, were for married women who were not entitled to vote at all, and to sign voting papers in other cases which were for a larger or less number of votes than I knew the voters to be entitled to. For these and many reasons I declined to sign the notices and voting papers prepared and presented to me by the said chairman, and I denied, and still deny, his power and jurisdiction to issue voting papers or to examine or cast-up the votes, or to take the said poll, even if I had consented to sign the said notices and voting papers.

By the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) it is enacted by sect. 12 that the Act may be adopted (by sub-sect. 3):—"In all other places having a known or defined boundary by a resolution of the owners and ratepayers."

By sect. 13 it is enacted that meetings for the purposes of the preceding section shall be summoned on the requisition in writing of any twenty ratepayers or owners.

In places having known and defined boundaries not being corporate boroughs or towns under the jurisdiction of such improvement commissioners, as are hereinbefore mentioned by the churchwardens, or one of them, or if there are no churchwardens the overseers, or one of them, or if there is none of the officers respectively above enumerated, or if such officer in any case neglects, is unable, or refuses to perform the duties hereby imposed on him by any person appointed by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State. 2. In any places, as last aforesaid, the summoning officer shall upon such requisition fix a time and place for holding such meeting, and shall forthwith give notice thereof; and, 3. The meeting on its assembling together shall choose one of its number as chairman, who may, with the consent of a majority of the persons present, adjourn the same from day to day. 4. The chairman shall propose to the meeting the resolution for the adoption of the Act, and the meeting shall decide for or against such adoption. Provided that, if any owner or ratepayer shall demand that such question be decided by a poll of the owners and ratepayers, such poll shall be taken by voting papers in the form A, given in the schedule to the Act in the same way, and with the same conditions, as to notice of voting, delivery, filling up, collection, examination, declaration, of the result, custody of voting papers, penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with the provisions of the Act, scale of votes, and in all other respects whatsoever, as is provided in the Public Health Act 1848, in respect of the election of local boards of health; and if no poll be demanded, or if the demand of a poll is withdrawn by the parties making the same, a declaration by the chairman shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary be sufficient evidence of the decision of such meeting.

The provisions of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), above referred to, are as follows. Sect. 21 enacts:

That at every election by owners of property and ratepayers under this Act the chairman of the local board of health, or in case of the first election such person as shall be appointed by order of Her Majesty in Council, or by provisional order of the general board of health (as the case may require), shall have the powers and perform the duties vested in or imposed upon the said chairman by this Act in relation to any such election, and shall perform all other duties to which it may be requisite for him to perform in conducting and completing elections under this Act, &c.

Sect. 22 provides for the production to such chairman of parochial books. Sect. 23 enacts:

That the said chairman shall before every such election prepare, sign, and publish a notice which shall contain the particulars following, that is to say, the number and qualification of the persons to be elected, the person by whom and the places where the nomination papers hereinafter mentioned are to be received, and the last day on which they are to be sent, the mode of voting in case of a contest, and the days on which the voting papers will be delivered and collected, and the time and place for the examination and casting up of the votes; and he shall also cause such notice to be affixed on such places in the parts for which the election is to be held as are ordinarily made use of for affixing thereon notices of parochial business, &c.

By sect. 19 of the first-mentioned Act, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, it is enacted that:

Whenever a resolution adopting this Act has been passed in any place, notice thereof shall be given to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State by the following persons, that is to say:—In corporate boroughs, by the mayor; in other places, under the jurisdiction of such improvement commissioners as aforesaid, by the chairman of the board of commissioners; in other places, by the summoning officer. The notice so sent shall be in writing under the hand of the officer hereby required to give the same and it shall be the duty of such last-mentioned officer to publish a copy of such notice in manner following, and when such notice has been so given, and the time of such appeal has expired, or such appeal has been dismissed, a notice shall be published in the London Gazette by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, that this Act has been adopted within such place.

The voting paper in the schedule referred to in the 13th section is directed to be "signed by the summoning officer."

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier), and Archibald, now showed cause. The Home Secretary feels no further interest in the question than as being desirous that a correct rule should be laid down for his guidance. The question is, whether when a meeting is held to determine upon the adoption of the Local Government Act 1858, and a poll is demanded, the chairman of the meeting or the summoning officer is the proper person to take such poll? Littleborough is a place within the third subsection of sect. 12, as being a place having a known or defined boundary, and therefore a resolution of the owners and ratepayers is necessary before the Act can be adopted, and in such case, by the third subsection of the 13th section, the meeting at which this resolution is to be come to, is to be presided over by a chairman to be chosen by such meeting. At that meeting a resolution is to be proposed by the chairman for the adoption of the Act, and then the meeting divide for or against it, and he declares the result; but if a poll is demanded, it is to be taken accordingly. Now the difficulty arises at this point, for the Act, instead of giving instructions as to the taking of the poll, refers to certain provisions in the Public Health Act 1848, ss. 21, 22, and 23, and the doubt is whether the summoning officer should take the poll or the chairman of the meeting. Now the Home Secretary is of opinion that it should be taken by the chairman of the meeting, and as that was not done, but was taken by the summoning officer, he has refused to publish a notice in the London Gazette that the Act has been adopted. The sections in the Public Health Act 1848 have reference to a very different state of things. The contention by the Secretary of State is that, where there is a chairman of a meeting, it is for him to preside and carry out to their termination the proceedings of the meeting, and that the taking of a poll is in fact only a part of the proceedings of the meeting. In cases where there is no chairman, as in the case of a first election of a local board, then such election is to be presided over by a person to be appointed by the Secretary of State; but that is not the case in the present instance, inasmuch as the statute provides for the appointment of a chairman, and one was appointed who put the resolution to the meeting. The policy of the Act seems to be that where you have a chairman, he is to conduct the proceedings. There seems to be no reason for departing from the usual course in such matters. Very many of the provisions in the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd sections of the Public Health Act 1848, will not apply to this case, and there is really no reason why they should be resorted to with reference to this point. [MELLOR, J.—The other side will rely upon the 19th section, which requires the notice of the adoption of the Act to be given to the Secretary of State by the summoning officer.] He may have that duty to perform, since it is his duty to summon the meeting, and therefore it would be proper for him to report the result. If it had been intended that the summoning officer should take the poll, the Act would have provided for his being the chairman of the meeting. The summoning officer has merely to call the meeting and report the result; he appears to have nothing to do with conducting it.

Manisty, Q. C. and Kemplay, in support of the rule.—When all the sections are read it is clear what was meant by the Legislature. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The chairman is to preside over the meeting, and if there is no poll he would announce the result.] But it is the summoning officer who reports to the Secretary of State whether there has been a poll or not, and then, when the report is made, it is the duty of the Secretary of State to act. If a poll is demanded, very important duties have to be performed; notices have to be prepared, signed, and published, containing information as to the persons by whom, and the places where the voting papers are to be received, the last day on which they are to be sent, the mode of voting, and the days on which the voting papers will be delivered and collected, and the time and place for the examination and casting-up of the votes. These are duties more fit for the summoning officer than a mere chairman of a meeting, and in respect of them the expenses are allowed by the 35th section of the Act. It could never have been intended that a mere

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF ST. GEORGE, MIDDLESEX.

chairman of a meeting should have all these duties cast upon him. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is the poll anything more than an adjournment of the meeting to ascertain correctly the wishes of the ratepayers and owners of property?] In some sense it is not; but a poll in this case differs from an ordinary poll, inasmuch as a great variety of duties are imposed upon the party taking the poll which do not exist in ordinary cases. Certainly the person most suited for taking the poll is he who has ultimately to declare it. The fair inference to be drawn from the sections is that the chairman's duties cease when a poll is demanded, and that then the duties of the summoning officer recommence. The schedule which directs that the voting papers are to be signed by the "summoning officer," shows that the person who calls the meeting is to make out the voting papers.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think that this rule should be made absolute. At first I was strongly disposed to think that the poll should have been taken by the chairman of the meeting, but this view has been shaken by the arguments of counsel. The Act is certainly so framed as to render it extremely difficult to put an accurate construction upon it; and I must admit that I think the question is still open to some doubt whether or not the Legislature really intended that the summoning officer should take the poll. The inclination of my opinion, however, is, that it did so intend, and we should, therefore, make the rule absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is certainly somewhat difficult to say what the Legislature really meant, and it is very much to be regretted that Acts of Parliament should be drawn in this form, but I cannot but think that the summoning officer is a better party to take the poll than the chairman of the meeting, and that it was probably intended that he should do so.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I feel all the difficulty referred to, but my impression is with the counsel for the prosecution.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF ST. GEORGE MIDDLESEX.

Poor law—Order of removal—Wife of a foreigner who has no place of settlement—Chargeability in absence of her husband—Status of irremovability acquired before marriage.

The pauper, before her marriage, obtained the status of irremovability in the parish of A., by residence. Her husband was a foreigner, having no settlement, and, whilst he was absent at sea, she became chargeable to the parish of A., where she continued to reside after her marriage. An order having been obtained for her removal to the union of B., which comprised the parish of her settlement:

Held, that the order was bad, as she had acquired and retained the status of irremovability in the parish of A.

This was a case stated by the Middlesex Sessions upon an appeal, whereupon an order of removal was quashed, as follows:—

At a general quarter sessions of the peace holden in and for the county of Middlesex, upon an appeal, wherein the guardians of the poor of the Stepney

Union, in the county of Middlesex, were appellants' and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. George-in-the-East, in the said county, were respondents, against an order dated 24th Sept. 1868, made by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, for the removal of Margaret Schooler and her child, aged four months, from the said parish of St. George-in-the-East, to the said Stepney Union. It was ordered, that the said order be quashed on the ground of the irremovability of the paupers, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following

CASE.

The said Margaret Schooler is the wife of Samuel Schooler, a native of Boston, in the United States of America and he has no settlement in England.

The order of removal was therefore founded on the maiden settlement of the pauper in the parish of Limehouse in the Stepney Union.

The pauper's husband earns his livelihood as a sailor. She was married to him on 7th Oct. 1867, and on the 21st of the same month, while residing in the parish of St. George, he left her there and went to sea in the usual course of his occupation as a sailor, but without having made any provision for her maintenance.

In the month of May 1868, she became chargeable to that parish, and continued chargeable to the time of the making of the order of removal, 24th Sept. 1868, at which time her husband had not returned to her, but he returned to her between the date of the order and the time of the appeal.

The pauper's husband had not at the date of the order of removal himself resided in the parish of St. George for so long as one year.

Previously to her said marriage, the pauper, Margaret Schooler, had resided in the said parish of St. George for three years and upwards, and she was at that time irremovable from such parish by reason of her residence therein under the provisions of the Acts 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1; and 28 & 29 Vic. c. 79, s. 8. After her marriage she continued to reside in such parish up to the date of the order of removal, and she would, if she had remained a feme sole, have then been irremovable from the said parish by virtue of such residence. The appellants contended that as the said husband of the said Margaret Schooler was a foreigner without any settlement or place to which he could be removed, the said Margaret Schooler was not in his absence removable from the said parish of St. George, as she had herself acquired a status of irremovability by residence therein. And further, that as whenever her husband was present with her they would both be irremovable, she was also irremovable in his absence until his death or desertion.

The respondents contended that the said Margaret Schooler, whilst she remained a married woman, lost the status of irremovability which she had acquired by residence as a feme sole, and that as her husband had not acquired a status of irremovability by residence under the provisions of the said statutes she, in his absence, was removable to her maiden settlement.

The court of quarter sessions decided in favour of the appellants, and quashed the said order of removal, on the ground of the irremovability of the paupers.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is, whether the said pauper and her child were, under the circumstance above stated, irremovable from the said parish of St. George. If the court shall answer this question in the affirmative, the order of sessions is to be confirmed; but if in the negative, the said order of sessions is to be quashed, and the said order of removal is to be confirmed.

DAVIS v. PEARCE.

By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, it is enacted—

That from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for five years (now one year), next before the application for the warrant.

By the proviso in sect. 1 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, it is enacted—

That whenever any person should have a wife or children, having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children shall be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable, notwithstanding any provisions in the said recited Act, and should not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act.

Taylor appeared for the appellants.—The pauper having acquired the status of irremovability before marriage, it was not thereby affected inasmuch as her husband had no settlement himself, nor had he acquired anywhere the status of irremovability. The marriage would not destroy the irremovability, it merely suspended it. If she had married an Englishman she would have acquired his settlement, but as her husband in the present case was not an Englishman and had no settlement she falls back upon her own settlement, and her status of irremovability attaches. He cited

Reg. v. Cottingham, 7 B. & C. 615;

Reg. v. St. Sepulchre, 28 L. J. 187, M. C.;

Reg. v. Glossop, 12 Q. B. 117; 17 L. J. 171, M. C.

Foland and Poynter, for the respondents.—The fact of her marriage destroyed, or at least suspended, her status of irremovability. [BLACKBURN, J.—When her husband is with her she cannot be removed, but here he is away.] The whole theory of irremovability is founded upon the position occupied by the head of the family. If the husband is irremovable so is the wife, and she is not so when he is not so. During the wife's coverture her status cannot be considered. [BLACKBURN, J.—But you really are considering it, for you are removing her to her maiden settlement.] During coverture we can only look at the status of the husband, and if he has no settlement or status of irremovability, the wife can be removed to her maiden settlement.

Reg. v. Much Hoole, 17 Q. B. 548; 21 L. J. 1, M. C.

BLACKBURN, J.—Though the Legislature has certainly used language as though its intention was to disguise its meaning, I think that the sessions have come to the right conclusion. If the husband and wife were living together they could not be removed if the husband had no place of settlement, or if he were removable his wife would be removable with him. Now the question upon reading the 1st section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and the proviso in the 1st section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, is, What is the meaning of the Legislature? Has the pauper lived in the respondents' parish to gain the status of irremovability? In the present case the pauper had acquired that status before her marriage, and Reg. v. Glossop, shows that that status may be joined to her after residence as a widow. Well, then, here the woman has resided for more than a year in the respondents' parish. She marries and continues to reside in the same parish. It is then said that she falls within the proviso of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, inasmuch as her husband has not resided there the requisite time, and that she is therefore not irremovable. But I think as her husband is not living with her her status of irremovability is resumed, and that no order could be made for her removal.

DAVIS v. PEARCE.

Practice—County Court—Proof of service of summons—Notice to defend—30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 2.

Where in an action brought in a County Court a summons has been served on the defendant in the form contained in schedule B to 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, and the defendant has given notice to defend, the plaintiff need in no case prove the service of the summons.

This was an application for a rule calling on the judge of the County Court of Middlesex to show cause why he should not proceed to hear and determine an action that had been brought in his court by the present plaintiff against the present defendant, and why all proceedings under the order of the said judge, for payment of the defendant's costs by the plaintiff, should not be stayed.

The affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney stated:

1. A plaint was on the 22nd March last issued out of the said County Court under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 2, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant to be dealt with in the way of his trade.

2. That in pursuance of the said section, the defendant gave notice to the court of defence to the said action, to the effect that "a portion of the goods were never sold to him; that part payment had been made; and that he objected to the jurisdiction of the court."

3. That on the 12th April I attended the court on behalf of the plaintiff with his witnesses, and the defendant also attended the said court at the hearing, with his attorney.

4. That the plaint was called on for hearing, when I stated to the court that I attended on behalf of the plaintiff, and that the defendant and his attorney were present to defend in pursuance of the notice filed by the defendant in the said court.

5. That the learned judge then required proof of the service of the said plaint on the defendant, notwithstanding his appearance in court with his attorney, and upon my urging upon the said judge that the said proof of service was unnecessary by reason of the said notice so filed as aforesaid by the defendant and his then appearance in court by himself and his attorney, the said judge directed that the said proof was necessary, and refused to hear the said plaint without such proof, although requested so to do by myself and the attorney for the said defendant, and eventually delivered his judgment in the following words: "I decline to hear this case, as there is no proof of the service of the plaint on the defendant, and I nonsuit the plaintiff." And, on application of the defendant's attorney, he added: "The costs of the defendant to be borne by the plaintiff."

Holker, Q. C. showed cause on behalf of the County Court judge.

Nasmith, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

KEATING, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. It appears that the plaintiff commenced proceedings in this County Court by serving on the defendant a notice in the form contained in schedule B to 31 & 32 Vict. c. 142. The summons was personally served on the defendant under that section, and the defendant was then at liberty to give notice to the plaintiff of his intention to defend, which in this case he actually did. In case he had not given such notice, then the plaintiff, on proof of the service of such summons, would have been entitled to judgment by default. The defendant, however, did give notice of his intention to defend, and appeared in court accordingly. I do not know, however, that the fact of his appearance is material, for he had served a notice of his intention to defend, and having served that, the plaintiff was not entitled in any case to judgment by default, on merely proving the service of notice on the defendant. I think that the fact of the defendant having given notice to defend dispensed with the necessity of proving the service of the summons, as the only object of such proof in any case is to show that the summons had come to the knowledge of the defendant. Here, as the defendant had given notice to defend, the plaintiff was bound to prove his case, and, on having done so, would have been entitled to judgment. The judge, no doubt, thought that the best mode of procedure was by proof of service, but he had no right to require it in this case, and to nonsuit the plaintiff because he did not produce it. I am of opinion that in doing so the judge was wrong; but, as he took this course solely under a mistaken impression as to his duty, I make no order as to costs.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Proof of the service of the plaint is only required where no notice to defend is given by the defendant. Where no such notice has been given the plaintiff is entitled under the Act to judgment by default, on mere proof of the service of the summons. But when notice to defend has been given, "the action shall be heard in the ordinary course." I am of opinion that the judge was distinctly wrong in adopting the course he did, and that he ought to have allowed the plaintiff to proceed to prove his case.

BURKE v. THE MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Negligence—Mere happening of accident, evidence of.

A train, in running from one station to another at about 300 yards distance, and at the end of which there were two stationary buffers, suddenly jolted against something, and caused injury to the plaintiff, who was in the train. As soon as the jolt had taken place, the train became stationary close to the buffers. Evidence was given that the engine driver ought to bring the train up to the buffers in a way that no jolt ought to be felt.

Held that, under the circumstances, the mere fact of this accident happening was evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the company.

This was an action for negligently carrying the plaintiff, whereby he was injured. Plea, not guilty.

The case was tried before M. Smith, J., at Leeds. It was shown that the plaintiff was travelling in an ordinary passenger train of the defendants to Hull. The station "New Holland" is only about 300 or 400 yards from another station, at which people get out for Hull. At the end of this station there are two stationary buffers to prevent the trains from going any further. The plaintiff after passing New Holland station suddenly felt a great jolt, was thrown forward and much injured. It was proved that immediately after the jolt, the train came to a standstill close to the buffers. The station-master at New Holland proved that it was the duty of the engine-driver to bring the train up at the stationary buffers, but to do so so gently that no jolt ought to be felt. The jury found for the plaintiff.

Overend, Q. C. (Mellor with him), moved pursuant to leave reserved to enter the verdict for the defendants or for a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury. There was no evidence at all to show how the accident happened, and the facts proved were quite consistent with the idea of its being a pure accident. It is true that in some cases the mere fact of an accident happening has been held sufficient evidence of negligence as in

Scott v. The London Dock Company, 13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 148; 34 L. J. 220, Ex.;

Bird v. The Great Northern Company, 28 L. J. 3, Ex.

That, however, depends on the nature of the accident, and it is submitted that, in this case, the accident is not of a kind to be evidence in itself.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. Mr. Overend's contention is that the mere occurrence of the accident is no evidence of negligence on the part of the company, and, though that no doubt is so, the question in a case like this must depend on the circumstances. The rule was laid down in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in Scott v. The London Dock Company (ubi sup.), "that there must be reasonable evidence of negligence; that where the thing is solely under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen to those who have the management of machinery, and use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care." I think that these remarks strictly apply to a case like this. Here the train arrived at the station, and had only a distance of 300 or 400 yards further to go, so that, under the circumstances, it was impossible that it could be going at great speed. The train was under the control of the company. At the end of the line there were stationary buffers, which were also under the defendants' control. According to the evidence of one witness, it was at the landing place, and according to another witness it was about 10yds. from the waiting-room, that something occurred which threw the plaintiff violently against the seat in front of him. It seemed as though the train bumped against something, and immediately after the bump the train was stationary. The question is, is that evidence from which reasonable men might infer that the accident arose from the train running against the stationary buffers? Could it have been caused in any other way? If the accident did happen in this way, then there was evidence of negligence, for it was the duty of the driver (as was proved by the station-master) to come up so as not to rebound. I think, therefore, that, according to the rule laid down in Scott v. The London Docks Company, there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and that there ought to be no rule.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case falls within the rule laid down in Scott v. The London Docks Company, in which, though there was some difference of opinion among the judges, the judges unanimously laid down the rule referred to by my lord, that where a thing is under the sole care of the defendant, and the accident is one which does not happen in the ordinary course of things, and when proper care is taken, there is reasonable evidence of negligence to go to the jury. I think that that is a sensible doctrine; and, acting upon it, I think that this rule ought to be refused.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will not say that an accident may not occur from which no presumption of negligence arises, but each case must be determined by its own peculiar circumstances. If the facts supported Mr. Overend's contention, that the accident is quite consistent with a misadventure, there would be no evidence; but the facts seem to me to point the other way. The train was brought to a standstill at the station. It then went on a short distance towards the stationary buffers, when it struck against something, and then stopped. It was this concussion that caused the plaintiff's injuries. Under the circumstances, I think there must be a very strong presumption that the train was driven with too great force against the stationary buffers, and if that was so, that was negligence. The remarks of Blackburn, J., in Scott v. The London Docks Company, apply. "Does not the nature of the accident decide whether the fact of the accident is evidence of negligence? If a ship goes down at sea, and no one can tell whether it sunk by reason of a storm, or by reason of the negligence of the crew, the evidence in that case would be equally consistent with either view. But if a ship goes out of harbour, and, after it has got a very short distance, sinks in a perfectly smooth sea, I think this would, as it has been held, be some evidence that the ship was not seaworthy." So here, the accident did not occur while the train was running, but while it was at the station, and no other train was near. I think that all the circumstances of the accident go to show that it arose from the train being brought up too suddenly, and, consequently, that there should be no rule.

BRETT, J.—It certainly is not in the ordinary course of things, that a train going this short distance should give a jerk, so as to cause injuries to the passengers. I think that the case falls within the rule laid down in Scott v. The London Docks Company.

LEE v. SOUTHERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Insurance on freight—Suing and labouring clause—Expenses not specifically incurred.

A ship with a cargo of oil from Cameroons to Liverpool was stranded on the Welsh coast; the cargo was discharged, and the ship was afterwards got off and repaired; the cargo, after some delay, and at the expense of 70l., might have been reshipped and sent on to its destination, but the shipowner forwarded it by railway to Liverpool at a cost of 212l. 15s. 1d., and received the freight, about 600l.

Held, in an action by the owner against the insurer on freight, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover this sum of 70l., under the suing and labouring clause in the policy, being the least expense by which he could avert the loss of freight, although that specific sum was not expended.

This was an action brought to recover, under a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants on freight, certain charges and expenses incurred in forwarding certain goods, in respect of which the freight was payable, to their place of destination; and by the consent of the parties and by order the following special case was stated for the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs are insurance brokers, carrying on business in London under the style and firm of Bushbys and Lee. The defendants are an insurance company carrying on business in London.

On the 20th Nov. 1867, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants on behalf of the owners of the ship Charles a policy of insurance in the sum of 600l. on the freight of the said ship, the freight being valued therein at 600l., and the voyage insured being at and from and during the vessel's stay and trade at Cameroons, and thence to Liverpool. The plaintiffs effected the said policy through Messrs. John Sutton and Co., insurance brokers, of Liverpool. The policy was of the usual form, and contained the customary clause making the insurers liable for the charges incurred by the insured, if the latter should in case of loss or misfortune "sue, labour, and travel, for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof."

On the 26th Oct. 1867, the Charles duly sailed from Cameroons on the insured voyage to Liverpool with a cargo of palm oil consisting of about 500 casks weighing about half a ton each, and in the course of her voyage she encountered bad weather off the coast of Ireland, and after having sustained considerable damage was stranded on the 18th Jan. 1868, on the Welsh coast near Pwllheli, and drifted on to the beach. Attempts were made on the following day to get the vessel off by means of two tugs, but without success, the heavy surf setting her further on to the beach, and the leakage of the vessel increasing. No further attempts were made to get the vessel off until the 22nd Jan. when a steam-tug with extra hands was again engaged, but the efforts were ineffectual. On the 23rd Jan. two tugs were employed to get the vessel off, but they failed in so doing, and on the 24th there was a heavy gale and sea, which made the vessel beat upon the beach, bilging heavily, and caused her to make a considerable quantity of water.

When intelligence of the disaster which the Charles had met with as afore-mentioned reached Liverpool on or about the 25th Jan. 1868, a Mr. Johnson was sent by the plaintiffs to the place where the ship was stranded, with directions to take such steps as to forwarding the cargo as might appear to him advisable for the interest of all parties, after consulting with the surveyors and persons he might find there acting on behalf of the underwriters on and owners of the cargo.

Mr. Johnson accordingly proceeded to Pwllheli, and on the 27th Jan. a survey was held on the Charles. It was found by the surveyors that the vessel was much strained, the seams and butts were started, and the metal was falling off the bilge, and several other parts of her; and as she was making much water, the sea making a clean breach over her, they recommended, for the interests of all concerned, that the cargo should be discharged at once, and that an attempt should be made next spring tides to get her off.

The place where the vessel lay stranded as afore-said was within 500 yards of the railway station, and at low water she was high and dry on the beach, and when the tide was in, the weather was such that lighters could not safely approach.

After consultation with the surveyors, and the representatives of the underwriters on and owners of the cargo, Mr. Johnson resolved, with the assent and approval of such representatives, on behalf of the persons whom they respectively represented, to have the cargo discharged, and to forward the same by rail from Pwllheli to Liverpool. The cargo was accordingly discharged in carts while the tide was sufficiently low to allow of their reaching the ship, and being taken in such carts to the railway station, was then forwarded by rail to Liverpool. The total expense of forwarding the cargo by rail to Liverpool amounted to 212*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*

LEE v. SOUTHERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

There was no direct telegraphic communication between Pwllheli and Liverpool, and it would not have been prudent to delay discharging the cargo until after communicating with Liverpool.

The entire freight in respect of the cargo on board the Charles amounted to 607*l.*, of which 52*l.* had been paid in advance, leaving a balance of 555*l.*, and this balance was paid to the owners of the ship by the owners of the cargo, on the delivery of the cargo to them.

On the 3rd Feb. 1868, the Charles was, after considerable difficulty, and after having been temporarily repaired on the beach, got off, and towed by a tug to Gimlet Rock, which is a few miles off the place where she had been stranded, and there further temporary repairs were done to her, sufficient to enable her to be towed to Carnarvon. On the 23rd Feb. she proceeded under tow to Carnarvon, where she arrived on the 25th. She was there put on the patent slip, and the damage which she had sustained was repaired; the repairs were completed on the 8th of the following April, and the ship was after such repairs thoroughly seaworthy for the completion of the voyage.

No warehouses exist at Pwllheli for the storage of goods, but there are two courses which it would have been possible to adopt had it been determined to store the oil at that place. One course would have been to store it in some twenty various places about the town; or two or three barns near the town might perhaps have been obtained for the purpose. The other course would have been to store the casks in a field near the railway station, where they might have been stacked, but it would have been necessary to have them constantly watched. The cost of warehousing in the former way would have been about 9*l.* a week. The cost of watching, if the latter course had been adopted, would have been about 1*l.* a week.

The harbour at Pwllheli, though suited for small coasting vessels, is not fitted for a vessel of the size of the Charles, and it would not have been possible to have reshipped the cargo on board her at Pwllheli, excepting by beaching her. This could only have been done during continuous fine weather, and a vessel coming from Carnarvon might have had to wait a very considerable time before meeting with suitable weather. Even in such weather it would have been a dangerous operation to have loaded the whole cargo whilst the ship was so beached. The only anchorage ground near Pwllheli is at a place called St. Tidswell's Roads. The anchorage there is not a very safe one, and in order to reship the cargo it must have been taken in lighters a distance of about seven miles.

It would have cost about 30*l.* to reship the cargo, if the ship had been beached. If taken in lighters to St. Tidswell's Roads the cost would have been about 70*l.*

There are warehouses at Carnarvon where the oil could have been stored. The cost of carriage to Carnarvon would have been considerably less than to Liverpool.

No estimate has been made by the plaintiffs of the cost of adopting either of the above modes of storing or reshipping the cargo, but they claimed from the defendants 152*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, the estimated cost of forwarding the cargo to Liverpool, if it had been sent by sea instead of by rail. The sums mentioned above have been fixed approximately only from the materials before the arbitrator, by whom this case was settled.

The defendants have paid into court sufficient to cover all claims of the plaintiffs under the said policy, except in respect of the dealings with the cargo after it was landed at Pwllheli.

The court is to be at liberty to draw all such inferences of fact as a jury would be justified in drawing.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the defendants are liable, under the said policy, to pay to the plaintiffs the said sum of 152*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, or any and what portion thereof?

If the court be of opinion that the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiffs as aforesaid the whole or any portion of the said sum of 152*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum as the court may find the plaintiffs entitled to recover, together with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover from the defendants any portion of the said sum of 152*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, then judgment shall be entered for the defendants, with costs of defence.

The plaintiffs' points of argument were: First, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sum of 152*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, being the smallest sum for which the goods would have been forwarded to Liverpool in a reasonable manner under all the circumstances of the case; secondly, that the ship was not bound, after being repaired, to return and take on board the cargo in an open roadstead; thirdly, that a prudent uninsured owner would not have made his ship return to take on board the cargo in the St. Tidswell's Roads, under the circumstances mentioned; fourthly, that the plaintiffs are at any rate entitled to what it would have cost to reship the cargo, if the vessel had returned to take on board the cargo after being repaired.

The defendants' points were: First, that as the ship might have been repaired, and the goods have been reshipped and conveyed in the ship to their destination, the freight insured was not lost by the perils insured against; secondly, that the expenses of forwarding the goods from the place of disaster to their destination was not a charge upon the freight, as they were incurred for the benefit of the goods only. Thirdly, that in case of such a disaster the underwriters on freight are liable only for general average falling upon the freight, and for the particular charges falling upon the freight, incurred either in reshipping the goods for conveyance to their destination when the ship can be repaired for that purpose, or in forwarding the goods by other means to their destination for the purpose of earning the freight, when the ship cannot be repaired for that purpose; fourthly, that as the ship could have been repaired so as to have taken the goods to their destination, the losses arising from the delays, risks, and expenses occasioned by repairing the ship and reshipping the cargo do not constitute an average on the freight.

Cohen argued for the plaintiffs. It is admitted that if goods are severed from a ship by perils of the sea, the expenses of reshipping may be charged to underwriters on freight either on the suing and labouring clause, or on a total loss; and it was held in Kidston v. The Empire Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 1, C. P. 857; 16 L. T. Rep. 119, that if goods are forwarded by a substituted ship, the charges of forwarding may be recovered, under this clause, against the underwriters on freight. The rule is that the expenses of discharging are charges on general average; the expenses of warehousing are charges on cargo; and the expenses of reshipping are charges on freight; the case finds that 70*l.* would have been the cost of reshipping, and it follows that if that expense had been actually incurred, it would have been clearly recoverable against the insurers of freight: (Le Cheminant v. Pearson, 4 Taunt. 367.) It may be that the owners have spent more than they ought to have, but this is a contract of indemnity, and it does not follow that they cannot recover anything from the insurers on that account: (Cory v. Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company (Limited), L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 181; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 495.) It is said in Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1451, that in the case of unavoidable delay, if a master does not retain the cargo there is no average loss on freight; but Parsons says, vol. ii. p. 155, "It is the duty of the master to transship goods, or send them on even by land carriage, if he can with reasonable endeavours."

LEE v. SOUTHERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. (with Watkin Williams) for the defendant.—These passages from American authors refer only to the expenses of necessary transport to a place of reshipment: (Phillips, vol. ii., s. 1442.) These expenses claimed by the plaintiffs have never been incurred; and, if they can be said to have been incurred, they were charges for the benefit of the owner of the goods and not for the purpose of earning the freight. The only consequence, if the goods had not been sent on by land, would have been some delay in receiving the freight; and that is not a charge upon the insurer of freight:

Mordy v. Jones, 4 B. & C. 394;

Philpott v. Swann, 11 C. B., N. S., 270.

In order to recover under the suing and labouring clause the charges must have been incurred in order to avert a loss which would otherwise have fallen upon the underwriter:

Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders, 2 B. & S. 266;

Booth v. Gair, 15 C. B., N. S., 291;

Everth v. Smith, 2 M. & S. 278.

The plaintiffs cannot recover 70*l.* for reshipping, because it has never been spent; and they cannot recover any of their claim, because the charges were not incurred in averting a loss which would otherwise have fallen on the underwriters, i.e., a loss by perils of the sea.

Cohen in reply.

BOVILL, C. J.—In deciding this case the court is first called upon to draw inferences of fact. It appears that the vessel was stranded on the 18th Jan., and on the 3rd Feb. she was finally got off. Judging from the statements in the case, I come to the conclusion that she was in such a position and under such circumstances that she could have been got off and repaired, and could have carried on her cargo within reasonable time. I conclude, also, that it was necessary and proper that the cargo should be discharged for that purpose, and I conclude that she could have gone to St. Tidswell's Roads, and have been repaired. I conclude, also, that the cargo might after some delay have been reshipped, and that the vessel might have gone on to Liverpool and earned the freight. And I conclude that the freight might also have been earned at a cost of 70*l.* by carrying the cargo in lighters to St. Tidswell's Roads, and I also conclude that would have been a reasonable and proper mode of so earning it. It seems to me that upon these conclusions the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the underwriters on freight this sum of 70*l.* The course adopted was that of sending on the cargo by railway at the cost of about 212*l.*; this was done by the agent of the shipowners, the plaintiffs, and I conclude that they paid the railway company on behalf of the shipowners the cost of the carriage. The shipowners did receive the balance of the freight amounting to 555*l.*, and I consider the freight, therefore, to have been earned by the shipowners, and to have been obtained by them only through the course they adopted, and to have been received under the contract of freight. That freight was earned, and the loss of freight was saved by reason of extraordinary expenditure which was incurred for the purpose of saving the freight, and for that only. I had some hesitation what inferences to draw from the loose and unsatisfactory statements in the case, but, after consideration, I draw these as I have stated. If the facts are so, and upon these assumptions, an expense was necessary for the purpose of earning the freight; and the whole of the expense actually incurred was not properly incurred. Upon these facts, and the conclusions I have drawn, I think 70*l.* is the proper measure of responsibility on the part of the underwriters on freight. True the plaintiffs have paid a larger sum, but that was more than the saving of the freight reasonably and properly required.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. From the facts contained in the case, I deduce the inferences which have been stated by my Lord, and upon those inferences I think the plaintiffs should in this action recover 70*l.* No doubt the freight was earned and paid in consequence of an extraordinary expenditure. Now, suppose the goods had been transhipped to lighten in the ordinary course, or reshipped in either manner suggested in the case; then no doubt the expense would properly fall on the underwriters for freight. There is certainly no case to be found which is an authority for saying that money which has not been actually spent for a particular purpose could be recovered under the suing and labouring clause in a policy on freight, but it seems to me to be immaterial here that this exact sum was not paid, because a larger sum was incurred by the course adopted, and paid by the plaintiffs. 70*l.* should measure the amount of charge which might be reasonably and fairly made against these insurers, and I think their liability should be confined to that, for Mr. Cohen has not succeeded in justifying the expenditure of the larger sum; although the cost of the 212*l.* was perhaps reasonably incurred with respect to one view of the facts, namely, that of the owners of cargo, yet it was not so with respect to the underwriters on freight. It seems to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict for 70*l.*

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. From the facts I infer that, the ship having been stranded on the Welsh coast, the most reasonable course necessary to be adopted in order to save the freight would have been to land the oil and store it, whilst the ship went some distance for repairs; she ought to have been so repaired, and after she had returned to within a reasonable distance, the cargo should have been reshipped. The expense would then have been 70*l.*, to which sum the plaintiff would have been entitled from the underwriters on freight. I think now, although a different course was adopted, that the plaintiffs are entitled to that sum under the suing and labouring clause of the policy, but not to any more. It was argued for the plaintiffs that it was reasonable, under the circumstances, to send on the cargo at once; but it seems to me that in order to earn the freight there would have been no unreasonable delay in repairing the ship and returning to reship the goods. Where the goods might be reshipped in the same vessel I do not think the underwriter on freight ought to be charged with any extra cost for transshipment or carriage by land, and I think the court cannot enter into consideration of the liability for any sum beyond what would be the expenses of reshipment. On the facts here, I think the expenses of transshipment and carriage by railway cannot be recovered, but 70*l.* for reshipment was an extraordinary expense which the shipowner was bound to incur in order to earn the freight, and therefore it comes within the principle laid down in the case of Kidston v. The Empire Marine Insurance Company. No doubt we are giving the plaintiff a sum of 70*l.*, which he did not specifically expend, but it was necessary in order to earn the freight to carry the cargo to Liverpool; and although he might have done so by reshipment, it can make no difference to the defendant's liability that he preferred to send it by railway instead. Why can it be necessary to repair and reload the ship in order to preserve the owner's right? The least expense would have been this 70*l.*, and the fact of the owner having sent the cargo on by a better and more expensive mode does not disentitle him to that sum.

BRETT, J.—I without doubt draw the inference that the plaintiff paid these expenses for the purpose of obtaining the freight insured by the defendants. If it had only been for the advantage of the owner of the goods, or for the market, he would not have taken upon himself the extra expense which he incurred, or, at all events, if it had been so, it would have been stated in the case. I think Mr. Cohen failed to make out that the distances and difficulties were so great as to justify the shipowner in sending on the goods by railway, and I think he might reasonably have adopted the less expensive plan of reshipment; for this less expense the defendants ought to be liable. The plaintiffs might have repaired the vessel, and reshipped the cargo for 70*l.*, and by the payment of that sum the loss of freight would have been saved. They went to a greater expense, but averted the loss of freight. I think the plaintiffs having been put to actual expenditure, the contract of indemnity contained in the policy requires that the underwriters should repay the amount of the least onerous mode which the plaintiffs might have adopted to avert the loss of freight.

THE LORDS BAILIFFS AND JURATS OF ROMNEY MARSH v. THE CORPORATION OF THE TRINITY HOUSE.

Negligence—Proximate cause of damage—Wreck—Damage caused by—Duty of owner.

A vessel belonging to the defendants, through the negligence of the captain and crew, grounded on a shoal. From the state of the weather and tide at the time the necessary consequence of her so grounding was that she was driven towards the shore and ultimately struck against the plaintiffs' sea wall, doing it damage. Had the weather been moderate and the tide different the vessel, notwithstanding her striking the ground, might have been prevented from being driven against the wall:

Held (dubitante Martin, B.), that the negligence of the captain and crew was the proximate cause of the vessel's being driven against the wall, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover from the defendants as owners of the vessel, the damages so occasioned.

The defendants' vessel having been driven against the plaintiffs' wall as above described, continued to bump against the wall for some time, thus doing further damage than that occasioned by her first striking. The only way of preventing this damage would have been by immediately breaking her up. If that step had been taken a quantity of valuable property ultimately saved from the vessel would have been lost. The time that elapsed before she was broken up and her first striking was not longer than was reasonably sufficient for the removal of the property so saved:

Held, that had the vessel in the first instance been driven by unavoidable accident against the wall, this further damage would not have been recoverable, because no duty was cast upon the owner of immediately breaking up the vessel to prevent her doing further damage, but only of using reasonable skill and diligence to prevent such further damage.

This was a case stated by order of Nisi Prius.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendants were possessed of a ship, and navigating the same upon the seas by their mariners and servants in that behalf, and they so carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully navigated and directed the same, that the same became and was wrecked, and ran foul of, and was driven and forced, and came upon, and continued for a long time against, a certain sea wall of the plaintiffs by the side of and facing the sea, whereby the said wall was broken, damaged, and injured, and the plaintiffs thereby incurred expense in restoring and repairing the same, and making good the said damage and injury.

Second count: that during all the time thereafter mentioned, the defendants were possessed and had the control and management of a certain ship or vessel which, while in their possession, control, and management, and on the seas, had been by the force and violence of the winds and waves wrecked and forced, and driven and come upon and against, and near to, a certain sea wall of the plaintiffs, and did and was continuing and likely to continue to do great damage and injury to the said wall by being bumped, struck, knocked, and cast upon and against it and otherwise, and they could and ought, by reasonable and due and proper care, skill, and diligence, to have stopped and hindered and prevented the said ship or vessel from doing and continuing to do the said further damage and injury to the said wall as aforesaid, yet the defendants, well knowing the premises, did not use reasonable and due and proper care, skill, and diligence to stop, hinder, and prevent the said ship or vessel from doing and continuing to do the said damage and injury to the said wall, and by reason of the defendants' carelessness and neglect in that behalf the said ship or vessel continued to do and did do great damage and injury to the said wall by being bumped, struck, and knocked and cast upon and against it, and the plaintiffs thereby were put to and incurred expense in restoring and repairing the same, and making good the said damage and injury.

Pleas: 1. Not guilty. 2. To the first count, that the defendants were not possessed of the said ship, nor were they navigating the same as in the said count alleged. 3. To the second count, that they were not possessed nor had they the control or management of the said ship, nor was the same, while in their possession, control, or management, forced or driven, nor did the same come upon, against or near to the said sea wall, nor could or might the defendants by reasonable or due or proper care, skill, or diligence have stopped, hindered, or prevented the said ship from doing or continuing to do the said damage and injury in the said count mentioned, or any part thereof.

The facts of the case were as follows:

The plaintiffs were the owners of the Dymchurch Wall, which is three to four miles in length, and was built for the protection of the Romney Marsh from the inroads of the sea, and is repaired and maintained by and at the expense of the plaintiffs. The defendants were the owners of a pilot cutter of 52 tons, called the Queen, which, at the time of the happening of the events after mentioned, was in charge of a captain and crew who were the servants of the defendants. On the evening of the 30th Nov. 1867, the defendants' said cutter, the Queen, was off the Kentish coast on her way from the Dungeness Roads to Dover, and then through the negligence of the said captain and crew struck the ground on a shoal of mud, about three quarters of a mile out from the Dymchurch Wall.

At the time when the said cutter so struck the ground the weather was very bad; it was blowing hard, and there was a flood tide, and in consequence thereof the captain and crew after she so struck as aforesaid, lost all control over her, and she gradually drifted towards the shore, and at last was driven against the Dymchurch Wall. If the weather had been moderate, and the state of the tide different, the cutter, notwithstanding her striking the ground, might have been kept from being driven against the said wall, but in the then state of the weather and tide after the said cutter so struck the ground as aforesaid, the captain and crew could not have prevented her being driven against the said wall. After the cutter struck the ground, and before she was driven against the Dymchurch wall, some of the crew escaped in a boat, and one of them in endeavouring to get into the boat was drowned. The captain and the rest of the crew were rescued from the cutter just before she struck upon the wall by means of a rope thrown from the shore. It was necessary in order to save their lives, for the captain and the crew to leave the cutter when they did. During the night of the 30th Nov. the cutter remained on the wall a wreck, and with no person in possession of her, but on the following day, the defendants, by their servants, resumed possession of the cutter, and immediately applied themselves to saving her sails, rigging, and stores. The defendants also immediately secured the cutter by anchors to the wall, so as to prevent the cutter doing more damage than was inevitable, as long as she remained on the wall. On the 4th Dec. 1867, the cutter was surveyed by the defendants' surveyor, and it was found impossible to repair her, and she was ordered to be sold, and accordingly she was sold by public auction on the 9th Dec., and by the 13th Dec. she was broken up. No claim was made in the action for damage which occurred after the 9th Dec. Considerable damage was done to the Dymchurch wall by the cutter being driven against the wall, and further damage was done to the wall by the cutter bumping against it every tide until she was sold.

After the cutter was driven against the wall there was no possible means of getting her off, or preventing the further damage being done to the wall every tide, except by breaking her up. The cutter might have been broken up by defendants' servants by the 5th Dec., and if she had been so broken up the damage done to the wall between the 5th and 9th would not have occurred (and such damage though slight was appreciable); but if the cutter had been broken up by the 5th a considerable amount of property saved from the cutter would have been lost; and the servants of the defendants acted prudently in the interest of the defendants in taking the steps they did, which led to the cutter being sold on the 9th and broken up on the 13th, and not before, as the time which elapsed between the time of the cutter striking the said wall and the said 9th Dec. was not longer than was reasonably necessary for the removal from the cutter of the property so saved. The question for the court was whether the defendants were liable for all or any part of the damage done to the Dymchurch wall, as above stated.

Honyman, Q. C., with him Biron, for the plaintiffs.—The question as to the first count will be whether the damage was the natural and proximate result of the negligence of the defendants' servants in letting the cutter get on shore. I submit that it was. With respect to the second count, the principle of law is this:—If, by unavoidable accident, a vessel is wrecked, and the owner chooses to abandon it altogether, he is no longer responsible for any damage that may arise; but, if he chooses to resume possession, or retain his property in it, he has no right to leave it in a position where it is damaging to his neighbour's property. He cited

Pollock, Q. C., with him Dixon, for the defendants. Upon the second count it is clear that there is no cause of action. It cannot be that I am bound to destroy my property at once because it is doing damage to another, having been brought into that situation by the violence of the winds and waves, without negligence on my part. If a stranger lets my horse loose, and he gets on my neighbour's ground and is doing damage, can I be bound to shoot him, if that is the only way of immediately preventing him from doing further mischief? Then, with regard to the first count, the damage is too remote. Can the ship being dashed against the wall be said to be the natural and proximate result of the captain's negligence? In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur. Here the proximate cause was the violence of the winds and waves. He cited KELLY, C.B.—As to the second count, we are all of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment. The count alleges that the vessel continued in the control and under the management of the defendants after she was wrecked and driven against the sea wall, and that the defendants might, by due skill and care, have prevented her from continuing to be struck against the wall, but that they did not use due skill and care to do so. We do not think that, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs can contend that there was any negligence in not immediately breaking up the ship. If there had been any want of due care, such, for example, as not getting her off and away from the wall, if that had been possible, and so preventing continuance of damage, it would have been a different thing. But, under the circumstances, it would seem the only means would have been by immediately destroying her. There was valuable property on board, which could not be saved otherwise than by taking it out of the ship. The case resolves itself, therefore, into the question whether the defendants were bound then and there to destroy the vessel and sacrifice the property? It must be assumed, for the purpose of this count, that, without blame to anybody or by any negligence, but by the force of the winds and waves, and by unavoidable accident, the ship was placed in this position. That being so, there was no duty that I can see but to exercise reasonable care and skill in removing the vessel. As to the first count, the case is one of some nicety, and the court will take time to consider.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—The judgment of the court (Kelly, C.B., Martin and Pigott, B.B.) was delivered by KELLY, C.B. —The question in this case is whether the injury to the plaintiffs' wall was so caused by the negligence of the defendants as to make the defendants liable within the rule of law applicable to such cases. The defendants' vessel, by the negligence of the captain and crew, grounded upon a shoal or sand bank within three-quarters of a mile of the wall of the plaintiffs, the immediate effect of which was that the vessel became unmanageable, and beyond the control of the crew; and as at the time a high wind was blowing, and the tide flowing towards the shore, the vessel was driven and carried with great violence against the wall, and so effected the injury in question. The rule of law is that the negligence to render the defendants liable must be the causa causans, or the proximate cause of the injury, and not merely a sine quâ non. I think that it was so in the present case. The immediate effect of the negligence was to put the vessel into such a condition that it must necessarily and inevitably be impelled in whatever direction the wind and tide were giving at that moment to the sea, and this was directly upon the plaintiffs' wall. The case therefore appears to me to be the same as if the ship had been lying at anchor with the tide flowing rapidly towards a rock, and the defendants had by some negligence broken the chain and set free the ship, in consequence of which it had at once and immediately been carried by the tide with great force and violence against the rock, and had become a wreck. Would not the wreck of the ship have been caused by the negligence which broke the chain? I think that it would, and that such a case and the case before the court are the same; that the negligence of the crew, the servants of the defendants, was thus the immediate cause of the ship being driven against the wall of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover. My brother Pigott concurs in this judgment, and my brother Martin, though entertaining some doubt upon the case, does not dissent.

VINES AND WIFE v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH-COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Writ of inquiry—Taxation of costs—Good jury.

The defendants in an action let judgment go by default, and the damages were assessed under a writ of inquiry. The master upon taxation allowed the plaintiff twelve guineas for the costs of a good jury:

Held, following Vickery v. The Brighton Railway Company (sup. 270), that the master was correct.

In this case the action was to recover against the defendants in respect of injuries sustained by plaintiffs while travelling on defendants' railway. The defendants suffered judgment by default, and a writ of inquiry to assess the damages was executed before the Secondary of London and a good jury. Upon taxation of costs the master allowed the plaintiff a guinea each for the good jury. A rule had been obtained to review the taxation with respect to the allowance of the good jury and the amount paid to them.

Channell showed cause.

Lopes, Q. C., and Joyce, supported the rule.

The arguments employed and authorities cited were almost identical with those in the case of Vickery v. The London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company (sup. 270).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11th.—The judgment of the court (Kelly, C. B., Martin, B., and Pigott, B.) was delivered as follows:—In this case a rule has been obtained to review the taxation of costs on the ground that the master has allowed fees to two counsel and also the payment of twelve guineas for a good jury upon the trial under the writ of inquiry after judgment by default. The objection to the costs of two counsel was abandoned during the argument, and we are of opinion that the rule must be discharged, and the taxation of costs by the master sustained with respect to the twelve guineas allowed for a good jury. We find that for forty-five years past it has been the practice to allow the payment in question wherever a good jury has been summoned under a judge's order before the Secondary in the City of London. The practice has been somewhat different in Middlesex, where half a guinea only has been paid when the jurymen constituting the good jury were selected only from the better classes of tradesmen; but a guinea has been paid when the jurymen were chosen from the lists of special jurors. Looking to the reasonableness as well as the antiquity of the former practice, and thinking it not inconsistent in principle with that which has prevailed in Middlesex, we think it ought to be followed and upheld as well in Middlesex as in London. My brother Martin, indeed, is disposed to doubt whether we have any power to sanction or allow this payment, which he thinks is in effect to levy a tax upon a class of the people, except under authority of Parliament, or by virtue of immemorial usage; but, after fully considering the cases which have been decided upon this subject, and the elaborate and unanimous judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Vickery v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 165, we feel bound to adopt and to follow that decision, and to hold that the taxation of costs by the master was correct. We are therefore of opinion that this rule must be discharged.

BRIDGES v. GARRETT.

Principal and agent—Copyhold fine—Crossed cheque—Payment.

plete the enrolment; afterwards the defendant paid his attorney a cheque, crossed at the request of the latter, for an amount including steward's and attorney's fees besides the fine. This cheque was duly honoured by the defendant, but the attorney's account being overdrawn, the amount was stopped by his bankers:

Held, in an action for the fine (reversing the judgment of the majority of the C. P.), that there was some evidence under the circumstances to justify a jury in finding this was payment to the lord.

This was an appeal from the decision of the majority of the Court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J., and M. Smith, J.), by which a rule to set aside a verdict for the defendant, and to enter a verdict of 78*l.* 15*s.* for the plaintiff, was made absolute. Byles, J., before whom the case was tried, dissented from the judgment of the rest of the court. In the appeal case, leave was reserved to the court to draw inferences of fact.

The facts and correspondence are fully stated in the report of the case before the Common Pleas, 21 L. T. Rep. 141; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 580.

Denman, Q.C. (with him Cohen), argued for the defendant, the appellant. The court below differed only on the sufficiency of the form of the payment by the defendant under the circumstances. The majority held that this payment, which was by means of a crossed cheque for an amount including other sums due to Craig, the defendant's attorney, who also was acting as deputy steward to the plaintiff, the lord of the manor, did not discharge the defendant's debt to the plaintiff, and that there was no evidence of any authority from the lord to Craig to accept payment in this form. The two judges in effect decided that payment by this cheque was not payment in cash. [COCKBURN, C.J.—A cheque is not always cash, at all events when it is dishonoured; but in this case it was met by the drawer. The question seems rather to be whether Craig was not functus officio when he received the cheque.] Upon that point the judgment below is silent, and the letters of the 8th June and 10th July are evidence that the authority had been continued by Mills. [KELLY, C.B.—Are we at liberty to draw inferences of fact, so as practically to reconsider the verdict?] It was only intended that the court should draw inferences consistent with the verdict; the jury found everything in the defendant's favour.

Catterall v. Hindle, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 368;

Williams v. Evans, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 352.

Garth, Q.C. (with him J. Digby), for the plaintiff. First. Craig was appointed only to take the admission, a mere ministerial act, and he could not have been deputed by Mills to accept the fine, which would have been a trust:

Parker v. Kett, 1 Ld. Raym. 658;

Gilbert on Tenures, 414, 5th edit.

Perkins' Profitable Book;

Shop. Touch. 239.

Secondly. Assuming it possible, and that Craig had authority to receive the fine upon admission, there is no evidence that such authority was continued until the actual payment by defendant:

Viney v. Chaplin, 27 L. J. 434, Ch.;

Lord St. Leonard's Handy Book, 42.

Lastly. This payment could not discharge the defendant's debt. If a man appoint another as agent to receive money, the agent must take it in what he can pay over to the principal; here the crossed cheque was for an amount including steward's fees and attorney's fees, besides the fine due to the plaintiff:

Vandeleur v. Blagrove, 17 L. J. 45, Ch.;

Story on Agency, ss. 98 and 181;

Sykes v. Giles, 5 M. & W. 645;

Barker v. Greenwood, 2 Y. & C. Ex. 419.

Denman was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think there was evidence in this case upon which the jury might find a verdict for the defendant. There are three questions, and perhaps four, which we have to consider. First, whether Craig, who was appointed deputy steward for that particular occasion in order to take the admission, was also authorised to receive payment of the fine which the defendant was bound to pay before his admission could be perfected. There seems to be no doubt that Mills, as steward, was entitled to receive the fine, and I think that in appointing Craig as his deputy, he gave him authority to do everything incidental to that office. Then, was this appointment intended to continue until the work was completed, or until its revocation? This is a question of fact, to be determined from all the circumstances, and there was certainly some evidence that it was so intended to continue. A question then arises whether the money was paid to Craig in the character of deputy steward, or to him as the defendant's solicitor, to be paid over to the plaintiff. There is evidence to be found from the facts and correspondence that Craig received the money in his former capacity. The last question is whether the form of payment, a crossed cheque for an amount including two other sums for the steward's and the attorney's fees, was such as to render the payment invalid, so far as the defendant's liability to the plaintiff is concerned. I do not think that it was. I agree that payment to an agent by a bill would not discharge a debtor, but if a debt be paid by a cheque, the payment is as good as if it were made in money; and it is not injured by the cheque being crossed. It was here paid into Craig's bank, and the bankers did not appropriate it, but they paid over the cash to Craig's account. The cheque, in fact, was cash, and the payment as it was made was just the same as if the defendant had handed over the 78*l.* 15*s.* to Craig, and he had placed it in the bank to his own account, and forwarded his cheque for the amount to Mills. If Craig was entitled to receive the money, I think this payment was a sufficient discharge of the defendant's debt. All the others are questions of fact, and although I should not have been surprised if the decision had been the other way, I cannot say that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the facts as they found them. Whatever was the proper verdict, the only question for us is whether the jury had any reason to find as they did. We ought, therefore, to reverse the decision of the court below.

BLACKBURN, J.—I agree that there was ample evidence to justify this matter being left to a jury; and I should have thought that if the payment had been made to Craig by the defendant at the time of the admission the verdict would have been right; but I doubt whether as the payment took place so long afterwards the verdict can be said to have been in accordance with the weight of the evidence. At all events, the jury might reasonably have found the other way; but as the leave is reserved and the case is stated, the verdict must stand, unless we can say it is distinctly a wrong verdict. The majority of the court below thought that the payment here was insufficient, because it was made by crossed cheque; but I think they did not notice the distinction which exists between the payment to an agent and that to a mere clerk or servant, the difference, in fact, between trusting in the honesty or in the solvency of the person who receives the money. When a creditor merely confides in the honesty and not the solvency of a person whom he authorises to receive money—as, for instance, when a banker sends his clerk to obtain payment of a bill—and that person deposes another to receive the money for him, then the deputy could have no authority to accept as payment anything but the very sum of money in cash which he has to pay over; but if a person be authorised to receive payment not in order to hand over the sum in specie, but only a sum equivalent to that he receives, then the case is different—the money would go into his general assets, and payment by the debtor would take place as soon as he paid the money to the agent. The cause of the appointment in this case was to make the agent liable, not to make him pay over the exact sum in specie. This is, of course, putting out of the question a matter of account between the parties. In the present case it seems to me that the payment was as complete as if the defendant had paid the amount directly into Craig's account. I agree with my brother Byles, and I think the judgment of the majority of the court below should be reversed.

The rest of the court concurred.

PARTRIDGE v. PRICE AND ANOTHER.

Power of judge to amend—Misjoinder of defendants.

John Price carried on business under the name of John Price and Co. His nephew, Arthur John Price, was his manager, at a salary, but was not a partner, nor had any interest in the business. The plaintiff in his dealings with the firm generally transacted business with the nephew, and consequently joined him as co-defendant with his uncle in an action for goods sold and delivered to the firm.

The court amended the declaration by striking out the nephew's name on terms.

Action for goods sold and delivered.

John Price and Arthur John Price were joined as defendants.

Lumley Smith for the plaintiff.

L. M. Aspland for the defendant.

It was proved that John Price carried on business under the trade name of John Price and Co., and that Arthur John Price, his nephew, had formerly been his manager at a salary, but was not in partnership with his uncle, nor had any interest in the business. Nevertheless, as the plaintiff when dealing with the firm had generally transacted business through Arthur John Price, he regarded him as a partner, and made him a joint defendant in this action.

On Aspland saying that the misjoinder entitled him to a verdict for the defendants, the learned judge expressed his intention of amending the declaration by striking out the name of Arthur John Price.

Aspland objected to such amendment, citing Wickens v. Steel, 2 Q. B., N. S., 488.

BYLES, J.—My impression is that I have no discretion in the matter. His Lordship referred to the Common Law Procedure Act 185, s. 87, which is as follows: "It shall and may be lawful for the court or a judge in the case of the joinder of too many defendants in any action on contract at any time before the trial of such cause, to order that the name or names of one or more of such defendants be struck out, if it shall appear to such court or judge that injustice will not be done by such amendment; and the amendment shall be made upon such terms as the court or judge by whom such amendment is made shall think proper; and in case it shall appear on the trial of any action on contract that there has been a misjoinder of defendants, such misjoinder may be amended as a variance at the trial in like manner as the misjoinder of plaintiffs has been hereinbefore directed to be amended, and upon such terms as the court or judge, or other presiding officer by whom such amendment is made shall think proper."

Aspland cited Vanderbyl v. McKenna, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 252; and Knowles v. Lister, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618, contending that the last-mentioned case was precisely in point. There, where a defendant who was not liable was joined with another who was, with a view of testing the liability of the former, Bovill, C. J. refused to amend by striking out the name of the defendant who was not liable without the consent of the counsel for the defendant who was actually liable:

BYLES, J. retired to consult Willes, J. upon the point, and on returning into court said: We are both of opinion that by the Common Law Procedure Act it is clear that I ought to amend by striking out the name of Arthur John Price; but this I shall do on the terms that the plaintiff shall pay all such extra costs as have been caused by the misjoinder. Declaration amended accordingly, and

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Tuesday, April 26.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Ex parte HOPKINS; Re GOODBEHERE AND GAINÉ.

Petition for liquidation—Adjudication of bankruptcy—Transfer of proceedings—Proofs—Reswearing of.

Where at the first meeting held under a petition for liquidation pursuant to the 125th section of the B. A. 1869, the creditors resolved upon a bankruptcy, and a petition for adjudication was accordingly presented, the affidavits of debt made by the creditors under the petition for liquidation need not be resworn for the purposes of proofs under the bankruptcy.

The proper course is to transfer the proceedings under the petition for liquidation to the petition for adjudication, whereby all the proceedings will be consolidated.

Bund moved ex parte on behalf of the petitioning creditors that the affidavits of debt and the proxies made by the creditors for the purpose of enabling them to vote at the first meeting of the creditors under a petition for liquidation by arrangement pursuant to the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and delivered to the chairman at such meeting, might be available as proofs under the bankruptcy, and form part of the proceedings thereunder, under the following circumstances:—

On the 12th Feb. 1870, the debtor filed his petition under the liquidation clauses of the Act. At the first meeting one hundred and thirty creditors has made affidavits of their debts, and one hundred and fifteen had appointed proxies to represent them at the meeting. The creditors declined to proceed under the petition, and resolved upon a bankruptcy. A petition was accordingly presented on the 11th April 1870, and adjudication made thereunder, and it was considered desirable in order to avoid expense on account of the large number of creditors that the affidavits and proxies filed under the petition for liquidation might be considered as proofs under the bankruptcy without being resworn.

Hackwood, solicitor, appeared for the debtor, and referred to the proceedings in a petition for arrangement under the 211th section of the Consolidation Act 1849, which had been adjourned into open court, and to which the present case might be assimilated.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—It seems very desirable, in order to avoid the expenses attending the making fresh proofs under the bankruptcy that this should be done. But I think that the trustee under the liquidation should be appointed the trustee under the bankruptcy. He may then consider the proofs that have been made, and which are upon the proceedings under the liquidation, and test their accuracy. I do not see that any inconvenience can result from this course to any of the parties interested. I think, therefore, that these proofs need not be resworn. The better course will be to transfer the proceedings under the petition for liquidation to the proceedings under the bankruptcy. In this way the affidavits of proof under the petition for liquidation will be annexed to and become part of the proceedings under the bankruptcy. Of course the trustee will see, as it is his duty to do, that no proofs are improperly placed upon the proceedings.

The following is the form of the order: "Whereas motion was this day made to the court by the petitioning creditors in this matter that the proofs of debts and proxies delivered to Alfred M. Hopkins as the duly appointed chairman at the first and second meetings of creditors duly held under a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition with creditors filed by the said G. T. Goodbehere and G. F. Gaine, on the 12th Feb. 1870, and duly filed with the resolutions passed at such meetings might be considered as proceedings under the adjudication of bankruptcy of the said G. F. Goodbehere and G. F. Gaine, made the 11th April 1870, and that this court would make such further or other order as the circumstances of the case might require. Now upon reading the proceedings under the said bankruptcy, and also the proceedings under the petition for liquidation by arrangement, filed by the said G. T. Goodbehere and G. T. Gaine on the 12th Feb. last, and it appearing thereby that the adjudication of bankruptcy was obtained in pursuance of a resolution to that effect passed by the creditors at the second general meeting held under the said petition, and upon reading the affidavits of A. O. Bayley, this day filed, and upon hearing Mr. Bund, of counsel for the said petitioning creditors, and Mr. Hackwood, solicitor for the above named G. T. Goodbehere, this court doth order that the proceedings under the petition for liquidation be transferred from the office for registration of arrangement proceedings to the London Court of Bankruptcy, in Basinghall-street, and be filed in order of date with the proceedings in bankruptcy in this matter, and that all affidavits of creditors made and proxies given under the said petition for liquidation, and filed with the proceedings thereunder, be deemed to be and received as affidavits of debt, and proxies made and given by the several creditors respectively under the bankruptcy proceedings. And this court doth further order that the costs of the said petitioning creditors, and of the said G. T. Goodbehere of and incident to this application, be paid out of the estate of the said bankrupts."

Ex parte B. ; Re Sir W. Russell.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Petition for liquidation—Adjournment of—Proof—May be taken off file—When.

Where the creditors at the first meeting, under a petition for liquidation pursuant to sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, only voted an adjournment, a proof which had been inadvertently admitted, and in respect of which the creditor had voted for the adjournment, may be taken off the file, under circumstances showing that the party in whose name the proof was made as the principal was only an agent in the matter.

This was an application to take a proof off the file, which had been placed thereon under the following circumstances:—Sir W. Russell had presented a petition for liquidation under the 125th sect. of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and the first meeting was held on the 7th April. On that day B. tendered a proof for 9000*l.*, in respect of certain bills of exchange drawn by C. upon and accepted by the debtor. The proof was admitted and filed by the chairman, and the meeting was then adjourned to the 28th, B. voting for the adjournment. B. again attended on the 28th, and proposed to take his proof off the file upon the ground that the bills in respect of which the proof was made were in his possession as agent only for C., in whose favour they were drawn, and that consequently his proof was informal, and was inadvertently admitted. The chairman, however, felt a difficulty in permitting the proof to be withdrawn, and the matter was referred to Mr. Keene, the registrar, who doubted whether this could be done, and wished it to be mentioned to the court for its direction as a guide for the future.

Van Sandau (solicitor) now applied on behalf of B. that the proof might be taken off the file of proceedings upon the ground that it was placed there by mistake. Nothing was done at the meeting but voting for an adjournment. No injury could result to the creditors from the withdrawing of the proof, inasmuch as upon a question of adjournment the vote of the majority only was taken without reference to value. He contended moreover that no substantial resolution was passed, and until that had been done the proofs ought not to be filed. That was clear from the 282nd General Order of Jan. 1870. The meeting was not to be regarded as complete until the final adjournment had taken place, and the first meeting stood further adjourned to the 26th May. Until the resolution was complete, any creditor was by the 273rd General Order at liberty to withdraw his proof and retire from the meeting.

Linklater (solicitor) appeared for the trustees. The proof was placed upon the file within the three days specified in the 282nd rule. If all the circumstances attending the proof had been known at the time it would not have been admitted. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—You admit that the proof influenced the meeting.] Yes. At the meeting nothing was done but to vote the adjournment. No resolution was passed. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—In voting an adjournment you only count numbers.] That is so, and absent creditors are not bound. But there was an absolute majority in number without reckoning this creditor.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—You must give me some reason why you ask to have the proof taken off the file.

Van Sandau.—The contention is, that until the resolution is passed, the proofs should not be placed upon the file, and in this case no substantive resolution was come to. Moreover the proof was made by B. in his own name as principal upon bills which were in his own possession only as agent for C., in whose favour they were drawn and accepted.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I think that under the circumstances the proof may be withdrawn, provided it did not influence the majority.

Proof withdrawn.

REG. v. DAY AND COX.

Practice—Abandoning counts—Indictment.

The first count of the indictment charged prisoners under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2, with being found on land, at night armed with a gun for the purpose of taking game, by A. and B., who had lawful authority to apprehend them, and that A. and B., being about to apprehend them, the prisoners with a weapon assaulted and wounded A. and B.

The second count charged an unlawful wounding.

The third and fourth counts charged a common assault.

At the close of the prosecution the counsel for the prosecution abandoned the last three counts, and elected to stand on the first count.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty of night poaching and a common assault.

Upon a question raised whether the prisoners could be convicted of a common assault upon the first count :

This court held that the prosecuting counsel having withdrawn the counts for common assault from the jury, the question ought not to be entertained.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved by the Right Honourable the Earl of Chichester, chairman.

At the General Quarter Sessions holden at Lewes, in and for the eastern division of the County of Sussex, on Tuesday, the 4th Jan. 1870, George Day and Thomas Cox were tried on the following indictment.

First count.

Sussex, to wit. 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that at the time of the committing of the assault hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on 10th Dec. in the year of our Lord 1869, in the night time, to wit, about the hour of eleven in the night of the same day, George Cox and Thomas Day were unlawfully in certain land, to wit, a certain wood called "Downe Copse," in the occupation of one Frederick Smith, situate at the parish of Barcombe in the county of Sussex, armed with a gun, for the purpose of then and by night as aforesaid, unlawfully taking and destroying game, and that they the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day, then so being in the said land or wood called "Downe Copse" as aforesaid, by night as aforesaid, armed with the said gun for the purpose aforesaid, were found by one Joseph Packham, a servant of the said Frederick Smith, and by one Charles Osborn, a person assisting the said Joseph Packham, the said Joseph Packham and the said Charles Osborn having lawful authority to seize and apprehend the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day. And the jurors further present that they the said Joseph Packham and the said Charles Osborn being then about to seize and apprehend the said Thomas Day for the offence aforesaid, they the said Joseph Packham and the said Charles Osborn having lawful authority so to do, they the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day with a knife or some other offensive weapon which they the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day held in their hands did then unlawfully assault, wound, or offer violence towards the said Joseph Packham and the said Charles Osborn against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Second count, unlawful wounding :

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that one Thomas Day, on the 10th Dec. 1869, did unlawfully and maliciously wound and inflict grievous bodily harm upon one Charles Osborn, with intent in so doing thereby then to resist and prevent the lawful apprehension of himself the said Thomas Day against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Third count, common assault :

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day, on the 10th Dec. 1869, did make an assault in and upon one Charles Osborn, and him the said Charles Osborn did beat, wound, and illtreat, and other wrongs to the said Charles Osborn, then did, to the great damage of the said Charles Osborn, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Fourth count, common assault :

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the said George Cox and the said Thomas Day on the 10th Dec. 1869, in and upon one Joseph Packham did make an assault, and him the said Joseph Packham did then beat, wound, and illtreat, and other wrongs to the said Joseph Packham, did, to the great damage of the said Joseph Packham, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The following was the evidence :

B. H. Hunt, solicitor, knows the property of Mr. Smith in Barcombe ; the wood is a part of what he purchased.

Charles Osborn, gamekeeper to Mr. Selater, of Newick-park, which adjoins Mr. Smith's property,

Was out with J. Packham and Martin 10th Dec. at night ; Martin is in Smith's employ. I heard firearms about half-past eleven o'clock. I was about a quarter mile from Downe Copse-wood, Mr. Smith's, where the report came from. We made the best of our way to the place. When in the ride we heard some one in the underwood. We stood still, then Day came out, I seized him and said, "Hollo, my man, what are you up to here ? Something fell on my toes, which I believe to have been a gun. Day tried to get away. We had a dreadful struggle for five or ten minutes, and then I felt an open knife in his hand. I took hold of the blade ; I then seized him by the right wrist and called to Martin to assist, and told him about the knife. Cox then cried out to Day, "Kill the b——." Just at that moment I felt my hand cut by Day. Martin went back to help Packham, and then came to me and we tied Day's hands. I took a cock pheasant quite warm out of Day's pocket. On the road we had another struggle. Day had said, "Now, mate, let's have another try." Police-constable Dive and I went next morning to place where I first took hold of Day and found gun now produced.

Cross-examined :

We heard the men walking in the wood after we had got about 300 yards down the ride. It was a very dark night. I held his necktie with my left hand. I produce what I had in my hand. I struck him with this after he cut me with the knife. I hit him about the head twice. I was alone. We were both down. He first cut his necktie. I believe the knife was found shut at the same place as the gun next morning.

Joseph Packham, assistant gamekeeper to Mr. F. Smith :

On the 10th Dec. was out with Osborn and Martin on Mr. Selater's land, and about half-past eleven we heard firearms in Down Copse, and went in that direction and found Day and Cox. I took hold of Cox and tried to throw him down. I stepped into a ditch and fell. Cox had hold of my hair and tried to throw my head back in the ditch. I called Martin, and he came to my help. We struggled for five or ten minutes. Cox had a stick in his hand while we were struggling. Cox said "If you get up, you b—— I'll kill you."

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. DAY AND COX.

[C. CAS. R.]

I had another struggle, and then I called to Martin again, and we then tied his hands. Martin then went to assist Osborn. Going along towards my house we had another struggle.

Cross-examined :

We had been out about half an hour before we heard the gun. When Cox said he'd kill me I had my life preserver.

James Martin, assistant gamekeeper to Mr. Sclater :

Was out with others. When we had been a few minutes in the wood, these two men came up. I assisted Packham and helped to hold Cox down. We were struggling near a quarter of an hour, and then Cox was quite still. Osborn called out for help, and said my man's got his knife. I went and assisted Osborn, and then went back again to help Packham. I heard him say he'd kill Cox. I tied his hands and afterwards Day's. After we were in the road we had another bit of a struggle.

Edward Dive, P.C. :

On the 11th Dec. was called to gamekeeper's house (Mr. Smith's gamekeeper) and received two prisoners. I searched both; found nothing on Day; on Cox a knife, some shot, and gun caps. About eleven same morning I found the gun loaded, now produced, four hats, and a cap, and a bludgeon. I also found this knife shut up just where the struggle took place.

After the evidence for the prosecution was closed, upon the application of the counsel for the prisoners, the last three counts were, with the consent of the court, abandoned, and the counsel for the prosecution elected to stand on the first count.

I directed the jury, on application of the counsel for the prosecution, that they might find the prisoners guilty of a common assault under the first count.

The verdict of the jury was "guilty of night poaching and a common assault," and, in answer to a question put by me, the jury said "they were of opinion the knife was not used intentionally."

Upon this finding, the counsel for the prisoners contended that such a verdict amounted to one of acquittal, and I and some of my colleagues having some doubts whether my direction was right in point of law, and whether, upon such finding, the prisoners could, under the circumstances, be convicted of a common assault, ask the opinion of the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved upon it.

If the Court shall be of opinion that the prisoners might, under the above circumstances, be convicted of a common assault upon the first count of the indictment, then sentence will be passed upon the prisoners; but if, on the other hand, the Court shall be of a contrary opinion, then a verdict of not guilty will be entered accordingly.

The prisoners were liberated on their own recognisances to appear to receive judgment when called upon.

CHICHESTER, Chairman of Quarter Sessions.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoners.

Willoughby for the prosecution. The first count of the indictment was framed upon the 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 2, which enacts that where any person shall be found upon any land committing any such offence as is hereinbefore mentioned, it shall be lawful for the owner or occupier of such land, or for any person having a right or reputed right of free warren or free chase thereon, or for the lord of the manor or reputed manor wherein such land may be situate, and also for any gamekeeper or servant of any of the persons herein-mentioned, or any person assisting such gamekeeper or servant, to seize and apprehend such offender upon such land, or, in case of pursuit being made, in any other place to which he may have escaped therefrom, and to deliver him as soon as may be into the custody of a peace officer, in order to his being conveyed before two justices of the peace; and in case such offender shall assault or offer any violence with any gun, cross bow, firearms, stick, club, or any other offensive weapon whatsoever, towards any person hereby authorised to seize and apprehend him, he shall, whether it be his first second, or any other offence, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be transported beyond seas for seven years, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding two years; and in Scotland, whenever any person shall so offend, he shall be liable to be punished in like manner. Upon the first count the prisoner may be convicted of a common assault. It is not material that the assault should be committed with a weapon. If a person uses his fists only to commit the assault, he may be convicted under the above section. The word "assault" is in the indictment, and Reg. v. Taylor, 11 Cox Crim. Cas. 261; L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 194, shows that upon an indictment for unlawfully and maliciously wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm a verdict for a common assault may be returned. In Reg. v. Yeadon, 9 Cox Cr. Cas. 91; L. & C. 81, upon an indictment containing counts for inflicting grievous bodily harm, and unlawfully and maliciously cutting and stabbing and unlawfully occasioning actual bodily harm, it was held that verdict of guilty of a common assault might be returned. [WILLES, J.—At the trial the count for common assault was abandoned. How, then, can the prosecution ask for a conviction now for a common assault?] The attention of the court at the trial was drawn to the decisions, upon the authority of which it is contended that the prisoner may be convicted of a common assault on the first count. [WILLES, J.—Reg. v. Taylor is tenable on the ground that the second count, in that case occasioning actual bodily harm, was a good count at common law.]

BOVILL, C. J.—There is much difficulty in dealing with this case in consequence of the counsel for the prosecution electing at the trial to abandon the counts for common assault. After that course had been adopted it can scarcely be considered that the prisoner had a full opportunity afforded to him of presenting his entire defence to the jury. There is this further difficulty. The jury have found the prisoner guilty of night poaching and a common assault, and it would also appear on the record that he was acquitted of a common assault. We therefore think the conviction ought not to stand. It is unnecessary to say whether the prisoner might or might not be convicted of a common assault upon the first count.

WILLES, J.—The decision proceeds only on the ground of the course adopted at the trial in electing to abandon the charge of common assault. As to the question whether the prisoner could properly be convicted of a common assault upon the first count, I think that he could not. The abandoning the count for common assault was calculated to throw the prisoner off his guard, and prevent him being fully heard against it.

BYLES, J.—I also agree that the conviction cannot be sustained on the grounds stated by my learned brothers.

HANNEN, J.—The counsel for the prosecution having deliberately abandoned the count for common assault, I think this conviction ought not to stand.

CLEASBY, B. concurred.

the registered office; that in any country where the law might so permit the company might appear and defend in legal proceedings by its chairman or a special delegate; the company was authorised to refer all differences to arbitration, in accordance with the Railway Companies' Arbitration Act; and in the event of a dissolution of the company, liquidators should be nominated in conformity with the Companies' Act 1862, or any other statute then in force. The company's registered office was in Westminster, and for some years the provisions of the Companies' Act 1862 were strictly observed. From the returns made in 1868 it appeared that 3,000,000*l.* of capital had been subscribed and paid up, 1,000,000*l.* of which (representing 100,000 shares) were taken by an Edouard Mercier, on behalf of the International Land Credit Company, Brussels. Almost all the other shares were shares to bearer. The company carried on its business for a while, but all its subscribers and other shareholders were residing on the Continent; its whole business was abroad; its directors held their meetings at Brussels; its property consisted of shares in foreign companies and of lands in foreign countries, and it had no assets in England. Two petitions praying for its compulsory winding-up were presented—the one by the International Land Credit Company, the other by a Mons. Bos and others, creditors. It was not denied that the company had ceased to carry on business for more than a year, and that it was wholly unable to pay its debts; but the petitions were resisted, both before the Vice-Chancellor and on the appeal, on the ground that the Act of 1862 had no application to a company which was purely and entirely foreign. The learned Vice-Chancellor, adopting this view, dismissed both petitions, and both petitioners now appealed.

Fry, Q. C., and Hill supported the appeal of the International Company, and Glasse, Q. C., and Waller that of Mons. Bos. They contended that under the Companies' Act this court had complete jurisdiction, the company having been registered in England and having its registered office here.

Bond Coxe, for creditors, supported the petitions.

Karslake, Q. C., and Locock Webb, for the company, consented to the winding-up order.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Cotton, Q. C., and Kekewich, for shareholders, resisted the appeals, and argued (1) that as the company was altogether foreign there was no jurisdiction to make the order, but (2) if there was such jurisdiction the order was not ex debito justitiæ, but within the discretion of the court, and that it would be far more convenient to leave the foreign courts to deal with it. But the provision that shares should be issued to bearer was wholly illegal, and the introduction of that provision vitiated the whole of the articles.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I have listened to the arguments in opposition to this petition, and I have paid every attention I could to the judgment delivered by the Vice-Chancellor, but I confess that I cannot concur in those arguments, nor can I concur in that judgment. If I did, I think there would be great danger of gross injustice being done; whereas, on the other hand, if, as seems to be suggested, the winding-up order will not be operative abroad, at least no injustice can be done. If it will be operative abroad I think there will be an opportunity of the creditors getting payment according to the contract which was really entered into with them.

Now, who are the petitioners? I will take the first petition, simply because the order I propose to make will be on the first petition. The petitioners are a company, and they aver, and it is not contradicted, that there is owing to them nearly half a million of money, that they have served notice on the company, and the company have not paid them, and it is proved in evidence that they hold in this country capital amounting to something like a million. But it is said that this court cannot make the order to wind-up this company, first, because there are shares in the company transferable to bearer, and, secondly, because it so happens that the persons, property, management, and directorship of the company are abroad.

First of all, whether these shares are so transferable to bearer that the persons who hold them are not members of the company is not a matter upon which I think it the least essential for me in the present state of the case to give any opinion. Either those persons are members of the company, and ought to be on the register, or they are not members of the company, and then that portion of the articles is ultra vires; but it would not invalidate the partnership altogether, or render the company not a company, but would simply lead to this, that that portion of the articles pro tanto would be null and void.

Then with respect to the persons, property, management, and directorship of the company being abroad, we will see presently what the terms of the Act of Parliament are; but this I do not at all hesitate to say, that, in order that a company may be a company carrying on business within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, it must be a company which, at the outset, contemplates some description of management in this country, and some description of carrying on business in this country, although, in substance, all its operations may be abroad. I can see no reason why foreigners should not be persons to sign the memorandum of association. Just observe what the origin of this Act of Parliament was. When first joint stock companies were started, they were found unwieldy associations, and it was found, on the one hand, that they could not readily take proceedings, and, on the other hand, that proceedings could not readily be taken against them. In consequence of that a great number of Acts were passed, more or less imperfect, but the object was really to clothe an ordinary partnership with something in the shape of a corporate capacity, in order, on the one hand, that they might sue, and, on the other hand, that they might be sued. This is the whole history of these Acts relating to joint stock companies. The last Act of Parliament bearing upon the subject is the Act of 1862, and if we attend to its provisions I think we shall see plainly that any persons, if they contemplate a company which, according to the articles of association, may be managed, and may be carried on here, and may have a directorship here, they may lawfully sign that memorandum, and lawfully go through those forms which are necessary in order to have the company incorporated. Of course when a company of that description is started, no one can tell whether it will take in this country, or whether it will take in some other country—no one can tell how many persons resident in this country will become shareholders—no one can tell whether the chief part of the business of this company may be carried on here, or may be carried on elsewhere. But if it is lawful for persons to start a company of this description, when once the company is started it is an incorporation, and if it does not carry on business here, the fact that it does not carry on business here is a reason why persons may take proceedings here with a view of bringing that company to an end. All the clauses that are material are these, the 6th, the 11th, the 16th, the 18th, and the 23rd, and they amount to this: That a number of persons may agree together, if they so think fit, to form a corporation; and if the thing which is contemplated by the articles is a thing which is a company within the meaning of the Act, I cannot possibly see why foreigners should not as well sign the memorandum of association as any other persons; and, therefore, the thing to be considered is this: Looking at this memorandum of association, and looking at these articles, did, or did not, the memorandum of association—did, or did not, the articles—contemplate such a thing as is mentioned in this Act, or, in other words, is it within the contemplation of these two documents that there should be a real management of the company carrying on business, and having the seat of its business here in this country?

Now let us turn to the memorandum. [His Lordship stated the effect of that instrument.] It is quite clear that it is a company which in its nature might be entirely carried on within the limits of this country if the parties so contemplated. It contemplated operations here, and it contemplated operations abroad also, and no doubt the great majority of companies that have been formed here do contemplate operations abroad. Then we come to the articles of association. [His Lordship read or referred to the 6th, 7th, and 14th clauses, saying as to the last of these:] I do not intend to express any opinion upon it; as I said before, if it is altogether ultra vires on the Act; it does not make the whole thing void, but it would be void pro tanto. On the other hand, if it is to be considered as a clause allowable under the Act, it would follow that, although you transferred shares to bearer, you who happen to be on the list of shareholders do not get rid of your liability unless you take care that some other person is put there in your place. [His Lordship then read or referred to the 16th, 23rd, 24th, and 39th, and said:] Then we come to the clauses relating to the directors, and I think they commence with No. 67. True it is, all the directors, with the exception of one gentleman, who, I think, is said to be a foreigner resident in London, were persons who are described as residing abroad, and, for aught I know, would have been likely to reside abroad; but if we go through these provisions we shall see that there are express provisions for delegating the management to particular persons, and express provisions which might so be acted upon as that, with the utmost facility, you could have a substantial management in this country. These clauses I do not think it necessary to read through; but it is quite clear that if there had been a large business here, and a large body of shareholders here, or anything of that description, although there was a fixed board of directors abroad appointed for seven years, these directors could have delegated their powers to anyone (there is express provision to that effect) for the purpose of management; and, assuming that there had been business here, and a body of shareholders here, and a management here, as there might have been consistently with these articles, there would have been, unquestionably, a company carrying on business distinctly within the meaning of the Act.

Then there is the 128th clause, which provides for advertisements of dividends; the 149th, which has reference to defences to legal proceedings in any country; and the 150th clause giving power to the company to refer matters to arbitration consistently with the Railway Companies' Arbitration Act.

What we have is this: True it is that the memorandum of association was signed entirely by foreigners, and if it had contemplated originally that there should be no management here, if it had contemplated originally that there should be no business here, I can understand the application of the arguments which have been addressed to me. But this is a company which contemplated a management here and a business here, and it was a company which was incorporated here according to the forms prescribed by the law of this country, and I must add that every shareholder who became a member of this company contracted to make himself liable to the laws of this country as laid down, amongst other things, in this Act of 1862.

That being so, the petitioners whom we have here are persons who, as I have stated, are creditors to the amount of nearly half a million of money, and who hold in this concern capital amounting to a million. We have the company appearing, and the company raises no objection. We have shareholders, I believe to a very large amount, appearing, and saying the company ought not to be wound-up. But what I asked was this; first of all, if it be proved that this is a corporation within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, and if it be proved, and I must assume it to be proved, that there is no other corporation of the same name carried on elsewhere, for there is no evidence that there is any other corporation,—what practical remedy have these creditors except by getting the order to wind-up? Their debt is proved. I cannot take it that their debt is a foreign debt, and it matters not to me whether it is a foreign debt or not, but their debt is not disputed, neither is it disputed that these petitioners are entitled to shares to the amount which I have stated.

But it is said that in my discretion, assuming the matter to be within the Act, I am not to make the order because there must be a difficulty in working it out. But the question is this: every one of the persons who contracted to be members of this company contracted to make himself liable to the particular law enacted by that Act of 1862. But besides that, it is said that, although I make this order, recourse will probably have to be made to the foreign courts. But, according to all the principles of international law, the foreign courts will recognise this company as having originally started as an English corporation, and the foreign courts will recognise this winding-up, and will aid in carrying out any direction that may be given under this winding-up. And, besides that, I can see no difficulty whatever, because the main object, as far as I can see, of winding-up this company will not be for the purpose of making and enforcing calls, but will be for the purpose of realising its property, and I can see no reason why this company's property should not be realised abroad in the hands of the liquidators just as easily as it could be realised abroad under the direction of the courts there.

SAMSON v. SAMSON; LARKINS v. SAMSON.

[CHAN.]

That being so, my opinion is that there would be clearly a denial of justice if the order to wind-up was withheld. It is neither more nor less than the mode of execution which in reality this court gives to a creditor against a company unable to pay its debts. It has been said in more cases than one that, where a creditor presents a petition, the order to wind-up is due to him ex debito justitiæ. I do not say that that would apply in every case; but in this case most undoubtedly I think the creditor is entitled to the order to wind-up, and I think that the greatest injustice would be done if that order was refused, and I have no doubt that in some shape or other it can be worked out. Therefore the course which I propose to adopt is this, to make a winding-up order on both of the petitions. I should say with respect to the second petition, although it is filed by a foreigner it makes no difference in the world. It is a substantial sum of money, and there being no evidence whatever as to what the remedy abroad may or may not be, and there being no evidence whatever as to the difficulty of acting on the order abroad, or as to whether those persons could get their money abroad, I cannot suppose for one moment that gentlemen to whom thousands of pounds are owing would have come to this court merely for the purpose of getting an order which would not be effective, and I have no doubt that for many purposes this order will be effective abroad.

Discharge the Vice-Chancellor's order, and make an order for winding-up upon both petitions. The costs of the company and the petitioners out of the estate, the appellant adding his costs of the appeal to his costs in the court below.

SAMSON v. SAMSON.

LARKINS v. SAMSON.

Practice—Fund in court—Payment out—Lapse of years—Personal representative—Beneficiaries—Evidence—Costs.

Where a fund has been for many years standing in court without any application being made respecting it, the court will not order it to be paid to the personal representative of the person to whose account it is standing, without strict proof who are the persons beneficially interested in it. It is not enough to prove the legal title of the personal representative, and to show that there are persons beneficially interested in the fund. But when in such a case application is made for payment out of court of a fund, which is successful only as to part of it, the costs of all parties to the application will be ordered to be paid out of the whole fund.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls with respect to the payment out of court of a sum of 489*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, which was standing to the credit of the above causes.

The suit of Samson v. Samson was for the administration of the estate of one John Jones. The suit of Larkins v. Samson was supplemental to it. The decree in Samson v. Samson was made on the 23rd Feb. 1775, and by it various accounts were directed to be taken, among which was an account of the debts of John Jones. One of the creditors of John Jones was a person named Thomas Hodgson, and by the Master's report it was found that the sum of 288*l.* was due to him from the estate of John Jones. A sum of money to answer that debt was carried over in these suits to the separate account of Thomas Hodgson, and this sum remaining unclaimed, ultimately, by accumulations of interest, increased to 489*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*

Thomas Hodgson by his will, dated the 17th July 1782, bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to one Richard Burleigh absolutely. Thomas Hodgson died on the 26th Jan. 1786, and his will was proved by the executors thereby appointed, of whom Richard Burleigh was one. Richard Burleigh died in Jan. 1798, having by his will given the residue of his personal estate to David Locke and William Locke, upon certain trusts, subject to which he gave it to David Locke and William Locke, equally between them, share and share alike. William Locke died in July 1825, and David Locke in June 1840. All the trusts created by the will of Richard Burleigh of the residue of his personal estate prior to those in favour of David Locke and William Locke determined. David Locke and William Locke both died intestate. Administration to the estate of Thomas Hodgson and Richard Burleigh was granted to one Anne Locke, and she presented a petition in these suits, praying for payment of the 489*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* to her as administratrix de bonis non of Thomas Hodgson. Some other persons, who made out by strict evidence that they were some of the next of kin of David Locke and William Locke, joined in the petition. It was also proved that the petitioners and the persons on whom the petition was served would be the sole next of kin of David Locke and William Locke if some persons who were specified were dead, as to whom, however, the evidence did not prove that they were dead. When the petition came before the Master of the Rolls his Lordship adjourned it into chambers, and in the course of the proceedings there advertisements of the usual kind were inserted in the London Gazette and other newspapers calling upon the next of kin of David Locke and William Locke to come in and prove their claims within a time limited. No person, however, came in within the time fixed. The petition went again before the Master of the Rolls, and was heard by him, and he then made an order that the costs of all parties to the petition, and of the investigation of title upon the adjournment into chambers, and consequent thereon, including any costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by Anne Locke as administratrix, and in endeavouring to ascertain the persons entitled to the fund, should be paid out of the sum of 305*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, being five-eighths of the whole fund, as to which five-eighths the petitioners and the respondents to the petition had strictly proved their beneficial interest, and that (subject to the payment of legacy duty) the residue of the 305*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* should be paid to Anne Locke as the administratrix of Thomas Hodgson.

From this order an appeal was presented by the petitioners and respondents together.

Before the appeal came on to be heard, further evidence was adduced, the result of which was that the beneficial title of the appellants was strictly proved as to two-thirds of the whole fund.

Jessel, Q.C., Wickens, and J. M. Solomon, on behalf of the appellants, contended that the court would not require such strict evidence of title as it would in a case where it was administering a fund. In these suits the court was administering the estate of John Jones, not that of Thos. Hodgson, who was only one of the creditors of Jones, to whose separate account this fund happened to have been paid. The fund ought to be paid to the administratrix, leaving her to distribute it among the persons entitled to it, there being sufficient evidence to satisfy the court that there was a reasonably certain equitable title behind the legal title. At all events, all the costs ought to be paid out of the whole fund, as the investigation which had taken place was for the benefit of all the persons entitled, whoever they might be. They cited :

Loy v. Duckett, Cr. & Ph. 305 ;
Ex parte Ram, 3 My. & Cr. 25 ;
Orrok v. Binney, Jac. 523.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he should be inclined to hold the rule of the court tightly in cases of this kind, rather than to relax it. If the administrator took on himself to investigate the beneficial title at all, he ought to make his investigation complete. But all the costs, including those of the appeal, must be paid out of the whole fund, and, subject to that, two-thirds of the fund would be paid out to Anne Locke as administratrix of Thos. Hodgson. The residue must remain in court, but liberty to apply would be reserved.

CHICHESTER v. THE MARQUIS OF DONEGALL.

Practice—Production of documents—Mortgagee—Right to refuse production—Indenture of settlement—Sealing up part thereof.

By an indenture of settlement certain estates were limited to such uses as father and son should jointly appoint, and in default of appointment, then to the use of the father for life, and, after various intervening limitations, then to the use of C. for life, with remainder to the use of his sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over. In exercise of the joint power of appointment, the father and son executed a mortgage of the estates, and the settlement, with other title-deeds, were delivered over to the mortgagees. After this C. filed a bill against the father (the son then being dead) the mortgagees and other persons interested in the property, to obtain discovery of the contents of the settlement in order to ascertain his own interest. The bill contained a prayer that C. might be at liberty to redeem the mortgage. The mortgagees, by their answer, insisted that they were not bound to produce any of the deeds in their possession, or to disclose their contents until they had been paid their mortgage debt and costs. C. took out a summons for production of the settlement, though he had never tendered to the mortgagees what was due to them. James, V.C. made an order that the mortgagees should produce the settlement, but with liberty for them to seal it up except such parts thereof as, according to an affidavit to be made by them, related to the parcels and other limitations in favour of the plaintiff.

On appeal, it was Held, that as there was no question as to the validity of the mortgage-deed, and as the mortgagees were willing to be redeemed by the plaintiff, he was not entitled to have the settlement produced without redeeming the mortgages.

But, semble, that if he had been entitled to production of the settlement he would have been entitled to see the whole of it.

This was an appeal by mortgagees, defendants to this suit, from an order made by James, V.C., that they should produce to the plaintiff a certain indenture of resettlement which was in their possession as one of the title-deeds to the mortgaged property, the plaintiffs having made no tender to them of their mortgage-debt and costs.

The plaintiff in the suit was Mr. G. A. H. Chichester ; the defendants were the Marquis of Donegall, the trustees of the property, and the mortgagees. According to the statements in the bill certain estates were by the indenture of resettlement in question, which was dated the 23rd July 1851, limited to such uses as the Marquis of Donegall and his eldest son, the Earl of Belfast (who before the institution of this suit had died unmarried), should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment, then to the use of the Marquis of Donegall for life, with remainder to the Earl of Belfast for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, and, other intervening estates, to the use of the plaintiff for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over.

The bill also stated that the Marquis and the Earl had, by an indenture, dated the 5th May 1852, appointed the estates comprised in the re-settlement to one Robert Hildyard, by way of mortgage. His representatives were defendants to this suit. The bill prayed that the plaintiff might be at liberty to redeem the mortgages, and that the Marquis and the mortgagees might be compelled to produce the indenture of re-settlement and the other title deeds to the plaintiff. The mortgagees put in an answer in which they admitted that the re-settlement was in their possession, but insisted that they were not bound to produce any of the deeds relating to the mortgaged property, or to disclose their contents, until they were paid their principal, interest, and costs. The plaintiff, not having made to the mortgagees any tender of what was due to them, took out a summons for production of the indenture of re-settlement. Vice Chancellor James made this order :—" This court doth order that the applicant, his solicitors, and agents, be at liberty at all reasonable times, upon giving reasonable notice, to inspect, at the office of the defendants' solicitors, the indenture of the 23rd July, 1851, admitted by the defendants in their answer to be in their possession, custody, or power, and to take copies, &c., &c., but previously to the said inspection the said defendants are to be at liberty to seal up the said indenture, except such parts thereof as, according to an affidavit to be made by them, relate to the parcels and the limitations in favour of the plaintiff."

From this order the present appeal was brought.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Montagu Cookson, for the appellants, contended that the order of the Vice-Chancellor was opposed to the ordinary rule of the court, that a mortgagee could not be called upon to produce his title-deeds till he was paid what was due to him. The power under which the mortgage in this case was made overrode all the limitations of the settlement, and the plaintiff's title was, therefore, entirely subject to that of the mortgagees. They cited

C. R. Freeling, for the plaintiff, urged that there were very special circumstances in this case. The ultimate limitations of the equity of redemption formed no part of the title of the mortgagees. The case was the same as if a mortgagor, when making the mortgage, had settled the equity of redemption, and the settlement had got into the hands of the mortgagee. He could have been compelled to produce it, as it would have been no part of his title. At any rate, the order of the Vice-Chancellor, limited as it was, could do no possible harm to the mortgagees. He cited Glover v. Hall, 2 Phil. 484.

[CHAN.]

Amphlett, Q. C. was heard in reply.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—No doubt the rule is of very considerable importance which protects mortgagees from producing their title-deeds, and the question in this case really is whether the circumstances are such as to show that it is an exception to that rule. The bill is the ordinary bill filed for the purposes of redemption; the mortgagees put in their answer and admit the defendant's title to redeem, but say that they will not show him the title-deeds. The answer of the plaintiff to that is this: the plaintiff says there was a settlement executed—father tenant for life, son tenant for life, with remainder to his issue in tail—under which he is entitled, and that settlement contained a power in the father and son to sell or mortgage, and subject to that a settlement was made. I do not think it possible to put the case higher than if it had been the case of an original mortgage, and there had been contained in that original mortgage an equity of redemption vested in several persons all claiming through the mortgagor. Can there be any ground on which that is to form an exception to the rule? I take the rule of the court (by which I am bound) to be, rightly or wrongly, that if a mortgagor executes a mortgage and hands over the title-deeds, he cannot see those title-deeds after the mortgage becomes absolute, without paying to the mortgagee his principal, interest, and costs. Of course, if that is so as to the mortgagor, the same thing would apply to his devisee. If a mortgagee by a different instrument settles his estate, the same thing would apply to a person claiming through him, and I cannot hold that the parties claiming under that settlement stand in any better position than if there had been an actual deed effecting the mortgage. That being so, I can see no reason why the ordinary rule of the court should be departed from; and certainly if there is any reason for showing anything, I cannot see why you should stop short of showing the whole; because it is in fact a title-deed of the mortgagee, and it applies in every part and parcel of it to the mortgagee's title. If there were anything like a title paramount, or anything like a collateral right, or any other matter of that sort, then I could understand that this might be an exception to the rule; but to my mind all those parties are mortgagees, and I take the rule to be as between mortgagor and mortgagee, that the right time for redemption being passed, and the mortgage not being impugned, if the plaintiff wants to see the mortgage-deeds he must pay the principal, interest, and costs, or go on to get his redemption decree, and subsequently a right to redeem.

The result will be, that the order of the Vice-Chancellor will be discharged. On technical grounds I do not think there is anything to be said. The appellants must have their costs in the court below, but there will be no costs of the appeal.

PEEK v. EARL SPENCER.

Practice—Amendment of bill—Adding new plaintiff—Making new case—Evidence taken de bene esse—To what extent it could be used.

In Dec. 1866 P. filed a bill against the Lord of the Manor of W. The bill was on behalf of P. and all the freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor, its object being to have their rights declared in respect of the common of the manor, and to restrain the lord from doing anything in derogation of those rights. The plaintiff alleged himself to be both a freehold and a copyhold tenant of the manor. The defendant filed his answer in Aug. 1868, and he thereby denied that the plaintiff was a freehold tenant of the manor. He also alleged that, according to the custom of the manor, no copyhold tenant was entitled to common rights, unless he held a certain quantity of land; and he denied that the plaintiff held land of sufficient quantity to be entitled to those rights. In Feb. 1870 the suit not having been heard, the plaintiff obtained from the Master of the Rolls leave to amend his bill by adding H. as co-plaintiff with himself, H. being alleged to be the holder of land formerly copyhold of the manor, but which had been enfranchised, the bill containing an allegation that the enfranchisement according to the custom of the manor left untouched the common rights attached to the land so enfranchised. The case made by the plaintiff in support of this amendment, was that the rights of the enfranchised copyholders could not be protected in this suit unless the amendment were made. In pursuance of the leave thus obtained the bill was amended, and it then became a suit by P. and H., on behalf of themselves and all other persons who, being owners of lands and tenements, freehold or copyhold, or formerly copyhold of the manor of W., were respectively entitled to the commonable and other rights thereafter mentioned. Upon appeal it was held that the amendment was irregular, as the effect of it was to introduce a new plaintiff with an entirely new case.

And, semble, that this would have been equally so if the new plaintiff had been merely another copyhold tenant of the manor.

The name of the new plaintiff was accordingly ordered to be struck out.

It appeared that evidence de bene esse had been taken in the suit on the part of the defendant.

Semble, that this evidence could not have been used in the suit as amended.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order made by the Master of the Rolls, giving the plaintiff liberty to amend his bill in this suit, and the notice of appeal motion asked also that the amendments which had been made in pursuance of the leave given by the Master of the Rolls might be ordered to be struck out.

The bill was filed on the 1st Dec. 1866. The plaintiff was Mr. Henry Wm. Peek, and he sued "on behalf of himself, and all other the freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor of Wimbledon," the object of the suit being to have the rights of the plaintiff and the persons on whose behalf he sued declared with respect to a common of the manor called Wimbledon Common, and to restrain the defendant, the lord of the manor, from doing anything to interfere with those rights.

The plaintiff alleged his title thus: The plaintiff, H. W. Peek, is seised in fee of a freehold house and other freehold hereditaments holden of the lord of the said manor, and is a freehold tenant of the said manor. He is also a copyhold tenant of the said manor, and has been duly admitted and now holds to him and his heirs, at the will of the lord, and according to the custom of the manor, certain hereditaments, consisting of two cottages and garden.

There was an allegation that the tenants were entitled to various specified rights in relation to Wimbledon Common, and there was this allegation: "The court rolls also contain entries showing, and it is the fact, that the tenants of copyhold lands which had been enfranchised were entitled to all the rights, privileges, and customs which belonged to the tenants of such copyhold lands before they were enfranchised."

On the 13th Aug. 1868, the defendant filed his answer, and thereby denied that the plaintiff was a freehold tenant of the manor. He admitted that the plaintiff was, in fact, a copyhold tenant of the manor, but he said that according to the custom of the manor, those copyhold tenants only who held at least a "virgate" of land (i.e., about fifteen acres) were entitled to common rights, and he asserted that the plaintiff's holding was less than a "virgate."

The plaintiff, on the 25th Jan. 1870, took out a summons, asking that he might be at liberty to amend his bill by adding the name of the Rev. Edward Huntingford, as co-plaintiff with himself, and otherwise, as he might be advised. In support of this application an affidavit was made by the plaintiff and his solicitor, Mr. Robert Hunter, the material portions of which were as follows: "The time within which an order of course could be obtained to amend the plaintiff's bill was extended by successive orders made in chambers until the 19th Aug. 1869, when an order of course to amend on payment of 20s. costs to the defendant was obtained. The time within which the bill could be amended under the order of the 19th Aug. 1869, has been enlarged by successive orders made in chambers, and expires on the 1st Feb. 1870. The plaintiff has been advised to amend his bill by adding or substituting words to the description of the class on whose behalf this suit is instituted, so as to include therein, as well all persons who, being owners of land formerly copyhold of the manor of Wimbledon (but now enfranchised), are entitled to the commonable and other rights claimed by the bill, as the freehold and copyhold tenants of the said manor entitled to such commonable rights, and by adding the name of the Rev. Edward Huntingford, clerk, as a co-plaintiff with the plaintiff in this suit, and by making sundry other amendments in the bill. The plaintiff is advised that there is a large class of enfranchised copyholders of the manor who are entitled equally with the present copyhold tenants thereof to the rights claimed by him in this suit, and that, unless such amendments as aforesaid are made in the bill, such rights, so far as they are vested in the said enfranchised copyholders cannot be protected in this suit, or without another suit being instituted on behalf of the said enfranchised copyholders, a course the adoption of which would occasion great additional expense. The said Edward Huntingford is an owner of land formerly copyhold of the manor, but now enfranchised, and the plaintiff is advised that the concurrence of the said Edward Huntingford as such co-plaintiff as aforesaid is necessary for the complete and perfect representation of the class of persons entitled to the rights claimed by the plaintiff in this suit. The said Edward Huntingford has consented in writing to be a co-plaintiff." This summons was heard by the Master of the Rolls on the 23rd Feb. 1870, and his Lordship made this order—"That the plaintiff be at liberty to amend his bill by adding the name of the Rev. Edward Huntingford, clerk, as a co-plaintiff with himself in this cause, and otherwise as he may be advised." It was ordered also that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the adjournment into court. The plaintiff, in pursuance of this order, amended his bill. The material amendments were these:—Henry William Peek and the Rev. Edward Huntingford were made co-plaintiffs, and they sued "on behalf of themselves and all other persons who, being owners of lands and tenements, freehold or copyhold, or formerly copyhold, of the manor of Wimbledon, are respectively entitled to the commonable and other rights hereinafter mentioned, except the defendant hereto," and the bill alleged that E. Huntingford was seised of certain freehold land and hereditaments, now of freehold tenure, but formerly copyhold of the manor. There was also some alteration made in the prayer.

It should be mentioned that on the 13th Feb. 1867 an order was made, on the application of the defendant, for the examination of witnesses de bene esse, and under that order the examination of some witnesses was taken.

Jessel, Q.C. and C. T. Simpson, for the appellant, contended that by the amendment the nature of the suit was entirely changed, and to allow this was contrary to the practice of the court. The question was not a mere question of costs, for if the plaintiffs had to institute a new suit they would lose the benefit of certain material admissions which had been made by the defendant in this suit. Also, in the suit as amended the evidence which had been taken de bene esse could not be used. They also argued that the amendments which had been actually made were not such as were authorised by the order of the Master of the Rolls, though they admitted that his Lordship intended to authorise such amendments. They cited

Milligan v. Mitchell, 1 My. & Cr. 433.

Joshua Williams, Q.C. and Whateley, on behalf of the plaintiffs, contended that the course which had been taken by the Master of the Rolls was authorised by the case of Maughan v. Blake, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 1; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278. [GIFFARD, L. J.—The new plaintiff then sued in respect of the same debt. No new subject matter was added.] The rights of the enfranchised copyholder were the same as those of an ordinary copyholder. [GIFFARD, L. J.—Even if another copyholder were added as plaintiff, his title would be a distinct one.]

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that when the plaintiff filed his bill in Dec. 1866, he was aware of the existence of enfranchised copyholds. Then in Aug. 1868, his title was as clearly as possible put in issue by the defendant's answer, and yet he did not make this application for leave to amend until Feb. 1870, and the only case which he made by his affidavit in support of the application for leave to amend was in truth that his suit was defective for want of parties. That was all it amounted to. It would not be just to the defendant to allow a new plaintiff to be here introduced with an entirely new title. The cases of the two plaintiffs were entirely distinct; the one might well fail while the other might succeed. Mr. Huntingford's name must be struck out, but the plaintiff could still make any other amendments which he might be advised. The order of the Master of the Rolls as to costs would remain undisturbed, and the costs of the appeal would be costs in the cause. The defendant must give an undertaking not to object to the suit for want of parties, because no enfranchised copyholder was made a party to the suit. His Lordship thought that the evidence already taken de bene esse could not have been used in the suit if the name of the new plaintiff had remained.

[CHAN.]

March 19 and 21.

MOSTYN v. MOSTYN; Ex parte BARRY.

Counsel and client—Fees—Proof against estate of client—Conveyancing business—Payment by client to solicitor—Part payment by solicitor to counsel—Moral obligation—Implied promise—Legal debt—Solicitor—Agent.

As a general rule part payment of a debt raises in law an implied promise to pay the balance. But part payment will not change what is originally a mere moral obligation into a legal debt.

A solicitor is not an agent for his client to the extent of having authority to pledge his client's credit to counsel in respect of the payment of fees.

It is, therefore, necessary in order that counsel should be able to recover fees from a client that the client should have made an express promise to pay them, as nothing beyond a moral obligation arises from the mere existence of the relation of counsel and client.

If a solicitor retains counsel on behalf of his client, and pays him part of his fees, afterwards receiving the whole of them from the client, and counsel has no legal right to recover the balance due to him from the client. Nor would the counsel have any such right against the client if the solicitor had received from the client only that part which he had paid to the counsel.

This was an appeal by Mr. W. W. Barry, a Chancery barrister, from an order of James, V.C. refusing to admit a claim made by Mr. Barry against the estate of the Hon. T. E. M. L. Mostyn, which was being administered in this suit, to prove for the sum of 44*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*

This sum was the balance of fees due to Mr. Barry in respect of some conveyancing business in which he was employed on behalf of Mr. Mostyn from 1857 to 1860. Mr. Barry was instructed in the ordinary way by Mr. Westmacott, who was Mr. Mostyn's solicitor, and fees amounting to 69*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* thus became due to him. 250*l.* was paid by Mr. Westmacott on account, but the balance remained unpaid at the time of Mr. Westmacott's death. The whole amount of fees was included in a settlement of account afterwards made between the executors of Mr. Mostyn and the executors of Mr. Westmacott. Mr. Barry, in an affidavit which he made in support of his claim, said as follows:

I shall be prepared on the hearing for adjudication of my claim to establish the legality of the debt on three independent grounds. (1.) That a moral obligation moved by a previous request, as is the relation between counsel and client, is sufficient consideration according to law to support a promise to pay, and that part payment is an implied promise to pay the remainder of the debt. (2.) That part payment is an admission or acknowledgment of debt on any account, so that the question of liability can no longer be disputed. (3.) That a counsel may enter into an actual contract with his client, and that part payment constitutes a contract by implication of law.

W. W. Barry appeared in person in support of his claim, and in addition to the arguments contained in his affidavit, urged that a solicitor was an agent for his client, and, like any other agent, could make a contract binding on his client. He referred to the following authorities:—

Jones Bateman, for the plaintiff, and Law, for defendants, to the suit, were not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that the facts of the case really raised a very narrow proposition, which was enough to dispose of the case. Mr. Barry was employed by a solicitor in the ordinary way, and he had no direct communication with the principal, and the principal had paid the counsel's fees to the solicitor. It was enough for the actual decision of this case to say that when counsel was employed in the ordinary way by a solicitor, and the client had paid the counsel's fees to the solicitor, the counsel could not recover the fees from the client. But even if there had been no payment by the client to the solicitor, his Lordship would have come to the same conclusion. It had been very properly admitted in the argument that whether the business were litigious or not, the claim of counsel against his client amounted to nothing more than a moral obligation, and that the counsel could not maintain an action for his fees unless there had been an express promise by the client to pay them. But it was argued that part payment by the solicitor raised an implied promise to pay the balance. His Lordship, however, had no hesitation in saying that a solicitor had no general authority to pledge his client's credit to counsel, and, that being so, a mere part payment was not enough to convert a moral obligation into a legal debt. The judgment in the case of Kennedy v. Broun was most accurate in reasoning and sound in law, and afforded a landmark in cases of this kind. Applications like the present had never been successful, and, speaking for himself, his Lordship hoped that he should never see the day when counsel would be able to recover his fees in an application of this kind. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ORRELL v. BUSCH.

Practice—Transfer of cause from one branch of the court to another—Concurrent suits—Right of plaintiff to select his court—Costs of motion to transfer.

A suit having been instituted in one branch of the court in relation to a particular subject-matter, a person who, being aware of the institution of that suit, files a bill relating to the same subject matter in a different branch of the court, will be ordered to pay the costs of a motion to transfer the second suit to the branch of the court in which the first suit was instituted.

In a case where such an order for transfer was made, it was also ordered that the persons whose conduct had necessitated a transfer should pay any extra fees to counsel occasioned by the transfer.

This was an original motion to transfer the suit of Orrell v. Busch from the court of James, V. C., in which it had been instituted, to the court of Stuart, V. C., in which another suit of Busch v. Jervis, relating to the same matter, had been previously instituted. The motion also asked that the plaintiffs in Orrell v. Busch might pay the costs of and incident to the motion.

The bill in Busch v. Jervis was filed on the 11th Feb. 1870. The object of the suit was the administration of the trusts of the will of John Orrell, deceased, and the prayer of the bill also asked that, if necessary, new trustees of the will might be appointed. The plaintiff, Gustavé Busch, and two of the defendants, George Langworthy Jervis, and James Potter, had been appointed trustees of the will by an order made in lunacy on the 7th May 1869. Robert Orrell, the other defendant, was the first tenant for life under the will, and the bill contained an allegation that the previously acting trustees had made overpayments to him. It also alleged that questions had arisen between Busch and Jervis and Potter, the other trustees, and that consequently it was necessary to have the trusts administered by the court.

Before any step had been taken in this suit, the bill in Orrell v. Busch was filed on the 19th March 1870, by Robert Orrell and his two infant children, he being named as their next friend. The children were entitled to an interest in the trust property, subject to their father's life estate. All the three trustees were made defendants, as were also some other beneficiaries.

This bill stated the fact that the suit of Busch v. Jervis had been already instituted, and mentioned what was the relief asked therein. It contained an allegation that Busch would not act in harmony with the other trustees, and prayed that he might be removed and another trustee appointed in his place, and that he might be in the mean time restrained from receiving any part of the trust estate, and that a receiver might be appointed; and also that he might be restrained by injunction from prosecuting the suit of Busch v. Jervis. On the same day on which the bill in Orrell v. Busch was filed, notice of motion was given for the 24th March for an injunction and a receiver in the terms of the prayer of the bill. On the 24th March this motion was ordered by James, V.C. to stand over until the next motion day. On the 25th March Busch gave notice of the original motion to transfer.

Fry, Q. C. and W. F. Robinson, on behalf of the motion, urged that the second suit, if a proper one at all, should have been instituted in the same court as the first suit which related to the same matter, and of the existence of which the plaintiffs in the second suit were fully aware when they filed their bill. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs in the second suit ought to pay the costs of this motion. They cited

The Merchant Banking Company v. Maud, 15 W. R. 992

Little, Q. C. and A. G. Marten, for the plaintiffs in Orrell v. Busch, relied upon the right which the General Orders of the court gave to a plaintiff to choose his own court. Moreover, in this case one of the objects of the second suit was to put an end to the prosecution of the first, and in addition to this the second suit sought a relief much more extensive than that which was sought for by the first. Stuart, V.C. had in no practical way any seisin of the matter, as no step whatever had been taken in his court. If the transfer took place it would lead to additional expense, as other leading counsel would have to be retained upon the motion for an injunction and receiver pending in the suit of Orrell v. Busch.

Without calling for a reply.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that it was plain in this case that the plaintiffs in the second suit were fully aware of the institution of the first suit in another branch of the court, and that the same facts were to a considerable extent involved in both suits. The system of racing for decrees was a very inconvenient and unseemly system; and it ought not to be encouraged. No doubt under the General Orders, a plaintiff had the right of selecting his own court; but it was not intended that a plaintiff knowing that a suit had been commenced in one branch of the court should file a bill in a different branch of the court, as to the same matter. This application being for a transfer must be granted; but as no hard and fast rule as to the costs in a case of this kind had been yet laid down, his Lordship should in the present case leave the Vice-Chancellor to deal with the costs of the motion when he dealt with the merits of the case. But, for the future, his Lordship would lay down an invariable rule, that where a person who knew of a suit having been instituted in one branch of the court chose to institute another suit as to the same matter in a different branch of the court, that person must pay all the costs occasioned by a motion to transfer the second suit to the court in which the first suit was instituted, and if any additional fees to counsel should have to be incurred in this case they must be paid by the person whose conduct had made the transfer necessary.

Parol trust—Statute of Frauds—Fraud upon creditors—Illegal purpose—Bankruptcy Act 1861, s. 110—Arrangement with creditors.

A. executed a voluntary assignment of certain leasehold property, with the view of defeating his creditors, to B. upon a parol trust for himself (A.). B. died, and A. applied to B.'s representative to reassign the property, which he refused to do, whereupon A. filed a bill to compel him to reassign the property:

Held, that the illegal purpose with which A. had executed the assignment having failed, did not preclude him from obtaining relief.

A., soon after the execution of the voluntary assignment, was adjudicated bankrupt, but an arrangement was made under sect. 110 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, by which it was agreed that all proceedings under the bankruptcy should be stayed, and his property given up to him upon condition that in the event of the bill for a reassignment being successful he should pay a certain composition to his creditors:

Held, that the arrangement was valid under sect. 110 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, notwithstanding the fact that it did not provide for the entire distribution of the bankrupt's estate among his creditors.

On the 1st May 1866 the plaintiff, who was entitled to a leasehold house and land at Abergavenny, subject to a mortgage, assigned the same to a Mrs. Maddox upon a parol trust for himself. The assignment was made with the view of defeating a creditor who had recovered judgment against the plaintiff; it was expressed to be made in consideration of 170*l.*, and a receipt for that amount was endorsed on the deed and signed by the plaintiff, but no money was really paid, and the plaintiff was not indebted to Mrs. Maddox, who, it was proved, frequently asserted that she was only a trustee for the plaintiff.

Mrs. Maddox died in Jan. 1866, having in the previous month assigned the property to the defendant, who was her son-in-law. This assignment contained a covenant by the defendant to provide Mrs. Maddox with board and lodging during her life.

The defendant having refused to reassign the property to the plaintiff, he instituted the first of the above suits praying that it might be declared that the defendant was a trustee of the property for the plaintiff, and that he might be ordered as such trustee to reassign it to him.

On the 9th Jan., 1868, the plaintiff was adjudicated a bankrupt. At a meeting of his creditors held a few days afterwards, the plaintiff proposed that the proceedings in bankruptcy should be stayed upon these conditions: that all his property should by deed be revested in him, and that he should by the deed covenant to prosecute the first of the above suits, and, if successful in it, to pay a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound to his creditors. This proposal, which was accepted at the meeting by the requisite majority, was duly confirmed at a second meeting of creditors, held in the following month, and soon afterwards a deed embodying the terms of the proposal was executed, and the plaintiff obtained his order of discharge. The second of the above suits was occasioned by the bankruptcy. It stated the circumstances of the bankruptcy and arrangement, and prayed that the first suit might be carried on as if the plaintiff had never become bankrupt.

Southgate, Q. C., and Freeling, for the plaintiff, contended that the present suits being for the benefit of the plaintiff's creditors could not be resisted on the ground of the plaintiff's intention to defeat his creditors.

Haynes (Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., with him) contended that the illegal purpose with which the assignment was made rendered it impossible for the court to assist the plaintiff. He cited

Duke of Bedford v. Coke, 2 Ves. Sen. 116;

Curtis v. Perry, 6 Ves. 747;

Taylor v. Chester, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 359;

L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 309.

He also contended that the arrangement was invalid under the 110th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, as it did not provide for the entire distribution of the plaintiff's estate amongst his creditors. On this point he cited

Drew v. Collins, 6 Ex. 670.

Southgate, Q. C. was heard in reply on the question of illegal intention. He cited Platamore v. Staple, Coop. 250;

Birch v. Blagrove, Ambl. 264;

Davies v. Otty, 35 Beav. 280.

Lord ROMILLY, after stating the facts of the case, said that as the plaintiff was now in effect suing on behalf of his creditors, the illegal purpose for which he had executed the assignment had failed, and that being so, there was nothing to prevent the court from assisting him. As to the objection that the arrangement between the plaintiff and his creditors was invalid under the 110th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, his Lordship was of opinion that that section should be construed liberally, and that the arrangement was valid. There must, therefore, be an order in the terms of the prayer of the bill.

Re ANGLO-ROMANO WATER COMPANY;

Ex parte WRIGHT.

Company—Winding-up under supervision—Liquidator—Rights of contributory—Passing accounts.

The A. company resolved to wind-up, and to confirm an agreement for the transfer of its assets and liabilities to the M. Company, in consideration of certain shares in the M. Company which were to be transferred to the shareholders of the A. company.

W., a shareholder in the A. company, accepted shares in the M. Company under this agreement, and gave up his certificate of shares in the A. Company, and the liquidator removed his name from the list of contributories of the A. Company, which was being wound-up under the supervision of the court:

Held, that W. was still a contributory of the A. Company, and as such was entitled to call upon the liquidator to pass his accounts.

Adjourned summons.

The above company was formed and registered in 1865 under the Companies Act 1862, with the object of supplying the city of Rome with water; but the company met with great difficulty in carrying its object into effect, in consequence of its having a foreign domicile, and the great majority of its shareholders being Englishmen.

In Dec. 1867, accordingly, resolutions were passed to wind-up the company under supervision, and to confirm an agreement which had been provisionally entered into with an Italian company called the Acqua Marcia (afterwards the Acqua Pia) Company, for the transfer of the assets and liabilities of the Anglo-Romano Water Company to the Acqua Marcia Company, in consideration of certain shares in the latter company, which were to be handed over to the liquidator of the Anglo-Romano Water Company, and, after payment of the expenses of liquidation, were to be transferred to the shareholders in proportion to the number of shares held by them in the English company.

The resolutions passed in Dec. 1867, were confirmed at a meeting held on the 18th Jan. 1868. On the 25th of the same month a supervision order was made, and calls were afterwards made on English shareholders.

Mr. William Wright, a former shareholder in the Anglo-Romano Water Company, who had paid up his calls in full and had had the proportion of shares in the Acqua Marcia Company to which he was entitled under the agreement transferred to him, and whose name had been removed from the list of contributories of the Anglo-Romano Water Company, took out the present summons that the liquidator might be ordered to bring in and pass his accounts of receipts and payments within one week from service on him of the order to do so.

The liquidator resisted the application on the ground that Wright, having accepted the shares in the Acqua-Marcia Company instead of those which he had held in the Anglo-Romano Company, and having had his name removed from the list was no longer a contributory of the company.

Jessel, Q. C. and J. N. Higgins, in support of the summons, contended that the liquidator had no authority, without the sanction of the court, to make any compromise with a contributory or to remove his name from the list. After the supervision order was made the liquidator could only pass his accounts in the judge's chambers, and any contributory was entitled to an order to pass the accounts. Moreover, if there should be any surplus of the proceeds of the Italian shares after payment of the expenses of the liquidation, Wright would be entitled to a share of it; and he was, therefore, entitled to the order asked for.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Langley, for the liquidator contended that even if there was jurisdiction under the Companies Act 1862, to compel the rendering of accounts by the liquidator in the case of a voluntary winding-up under supervision, there ought to be a special ground for doing so; and moreover, that Wright, having ceased to be a contributory, had no interest in the matter and was not entitled to the order asked for.

Lord ROMILLY.—I have always considered it to be the rule that every contributory is entitled to call upon the liquidator to pass his accounts at reasonable intervals, provided that the application is made bonâ fide, and not for purposes of vexation. It is true that Mr. Wright gave up his certificate of shares in the Anglo-Romano Company, and accepted shares in the Acqua Marcia Company instead, but he is nevertheless still a contributory of the former company, and as such is entitled to call upon the liquidator to pass his accounts. There may be a surplus after payment of the expenses of liquidation, and as he never relinquished his right to share in such surplus he will be entitled to do so. I will not now decide whether the liquidator will be required to vouch his accounts or not; that will depend on the nature of them.

BATTIE'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Transfer of shares to escape liability—False description of transferee—Directors with no power to reject transferee.

A., by a deed of transfer purported in consideration of 195l. to transfer certain shares in a company, which was soon afterwards ordered to be wound-up, to B., who was described in the transfer as of F. in the county of Cumberland, gentleman. The transfer was duly registered, and B.'s name was inserted on the register. The liquidator nearly four years afterwards discovered that B. at the date of the transfer was A.'s coachman, and resided with his master in Sussex, that his description in the transfer and that of the attesting witness were false, and that no consideration had been given for the shares.

The directors had no power under the articles of association to reject any transferee.

On an application by the liquidator to have B.'s name removed from the list of contributories and A.'s fixed thereon in his stead:

Held, that as the directors had no power to refuse a transferee, and as the transfer was out and out, the application must be refused, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the liquidator of the above company, which was being wound-up, that the name of one Battie might be removed from the list of contributories, and that the name of Mr. Breach might be fixed thereon in his stead.

The circumstances of the case were as follows:—

In May 1866, Mr. Breach, who was then the registered owner of seventy shares in the company, executed a deed by which he purported, in consideration of 195l., to transfer sixty-five of the shares to Battie, who was the coachman of the trans-feror, and the transfer was duly registered. In the transfer deed Battie was described as of Faugh, near Brampton, in the county of Cumberland, gentleman; and the attesting witness, Charlotte Giles, was described as of the County Hotel, Carlisle.

In Nov. 1866 the winding-up commenced.

In Feb. last the liquidator's suspicions were raised by a letter, which he found addressed by Breach to the secretary of the company. On making inquiries he discovered that Battie was Breach's coachman, and that he resided at St. Clement's, near Burwash, in the county of Sussex (Breach's residence), and not at the place described in the transfer, and that Charlotte Giles, the attesting witness, was a schoolmistress from Windsor, who was on a visit at St. Clement's at the date of the execution of the transfer.

No consideration was really given for the transfer, but the nominal consideration, 195l., was about the market price of the shares without a guarantee to register. Breach had attempted to sell the shares, but had been unable to find a purchaser who would guarantee registration.

The directors had, under the articles of association, power to reject a transfer only in the event of the transferor being indebted to the company, or refusing to produce the certificate of title to the shares to be transferred: (See Re Smith, Knight, Co., Weston's case, 19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 337; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 20.)

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Lindley for the liquidator, contended that the transfer was a fraud upon the company on account of the nominal consideration, and the false description of the transferee and the attesting witness, and also that it was not an out an out transfer, and that for these reasons it was void. They cited

Re Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, Williams's case, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 225n.

Jessel, Q. C. and Caldecott, for Breach, were not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY said that if the directors had had power to reject a transferee the transaction would have been a fraud upon the company, and he should have set it aside; but inasmuch as they had no such power, they were obliged to register the transfer, and as, on the evidence, his Lordship was of opinion that the transfer was out and out, he could not set it aside. The application must, therefore, be refused, but under the circumstances no costs would be given to Breach.

BARLOW v. BAILEY.

Thursday, May 12.

Practice—Nuisance—Application for leave to inspect works to ascertain the cause of refused.

A nuisance must be proved by something altogether external.

Where, therefore, the plaintiffs, after filing a bill to restrain the defendants from manufacturing certain chemical preparations causing a nuisance, applied for leave to inspect the defendants' works for the purpose of ascertaining in what manner the nuisance was occasioned, the court refused the application.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs in the above suit, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from manufacturing certain chemical products, and for liberty to inspect the defendants' works and premises at all reasonable times without notice. The facts were shortly these:—

V.C. S.]

Re NATIONAL PROVINCIAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

[V.C.M.]

The plaintiffs were the owners of the Bilston Mills, at Sedgley, in the county of Stafford. The defendants, under the name of the Galen Chemical Company, manufactured salts of ammonia, upon premises situated within fifty yards of the plaintiffs' mills. The plaintiffs' case was that the defendants' manufactory constituted a nuisance. They alleged that the defendants, besides ammoniacal, used other chemical preparations, the particulars of which they were unable to ascertain, and they charged that they ought to be allowed to inspect the defendants' works and premises for the purposes of discovery.

The plaintiffs prayed for an injunction in the usual form, but did not ask for liberty to inspect the defendants' premises.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Cracknall, in support of the motion, submitted that as the nuisance was the result of certain chemical preparations used by the defendants, the exact products of which the plaintiffs were unable to ascertain or particularise without inspection, they were entitled to an order for that purpose. If this were permitted, some plan might be arrived at for avoiding the nuisance and staying the litigation. The mere fact that the plaintiffs had not prayed for leave to inspect the defendant's premises could not be urged as a sufficient reason for refusing the application. They cited Ennor v. Barwell, 1 De G. F. & J. 529; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 170; 4 Ib. 597.

North, contra, contended that as the order asked for formed no part of the relief prayed by the bill, the court had no jurisdiction to make it. Even if the court had jurisdiction, an inspection was not at all necessary to the plaintiff's case. If a nuisance existed, it was sufficient that it was externally apparent without internal evidence as to its exact source.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—There is no necessity for a plaintiff to pray by his bill for liberty to inspect a defendant's works for the purpose of ascertaining in what manner a nuisance which he seeks to restrain is occasioned, if such inspection will assist him in showing his right to relief. Discovery is granted in various forms, without being prayed for, where the purposes of justice require it; for instance, in the production of documents. I can see no difference between inspecting a defendant's books and papers and inspecting his premises if the object with which it is done is necessary to the justice of the case. Before granting such relief, however, the court always considers whether it would be justified by the nature of the case in interfering with the defendant's property. In the present case there is nothing to warrant such an interference. The plaintiffs seek for an inspection with a view of showing that there is a nuisance, but a nuisance must be proved by something altogether external, and if there is a nuisance at all, it must be one which, although the cause of its existence is internal, it is itself externally apparent. The application, therefore, must be refused, but without costs.

Re NATIONAL PROVINCIAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Novation of contract—Transfer of business—Assurance office—Policy of assurance—Annuity—Winding-up.

F., the holder of a life policy effected in the N. office, having knowledge that the N. office had transferred its business to the B. office, and that the B. office subsequently transferred its business to the A. office, paid the premiums on the policy from 1858 until the dropping of the life in 1869 to the A. office.

Held, that there was a novation of the contract, and that the N. office was released from liability on the policy.

K. held an annuity granted by the N. office in 1854, in consideration of a sum of money then paid. K. had notice of the transfer of the business of the N. office to the B. office, and of the transfer of the business of the B. office to the A. office, and received his annuity from the A. office for thirteen years.

Held, on the authority of the Family Endowment Society (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 118; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 775), that there had been no novation of the contract, and the N. office retained its liability to meet the annuity.

In this case two petitions for the winding-up of the National Provincial Life Assurance Society were heard together. This society was incorporated under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 (Joint Stock Companies Registration Act), and was registered on the 18th July 1851. In Aug. 1856 the society transferred its business and assets, and purported to transfer its liabilities to an association which was provisionally, but never completely, registered as a joint-stock company, called the Bank of London and National Provincial Insurance Association; from that time the society ceased to carry on business. In Oct. 1858 the National Provincial Assurance Association transferred its business and assets to the Albert Life Assurance Company, the Albert taking upon itself the liabilities of the association, and from that time the association ceased to carry on business.

The Albert Life Assurance Company carried on business until Aug. 1869, when it stopped payment, and on the 17th Sept. 1869 it was ordered to be wound-up by the court.

The first petition was presented by William Fleming, the holder of a policy of the society for 1000*l.*, on the life of Christopher George Carroll, effected by Carroll in Oct. 1855, and assigned to Fleming in Feb. 1856. The policy was on the terms of participation in profits, and the premiums (25*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*) were payable half yearly to the directors of the society for the time being, at the office of the society, and the policy contained the usual proviso that the capital, stock, funds, and corporate property of the society should alone be charged and liable under it, and the shareholders should not be personally liable. Fleming knew, though it did not appear that he received formal notice of the successive transfers of business from the society to the association and from the association to the Albert Company, and he paid the premiums on the policy to the association in 1857 and 1858, and to the Albert Company from 1858 until the death of Carroll, in June 1869. The receipts for the premiums given by the association and the Albert Company referred to the policy but did not mention the name of the society.

Re NATIONAL PROVINCIAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The Albert Company, for two or three years after the transfer to it of the business of the association, was in the habit of issuing a special form of receipt for premiums on policies effected either with the society or with the association, in which the premium was expressed to be received for the renewal of policy in the Bank of London and National Provincial Insurance Association, and it was further stated that the liability of the Bank of London and National Provincial Insurance Association, by reason of the death of the assured under such policy, had been taken by the Albert Life Assurance Company, subject to the payment to them of all premiums and moneys now or hereafter to become due and payable under the same policy. Fleming had lost his receipts for 1859 and 1860, but he stated that he did not remember having received any receipts in the above form, and that he felt certain that he should have rejected any such receipt, as he always looked to the society as liable to him under the policy. In cross-examination he admitted that if the Albert Company had not become insolvent he should not have thought of applying to the society, and that he looked to the Albert Company as responsible. A bonus on the policy was declared by the Albert Company in 1863, and was added to the amount assured in the books of the company, but it did not appear that Fleming had notice of it.

In June 1869 Fleming sent in his claim on the policy to the Albert Company; on the 15th July the secretary of the Albert wrote to say that the company admitted the claim (subject to a claim for reduction of the amount, in consequence of an error as to the age of the assured), and that the money would be payable on the 11th Oct.; on the 8th Oct. Fleming's solicitor wrote to the secretary to inquire whether payment would be made on the 11th, and received a reply that all payments were suspended for the present. On the 8th Nov. he presented his petition to wind-up the society.

The second petition was presented by William Kettle, the holder of an annuity granted by the society in 1854, in consideration of 400*l.* then paid to the society. Kettle received his annuity from the society until 1859, from the association in 1857 and 1858, and from the Albert company from 1858 until it stopped payment. Before presenting this petition he presented a petition to wind-up the association, but that petition was dismissed by Vice-Chancellor James.

Glasse, Q. C., and Wickens, for Fleming, contended that this case was analogous to and covered by the Family Endowment Society, L. Rep. 5 Ch. 118; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485, on app. 775, where it was held that a transferor company was liable to an annuitant receiving his annuity from a transferee company.

Willcock, Q. C., and Cottrell, upon Kettle's petition, also relied upon the Family Endowment Society (sup.).

Pearson, Q. C., and Higgins, for the official liquidators of the Albert Company, and Cotton, Q. C., and Rodwell, for shareholders in the National Provincial Life Assurance Society, opposed the petitions on the ground that the petitioners, by respectively paying the premiums on the policy to and receiving the annuity from the Insurance Association and the Albert Company, had released the society from liability under its contracts with them. With regard to Fleming's petition, he had accepted the Albert Company as his debtor in the policy in substitution for the society. They cited Glasse, Q. C., in reply.

In the course of the argument the Vice-Chancellor intimated his opinion that Kettle's case could not be distinguished from the case of the Family Endowment Society (sup.), and the opposition to an order on that petition was not pressed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR stated the facts, and proceeded:—Before I go any further, I may say that this is perfectly clear—that, although this is an office which had discontinued its business before this petition was presented for a period of thirteen years, although Mr. Kettle, an annuitant, holding an annuity granted in 1854, had from 1856 ceased to receive his annuity from this office, I am bound, by the authority of Vice-Chancellor James, confirmed by the Court of Appeal, in the case of the Family Endowment Society, to say that this being identically the same case as that of the Family Endowment Society upon Mr. Kettle's petition, there must be the usual order to wind-up, and that indeed is a point which for some time has not been disputed. The only point upon which I have heard the argument, and which I have now to decide, is whether I must also make the order upon Mr. Fleming's petition, or whether that petition should be ordered to stand over, or whether I should make no order upon it, or whether I should send Mr. Fleming's claim into chambers to be adjudicated upon as a debt. That is what I have now to decide. Now, with regard to Mr. Fleming's case, I am bound to say, after the argument I have heard, that I think there is a remarkable difference between the position of a person who is the grantee of an annuity, which Mr. Kettle is, and a person who is the holder of a policy of assurance. In the case of an annuitant, the grantors, the insurance office, once for all receive the consideration. The consideration for Mr. Kettle's annuity was paid to the National Provincial Assurance Society, and they undertook the payment of the annuity; and although he has subsequently received his annuity from the Albert, it might well be, as James, V.C., and the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice considered, that he was at liberty to treat the Albert merely as the agent of the original grantors to pay the annuity. But when I look at the position of a policy-holder it appears to me to be very different. In this case Mr. Carroll originally insured his life in 1855, and the policy was assigned to Mr. Fleming so early as Feb. 1856, more than thirteen years, therefore, before the Albert stopped payment, and for all purposes, Mr. Fleming must be treated as if he had originally effected the policy. It is not denied that Mr. Fleming received notice in the year 1856 that the original office in which the assurance was effected intended to discontinue their business, and it is not attempted to be denied that he was perfectly aware that they had ceased to carry on their business as an assurance office, and that they had handed the business over to the Bank of London Association; nor is it attempted to be denied that when the Bank of London Association in their turn gave up in 1858, he had notice that the business was handed over by them to the Albert. From that time downward Mr. Fleming has looked to the Albert only; to them he has paid his premiums; he has taken receipts from them; and if he had been determined to keep alive the liability of the National Provincial Society, when he was told in 1856 that that society—which was not an old-established office that had obtained a great reputation or great stability, and in which he had paid at the utmost two premiums—was about to discontinue business and hand over its business to another office, I think upon every principle of justice and common sense he was bound to say, "I do not acquiesce in this, I do not like the office to which you are going to hand me over, I will not go to the Bank of London Association." And in the same manner in 1858, he might have said to the Bank of London Association, "I will not go over to the Albert. You must before you transfer your business settle with me. You must give me a policy in another substantial office that I shall be satisfied with. I must be satisfied that the premium will be the same, and, providing I get a substantial office, it is perfectly immaterial to me what that substantial office is." It has been argued that it would be absurd to apply to such a case as this the doctrine of this court, that if a person stands by and sees a particular thing done, or allows persons to act upon the belief that a particular state of things exists, while he knows it does not exist, he is thereby bound; but I am of a contrary opinion. I think it is quite proper that such a principle should be applied to such a case as this. Mr. Fleming knew in 1856 that the persons composing the National Provincial Assurance Society were about to alter their position; he knew that they were going to act upon the assumption that when they got the policyholders to go to the other office and pay their premiums, they would thereupon give up business, and cease to be liable for the consequences of having carried on the business. If he did not intend to acquiesce it was his duty to say so. But he did not take that course. Without a word of objection, without remonstrance, he paid his premiums for thirteen years to another office; and does not justice require that he should be considered as having, although not possibly by express contract, yet by silence, acquiescence, and conduct, adopted such a course as binds him to adopt the new office, and to relinquish the liability of the old one? In my opinion, decidedly it does. If this case were res integra, if there had been no decision of the Court of Appeal, I should, with entire satisfaction to my own mind, have come to the conclusion upon this transaction that it would be most inequitable to allow Mr. Fleming to resort to the old office after he has for so many years paid his premiums to, and taken receipts from, the new office. The form of receipt issued by the Albert, twelve years ago, if he received it in that form, told him that it was a premium on the renewed policy of the Bank of London, and National Provincial Life Assurance Association, and that their liability under the policy had been taken by the Albert Company subject to the payment to the Albert of the premiums hereafter to become due. Even if he did not receive that form of receipt, I am of opinion that he has had notice of the fact as distinctly as if he had received the receipt in that form. I believe, however, although it is not proved, that he must have received it, because it is proved that it is the form in which they issued all their receipts. I said, in the course of the argument, that though it could not have occurred to Mr. Fleming's mind, as a mercantile man, that having adopted this course of conduct for so many years, having clearly shewn by a correspondence after the life dropped that he looked only to the Albert, and that after the winding-up order was made he still looked to the Albert, he could still retain the liability of the original office. It is perfectly clear that this suggestion of applying to the old office was not a suggestion of his own mind, but the suggestion of some legal mind conversant with these matters. No doubt the petition was presented in consequence of the decision in the case of the Family Endowment Society (sup.); but it raises a very material question whether the position of a policy-holder is precisely the same as that of an annuitant. I am of opinion that it is not the same; and, therefore, unless I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal, I should certainly, as I have already said, come to the conclusion unhesitatingly that there is in this case no violation of contract, and that Mr. Fleming is bound to resort to the assets of the Albert Company only. I feel, however, great reluctance in deciding that point, as I should do in my own judgment, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal. If I make an order upon Mr. Fleming's petition I shall be deciding that he has established to my satisfaction, and that I am bound by the Court of Appeal to hold, that he is a creditor of this company; but I am certainly not inclined to do so; nor am I inclined finally to conclude a question of so much importance in this stage of the proceedings. As it is a matter of so vast importance, not only in this particular case, but in hundreds of insurance cases which I am afraid will come before this court, I will give every facility for taking the opinion of the Court of Appeal upon the question whether Mr. Fleming is or is not a creditor of this company. The order to wind-up having been made upon the other petition he will come in as a creditor of the company, and in that form I think the question ought to be adjudicated upon. That being so, I shall make the order to wind-up on Mr. Kettle's petition only; Mr. Fleming may then at the proper time bring in his claim as a debt. After what I have said, I should refuse it as a debt, and I should not put him to the trouble of coming here again, but I will give him every facility for going at once to the Court of Appeal. The only remaining question is to the costs of the petition. I should certainly desire that Mr. Fleming should have the costs, and I should wish that he should have them by consent.

The respondents not objecting, the costs of the petition were made costs in the winding-up.

Re INTERNATIONAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY AND HERCULES ASSURANCE COMPANY; Ex parte BLOOD.

Novation of contract—Policy of assurance—Transfer of business.

B. held a policy of the I. assurance society on the life of J., effected in 1841. In 1868 the I. assurance society transferred its business, assets, and liabilities to the H. insurance company, and B. was informed by a circular letter that the I. society was dissolved, and its business and assets transferred to the H. company, and that he was entitled to have his policy exchanged for a new one, or an endorsement made thereon, on the part of the company, guaranteeing its due fulfilment. In Oct. 1868 B. paid the premiums then due on the policy to the H. company, at the same time forwarding his policy to the office of that company, and it was returned to him with a memorandum endorsed upon it to the effect that the funds and property of the H. company were liable for payment of the amount assured provided that future premiums were duly paid. J. died in Nov. 1868, and B. sent in his claim to the H. company:

Held, that there had been a novation of the contract, and that the I. society were discharged from liability.

This was a summons adjourned from chambers, by Joseph Blood, the holder of a policy for 700*l.* on the life of William Jones, effected with the International Life Assurance Society, and the summons asked for liberty for Blood to prove his claim on the policy against the International Life Assurance Society and the Hercules Insurance Company (Limited), or one of them, both those companies being in course of winding-up, the former by, and the latter under the supervision of the court.

The policy in question was effected by William Jones on his own life, on the 14th Sept. 1841, under a half yearly premium of 20*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*, and was assigned by Jones to Blood, who was a solicitor, on the 12th Oct. 1867. At that time bonuses to the amount of 166*l.* 19*s.* had been added to the policy.

In July 1868 the International Life Assurance Society transferred its business and assets to the Hercules Insurance Company, and on the 31st Aug. the chairman of the International sent to Jones, who immediately forwarded to Blood the following letter:

I beg to announce to you that the above society having been dissolved, its business and assets have been transferred to the Hercules Insurance Company, Limited. In so doing the directors of the International have carefully protected the interests of their policy-holders. The Hercules was established in 1803, with a capital of half-a-million. Its present income, which is fast increasing, is already £10,000 per annum, while its realised assets are proportionately large.

In compliance with the terms stipulated on behalf of the policy-holders, you are entitled to have your policy exchanged for a new one, or an endorsement made therein, on the part of the Hercules, guaranteeing its due fulfilment. These terms the directors are now prepared to carry into effect, on your forwarding your policy to the head office of the Hercules, No. 25, Cornhill, London, to which company your future premiums will be payable.

In Oct. 1868 Blood paid the premium which became due in Sept. to the Hercules Company, and took the following receipt, signed by the manager and secretary:

HERCULES INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED):
To which has been transferred the business of the International Life Assurance Society.

Receipt No. 59,093.

Received this 6th Oct. 1868, of Mr. William Jones, the sum of 20*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*, being the premium for six months, ending the 9th March 1869, for the assurance of the sum of 700*l.* upon the life of himself, agreeably with the terms of a policy of assurance granted 14th Sept. 1841, numbered as above.

At the same time Blood sent the policy to the office of the Hercules Company, and the following memorandum, dated the 7th Oct. 1868, was endorsed upon it, and signed by two directors of the Hercules:

Memorandum. It is hereby declared that, subject to the proviso hereunder stated, the funds and property of the Hercules Insurance Company (Limited), as provided for in the articles of association of the said company, shall be liable for the due payment of the sum of 700*l.* assured by the within policy with the International Life Assurance Society, to the person or persons legally entitled to receive the same.

Provided always, that the future premiums, payable in respect of the said policy, be duly paid to the said Hercules Insurance Company Limited, at the times and in the manner set forth in the said policy.

Jones died on the 10th Nov. 1868, and Blood thereupon sent in his claim on the policy to the Hercules, whose secretary on the 4th Dec. wrote to him, acknowledging the receipt of the claim, and stating that it would be submitted in due course to the directors. On the 30th Dec. 1868 and the 3rd Feb. 1869 he again applied to the Hercules, and on the latter day was told by the secretary that his claim was "All right." On the 15th Feb. he called at the office of the Hercules, but found the doors closed, the company having in the mean time passed resolutions for a voluntary winding-up.

In Dec. 1868 a petition to wind-up the International Society was dismissed, but on the 19th Feb. 1869 the society was ordered to be wound-up by the court; and on the 23rd Feb. the voluntary winding-up of the Hercules was ordered to be continued under the supervision of the court.

This summons was taken out in April 1869. The applicant, in his first affidavit in support of the application, did not verify the letter of the 31st Aug. 1868; but on the 28th Jan. 1870, after the case had been opened, he filed an affidavit (which was admitted by consent) verifying the letter, and stating that in accepting the endorsement on the policy he intended simply to obtain a guarantee from the Hercules, and not to release the International from their liability.

Osborne, Q. C., and Chitty, in support of the summons, contended that the original liability of the International Society had not been released, inasmuch as the acceptance of a new security did not of necessity discharge the original debtor. Mr. Blood was not bound either to discharge the International, or to object to the transfer of its business. If the transfer were ultra vires on the part of the International, he would acquire no right as against the Hercules. They referred to

Harris v. Farwell, 15 Beav. 31;

Re Era Assurance Society, 2 J. & H. 400.

Glasse, Q. C. and Higgins, for the official liquidator of the International, maintained that there had been a complete novation of the contract. The transfer was not ultra vires as in the case of the Era Assurance Society (sup.). They cited:

Re The Family Endowment Society, L. Rep. 5 Ch. 118; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 775.

Phear, for the representatives of the creditors of the International, took the same line of argument.

Cotton, Q. C. and E. Ford, for the liquidator of the Hercules, admitted the liability of that company.

Osborne, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR stated the facts of the case, and continued: I do not wonder that Mr. Blood makes every attempt to make all these parties liable to him; I should very much rejoice to see it done. But what I have to consider is whether upon the whole transaction I must attribute to him the intention—and it is a question of fact in all these cases, what was the intention at the time—to let off one debtor and take another; or an intention merely to acquire a guarantee and an additional liability of a new party, retaining that of the old one. Now I had yesterday in the case of the National Provincial Life Assurance Society (supra), to consider the general question, what intention ought to be attributed by the court to a person, as to accepting a policy in one office in lieu of the policy of another; or, in other words, as I then expressed myself, whether, when he has a policy in office A., and has notice from A. that A. is about to discontinue business, and hand that business over to office B., and knowing all these circumstances he continues from year to year (and in the case yesterday it was no less than thirteen years) paying premiums to office B., the court ought not to consider that there was an intention to release the original office, and accept the liability of the substituted office. Here we have not that length of time. There it was a payment of premiums for thirteen years; here it is payment of one premium only; and if it had rested on the payment of that premium only, I think I should have had very considerable difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that there had been novation which bound Mr. Blood. But in order to put himself in a situation of having a legal demand against the Hercules, he actually sends the policy for indorsement, as he was invited to do. I am of opinion, apart from the circumstance of the contents of the letter of the 31st Aug., which I shall advert to, that after the communication made to him that the International was about to dissolve or had dissolved, and the tender made to him of the liability of the Hercules, his paying the premiums to the Hercules, and taking the indorsement from them is conclusive that he acceded to the proposal to accept the Hercules and let off the International altogether. Then it was very much pressed upon me, that although that might have been the effect of the transaction by itself, if no correspondence had taken place, the terms of this letter written by the chairman of the International, dated the 31st Aug. 1868, being the only communication made to Mr. Blood of the intended transfer, are such that he is entitled to treat this, not as a novation, but as a guarantee. Now the letter is in these terms:—[The Vice-Chancellor read the first two paragraphs of the letter, and continued:] I do not doubt that if he believed these statements, and I suppose he did believe them, that the Hercules had a clear income of 10,000*l.*, and that it was rapidly increasing, and that they had an abundant capital, he must have thought that there was something rotten in the state of the International, or they would not be giving up their business; and that he should do well to accept the one instead of the other. Now comes the passage in which it is said that no substitution or novation is intended, but guarantee. No doubt the next paragraph is not very accurately expressed: "In compliance with the terms stipulated on behalf of the policy holders, you are entitled to have your policy exchanged for a new one;" in which case there could have been no question but that that was a novation, "or" (and no doubt this is the alternative) "an indorsement made thereon on the part of the Hercules guaranteeing its due fulfilment." No doubt the words there are "guaranteeing its due fulfilment," but I cannot take a single expression in the letter, I must take the whole letter; and looking at the whole together, what conclusion must I come to? It begins by an announcement that the International have dissolved their business, and handed over all the assets. The contract of the policy is, not that the individual shareholders should be liable, but that the assets of the company should be liable, therefore he is told that all that they contracted to be liable out of is to be handed over to a new company, and when he is told that he may have a substituted policy, or an indorsement on the old one, I am of opinion that it means the same thing, that whether the liability of the Hercules is shown by a new policy, or whether it is shown by an indorsement upon the old policy, it means a substitution of one for the other, a complete novation of contract, and it does not, as has been contended, mean merely guarantee. In my opinion, he was bound, as a reasonable man, so to understand it. How, in point of fact, does he understand it? That is best shown by his conduct. If he thought he had got the guarantee only, is it possible to believe that when the life dropped, if he thought he had two parties liable to him, he would not have given notice to both? His whole conduct, from the time the life dropped, on the 12th Nov., and from a time much earlier than that, from the time of receiving the letter of the 31st Aug., to the 15th Feb. 1869, when he went to the office of the Hercules, and was surprised to find a padlock on the door—everything shows that it never entered his mind that he had a guarantee. He had a substitution of the liability of one office for that of the other, and he never thought he had anything more. I am clearly of opinion that it was a mere afterthought on his part to treat it as a guarantee, and that I think is conclusively shown by the fact that, in his affidavit in support of this claim, filed on the 29th April last, he attached so little importance to the terms of this letter that he did not verify it; and it is not until the affidavit filed this morning, which I could not have received but by consent, that he ventures to come forward and treat it as a guarantee. I am of opinion that that view of the case entirely fails. I must, therefore, regard the whole transaction as showing to my mind most conclusively that Mr. Blood intended deliberately, at the time of the option being tendered to him, to accept the liability of the Hercules, not as an additional liability, but as a substituted liability; and his taking that indorsement on the policy conclusively shows, in my opinion, that he finally and for ever abandoned the liability of the International. Therefore, on that ground, I must dismiss the summons so far as he seeks to be admitted as a creditor of the International. So far as he seeks to be a creditor of the Hercules no opposition has been offered; therefore, such a creditor he must be admitted to be. I am clearly of opinion also, that the summons is ill founded so far as he seeks to be admitted as a creditor on both. I can only therefore, at present, admit him as a creditor of the Hercules. He may, possibly, though I do not encourage him in a litigation full of difficulties, have a case upon the misrepresentation contained in that letter, which induced him to enter into the contract; but I cannot deal with that on the present summons; all I can do is to dismiss the summons, as far as he seeks to be admitted as a creditor of the International, and accede to it so far as he seeks to be admitted as a creditor of the Hercules. As to the costs I do not think it is a case for making the applicant pay the costs, but I cannot give him any costs except by consent. The official liquidators will have their costs out of the respective estates; and as to the creditors' representative, as he had liberty to appear, he will have his costs on this occasion; but it must be understood in future that in all cases where the interests of the creditors and of the contributories are identical, the creditors' representative, if he appears, will get no costs.

V.C. M.]

Re BRACKENBURY'S TRUST.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barrister-at-Law.

Re BRACKENBURY'S TRUST.

Trust fund bequeathed to single trustee—Appointment of additional trustees—Costs.

Where a testatrix bequeathed a fund to a single trustee in trust for A. for life, with remainder over, on the petition of the parties interested in remainder, the Court allowed additional trustees to be appointed; the costs to be paid by the petitioners.

This was a petition by the parties interested in remainder in a certain legacy for the purpose of having two persons appointed trustees, in addition to the existing trustee, who was the sole trustee under the will of the testatrix.

It appeared that Elizabeth Fisher Brackenbury, by her will bequeathed the sum of 1000*l.* unto Charles Mitchell Nesbitt, upon trust to pay the income to William Brackenbury for life, and after his death in trust for her two nephews, Henry Downes and — Young, who were also appointed her executors and residuary legatees. Downes and Young (the petitioners) requested William Brackenbury to concur with them in the appointment of proper persons to be trustees of this legacy, in addition to Nesbitt, but he refused to concur in the appointment, and required the petitioners, as the executors of the will, to pay the legacy of 1000*l.* to Nesbitt, as the sole trustee. This the petitioners were unwilling to do, considering it to be inexpedient to pay the legacy to a sole trustee, and therefore this petition was presented for the purpose of having two persons appointed trustees of the legacy of 1000*l.*, and that the costs of all parties might be paid out of the corpus of the legacy.

C. T. Simpson appeared for the petitioners, and submitted that the trustees should be appointed, and that the costs should be paid out of the corpus of the legacy. He cited Grant v. Grant, 34 L. J. 641, Ch.; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721, in which case a testator having bequeathed a large fund to a single trustee the court, at the instance of the tenant for life of the fund, appointed an additional trustee, the costs to come out of the corpus of the trust property.

North, for the respondents.—This case differs from Grant v. Grant. In that case the trust fund was 30,000*l.*, in the present it is only 1000*l.*; there the trustee was entitled beneficially after the life interest of the cestui que trust, in this case the trustee has no beneficial interest. If the petitioners want to have other trustees appointed in addition to the one appointed by the testatrix, they should pay the costs.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that as the petitioners were not satisfied with the directions of the testatrix who appointed only one trustee, new trustees, to be approved of by the respondent, might be appointed, but that the costs must be paid by the petitioners.

REES v. BRAIDLEY.

Practice—Service of copy of bill—Defendants out of jurisdiction.

Where defendants were resident out of the jurisdiction of the court, substituted service of the copy of the bill was allowed to be made on their solicitor, who was employed by them in a suit that was still pending relative to the same subject-matter.

This was a motion for leave to substitute service of copy of bill upon a solicitor, who was the solicitor to the same defendants in another suit, arising out of the same subject-matter, and also upon the receiver appointed by the court in the suit of Braidley v. Braidley.

The defendants, Henry, Joseph, and John Braidley, were resident out of the jurisdiction in Australia, and Messrs. Baily, Shaw, Smith, and Baily, were their solicitors in the suit of Braidley v. Braidley, which was still pending; and they were also their solicitors in the suit of Rose v. Braidley, both of which suits related to the same subject-matter as the present suit. On the 12th Feb., 1870, the court appointed Robert Reid receiver of the property in the suit of Braidley v. Braidley.

On the 6th May, 1870, the plaintiff wrote to Messrs. Baily and Company to say that he had filed a bill of foreclosure against the above-named defendants, and asked them to give an undertaking to appear for the defendants.

It was now proposed to effect service of the bill upon Messrs. Baily and Co. and Robert Reid (the receiver), the defendants being resident out of the jurisdiction.

Holmes appeared in support of the motion.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that, as

Messrs. Baily and Company were the solicitors to the three defendants in a suit which was still pending relative to the same subject-matter, substituted service of the bill might be made upon them, the defendants being out of the jurisdiction of the court, and also upon the receiver in the cause of Braidley v. Braidley.

REG. v. LIVESEY AND OTHERS.

Levelling, &c., streets not being highways—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (Public Health Act), s. 69—26 & 27 Vict. c. 70, s. 10, subsections 1 and 3.

By sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), "in case any present or future street not being a highway" (which is construed by a subsequent Act to mean any highway repairable by the inhabitants at large), "be not sewered, levelled, &c., to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, &c., require them to sewer, level, &c., the same, &c., and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by their surveyor, or in case of dispute by arbitration."

By the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 70 (enabling the Public Works Loan Commissioners to lend, and local boards in certain counties to borrow money for the purpose of providing work for the unemployed manufacturing classes), sect. 10, sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, and sect. 38 of the Local Government Act 1858, are incorporated. By sub-sect. 1 of sect. 10 it is enacted that "the notice required to be given, prior to the execution of such works by the local board, may be in the form prescribed by the Local Government Amendment Act 1861;" and by sub-sect. 3, "any person to whom such notice as aforesaid has been given may, before the expiration of the period limited for the execution of the works, object to the execution of the works in the manner specified," &c., and, "in default of giving the notice lastly required it shall not be competent for such person to question the validity of any rate or charge made by the local board, for defraying or securing the expenses incurred by them in executing such works, except on the ground that the same have not been executed in conformity with the plan, section, specification, or estimates thereof."

Held (Mellor J., dissentiente), that an owner on whom notice to level, &c., under the said Acts, had been served, and, who had not given notice of objection, was estopped from shewing that the street in question was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Special case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench by the court of quarter sessions of the county of Lancaster, upon an appeal against an order made by justices in petty sessions at Over

REG. v. LIVESLEY AND OTHERS.

[Q. B.]

Darwen, on the 20th May 1869, for the appellants to pay to the respondents the sum of 55*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* for paving, sewerage, &c., a road within the township of Over Darwen, in the county of Lancaster, called Tack-row Back, and 13*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* for the respondents' costs of proceedings before the justices. The court of quarter sessions confirmed the said order.

1. The appellants are the owners or occupiers of land fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon a street called Tack-row Back, situate within the district of the local board of health of Over Darwen.

2. The respondents are the local board of health.

3. The respondents in or about the month of Dec. 1863, and after the passing of the Public Works (Manufacturing District) Act 1863, prepared a list in writing of work required to be executed in the said district, in exercise, inter alia, of the powers contained in sect. 69 of the Public Health Acts 1848 and 1858, including in the said lists the paving, &c., of Tack-row Back aforesaid. The respondents duly submitted the same to the public works loan commissioners, together with proper plans, specifications, and estimate in that behalf. The said commissioners duly approved the same, and out of the money at their disposal granted a loan to the respondents upon security, according to the said Act, of 34,000*l.* for the purposes aforesaid.

4. Upon such grant being made, the notice required to be given prior to the execution of the said works was given in the form prescribed by the Local Government Amendment Act 1861, or to the like effect by the respondents to the appellants, and was served by being delivered at the place of residence or business of the appellants.

5. Specifications and estimates of the said works duly certified by the surveyor of the respondents were deposited for inspection, with the plans and sections, in the manner required by the Local Government Act 1858, and Amendment Act 1861, and the said estimate showed the proposed apportionment of the expenses of the said works in respect of the properties of the different persons affected thereby.

6. No objection was made by the appellants to the execution of the said works in the manner in the said specification and estimates specified, or to the proposed apportionment of the said expenses, and no notice in writing was at any time given by the appellants to the respondents of any matters being objected to in the premises.

7. The appellants did not execute the said works within the time limited in the said notice, and upon such default the said works were executed by the respondents in conformity with the plans, sections, and specifications, and at a cost within the amount of the said estimates thereof.

8. Demand of repayment of the expenditure so incurred by the board was duly made, but the appellants not paying the same, the respondents duly instituted proceedings before the justices for recovery thereof, and obtained the order appealed against.

9. The appellants contend that they are not liable to pay any portion of the said expenses, or of the costs of the said proceedings before the justices at Over Darwen, on the ground that the said street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

10. The appellants, at the proceedings before the justices, and also on the hearing of the said appeal, proposed to call evidence to show that the said street or highway, called Tack-row Back, was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

11. The justices below and the quarter sessions respectively decided that such evidence was inadmissible upon the ground that under the 10th section of the said "Public Works (Manufacturing Districts) Act 1863," it was not competent to the appellants to question the validity of the charge by the respondents for defraying the expenses in by them in executing the said works as aforesaid, except on the ground that the same had not been executed in conformity with the plans, sections, specifications, or estimates thereof.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether such evidence was properly rejected.

Leresche and Watson for the respondents.—The evidence was properly rejected. By the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 70, Public Works (Manufacturing Districts) Act 1863, the Commissioners of the Treasury are empowered to place certain sums of money at the disposal of the Public Works Loan Commissioners to be advanced by way of loan to (amongst other public bodies) local boards under the Local Government Act 1858, for the purpose of enabling them to provide work in certain counties for the unemployed manufacturing and labouring classes. By the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (Public Health Act 1848), s. 69, where any street not being a highway (which term by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 42, s. 13, is construed to mean any highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) is not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the local board, the board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, &c., require them to sewer, &c., the same within a time specified in the notice; and if the notice be not complied with the local board may execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expense incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by their surveyor, or in case of dispute as shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by the Act; and such expense may be recovered from the last-mentioned owner in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in manner by the Act provided. The above section, and also sect. 38 of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98 (Local Government Act 1858), are included in sect. 10 of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 70, which by sub-section 1 enacts that the notice to be given prior to the execution of such works by the local board or local authority may be in the form prescribed by the Local Government Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 61), or to the like effect, and shall be served as therein provided. By sub-section 2 specification and estimates of the works certified by the surveyor of the local board or local authority shall be deposited for inspection with the plan and sections in the manner required by the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act 1861; and when the works affect the property of more than one person, the estimates shall show the proposed apportionment of the expenditure of the works in respect of such proportions. By sub-section 3 any person to whom such notice as aforesaid has been given may, before the expiration of the period limited thereby for the execution of the works mentioned therein, object to the execution of such works in the manner specified, and to the proposed apportionment of the expenses of executing the same, and may give notice in writing within the period aforesaid, to the local board or local authority of the matter objected to. In default of giving the notice lastly required, it shall not be competent for such person to question the validity of any rate or charge made by the local board or local authority for defraying or securing the expenses incurred by them in executing such works, except on the ground that the same have not been executed in conformity with the plan, section, specification, or estimates thereof; and by sub-section 4, in case of notice of objection as aforesaid, the local board or local authority may thereupon require that the several matters objected to shall be referred to arbitration in the manner prescribed by the Public Health Act 1848, before they proceed to execute the works in question. The effect of sub-sect. 3 of sect. 10 of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 70, coupled with the other enactments, is that the respondents having permitted the local board to incur this debt to the Public Works Loan Commissioners without objection, are now estopped from setting up that the street in question was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is desirable, if possible, to give effect to sub-sect. 3, but it seems very difficult to do so. In dealing with a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, the local board seem to have acted ultra vires.] It is contended that under sub-sect. 10 the notice of objection should nevertheless have been given in order that the local board might not be misled as to the money to be borrowed, and for which they are responsible. The notice might have been in these or similar words: "I object to you charging me with the proposed expenses relating to this street, because it is one repairable by the inhabitants at large." Had this been done, the local board might have taken the means for securing themselves provided by sub-sect. 4.

ALLEN (app.) v. THOMPSON (resp.)

Holker, Q. C., for the appellants.—It was incumbent upon the local board, before exercising their borrowing powers, to ascertain the legality of the proposed mode of expenditure, and whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature it is clear that the notice required under sub-sect. 3 cannot extend to the present case. The local board are bound by the language of the enactment, and to extend its signification in the manner contended for the court must add to instead of construing the words employed. It is clear that the question as to whether a street be or be not repairable by the inhabitants at large, is one which cannot be made the subject of arbitration. Bailey v. Wilkinson, 33 L. J. 161, M. C., and Parkinson (app.) v. The Mayor, &c., of Blackburn (resps.), 33 L. J. 119, show that even when the local board perform works within their jurisdiction they cannot recover the expenses if the notice to the owners be imperfect.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we have to put an interpretation upon a most obscure Act of Parliament, and the question for us is whether the terms of the enactment in question can be extended so as to enable us to carry out the intention of the Legislature. Undoubtedly sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, has reference only to streets which are not "highways," which term by a subsequent Act is interpreted to mean streets repairable by the inhabitants at large; but we must see how far this is affected by the subsequent enactment. By sub-sect. 3 of sect. 10 of 26 and 27 Vict. c. 70, in default of giving notice of objection to the execution of the proposed works, it is not competent to the owner to question the validity of the rate or charge made by the local board for defraying or securing the expenses incurred in their execution, "except upon the ground that the same have not been executed in conformity with the plan, section, specification, or estimates thereof." The question then is how far these words operate to extend the range of objections necessary to be made by an owner desiring to protect himself from charges proposed to be made upon his property; and I have arrived at the conclusion that although under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848 standing alone, it would not be incumbent upon him to object when the local board give notice of their intention to execute works entirely beyond their jurisdiction, yet nevertheless where he does not so object, the words of sub-sect. 3 must be taken as restricting his powers of questioning the validity of the rate or charges to be made only in the cases therein specified; and that the justices were, therefore, right in excluding evidence that the street in question was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

MELLOR, J.—Upon this question I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion with the other members of the court. It is clear that the Public Health and Local Government Acts authorised local boards to execute these sort of works, and to charge the owners only in streets not being highways, that is not repairable by the inhabitants at large. Such being the law up to the passing of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 70, the question is how far that Act operates to alter or extend the liabilities of owners, and unless it does so, it is manifest that there is nothing to justify the decision at which the justices have arrived. Now by sect. 3 of the latter Act, "such loans may be made for the purposes of any permanent works which the local board obtaining the loan is authorised to execute under the powers of the Local Government Act 1858" (which by implication must extend to the Public Health Act 1848) "or this Act, or (as the case may be), which the local or other authority obtaining the loan is authorised to execute under the powers of any local Act, or this Act, or otherwise," and it seems to me that the true construction of this is that the last Act must be taken as incorporating the previous Acts as they stand, and not in any way departing from or adding to the existing law. This further appears from sect. 10 of the same Act, which, with respect to works to be executed by virtue thereof under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, and the Local Government Act 1858, provides that "the notice required to be given prior to the execution of such works by the local board or local authority may be in the form prescribed by "The Local Government Amendment Act 1861, or to the like effect;" and then comes sub-sect. 3, under which "any person to whom such notice as aforesaid has been given," &c., "may object to the execution of the works in the manner specified, and the proposed apportionment of the expenses of executing the same." It seems to me, therefore, that we cannot affirm the decision of the justices without importing into the case some other form of notice essentially different from that prescribed by the earlier and adopted by the latest of these Acts, and that if the intention of the Legislature were that contended for, they have not used the necessary words for carrying it into effect.

HANNEN, J.—It is with the greatest difficulty that I have been enabled to arrive at a conclusion upon this question; but I nevertheless think for the reasons given by my brother Blackburn that the justices were right in rejecting the proposed evidence.

Judgment for the respondents.

ALLEN (app.) v. THOMPSON (resp.)

Game—Using snares on Sunday—1 & 2 Will. 4 c. 82, s. 3.

The 3rd section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 82, enacts that "if any person whatever shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument, for the purpose of killing or taking any game on a Sunday or Christmas Day, such person shall, on conviction thereof," be liable to a penalty.

On Saturday, the 14th Aug. last, the appellant, who had an excise license for killing game, was seen setting snared on land over which he had the right of sporting. There was no evidence to show that he was there on Sunday the 15th, but the respondent went to the place on that day, saw fifty or sixty snares set ready to catch grouse, and found dead grouse caught in two snares.

ALLEN (app.) v. THOMPSON (resp.).

Upon an information laid against the appellant under the above-mentioned section, charging that he, "on the 15th Aug. (being Sunday) . . . did . . . unlawfully use certain engines or instruments, to wit, snares for the purposes of taking game," the justices convicted and fined him:

Held, that the justices were right in so doing.

Case stated by justices of the North Riding of Yorkshire under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

An information was laid by the respondent, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 3, charging that the appellant on the 15th day of August (being Sunday), at the township of Bainbridge, in the said North Riding, did then and there unlawfully use certain engines or instruments, to wit snares, for the purpose of then and there killing game, to wit grouse, in an allotment there situate, in the occupation of Christopher Percival.

At the hearing it was proved on the part of the respondent and found as a fact that the appellant was setting snares on the 13th and 14th days of August, in an allotment or pasture, in the township of Bainbridge. There was no evidence to show that the appellant was there on the 15th August, but the respondent went into the allotment on that day and saw fifty or sixty snares set ready to catch grouse, and found two dead grouse caught in the two snares.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the setting of the snares on the 13th and 14th of Aug., and not going on the land to examine them on the 15th Aug., was not such a user as is contemplated by the 3rd section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32.

It was also contended on the part of the appellant that a snare or piece of wire, such as was found set by the respondent, is not an engine or instrument within the meaning of the above section.

It was admitted that the appellant had a proper excise licence for killing game, and also that the appellant had the consent of the owner and occupier of the land to sport over it.

The justices convicted the appellant, and adjudged him to pay a fine of 5s., and 1l. 4s. 6d. costs.

The questions for the court were:—

First. Whether it is an offence against the third section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, to set snares on a Saturday (or any other day except Sunday), and allow them to remain set so as to catch or entrap grouse on a Sunday; and Second. Whether a snare is an engine or instrument within the meaning of the said section of the said Act.

The respondent did not appear.

Holker, Q.C. (Macdonald with him) for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. A snare is not "an engine or instrument" within the meaning of the statute. The 3rd section enacts "that where any person shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument for the purpose of killing or taking game on a Sunday," he shall be liable to a penalty. The person using a dog, gun, or net must have a kind of manual control over them, not so with respect to a snare, which differs from a net in the manner in which it acts, and is not therefore ejusdem generis. [BLACKBURN, J.—There are draw nets and stake nets, but the ordinary use of a net is to set it, and then the game runs into it. How then does it differ in operation from a snare?] Then as to the meaning of the word "use," this section of the Act was framed to aid the keeping of the Sabbath. [MELLOR, J.—It is to prevent agricultural labourers rambling over the country on their day of leisure and snaring game.] But this is not the case of a poacher, for the appellant had a licence to take game, and it was on his own land. All the words of the section point to an actual manual user of the means whereby the game is killed, the person being present, "If any person shall kill or take game." [MELLOR, J.—Sect. 3 not only applies to killing game on Sunday, but also in close time.] (a.) [BLACKBURN, J.—It would be difficult to say that if a snare was set on Saturday night and game got into it on Sunday, that the person setting it did not kill the game on Sunday. LUSH, J.—You say he does not use it when he walks away from it; then he never uses it at all?] Only when he is watching it. He puts it down intending it to catch game, not to catch game solely on Sunday. He cannot be expected to go and take a number of snares up every Sunday, and have to replace them on Monday morning. [BLACKBURN, J.—The statute says he must do so. He would be bound to do so in close time.] There is analogy between this section and the Lord's Day Act. Would a fisherman be liable for having his nets down on Sunday, or a miller for not stopping his mill? [BLACKBURN, J.—The wording of this statute is different, and not analogous to the Lord's Day Act. Although Sunday, Christmas Day, and close time, are brought together very oddly, still I do not see why this section should not be treated as one for the preservation of Sunday.] The appellant was doing what he had a perfect right to do on his own land. Is there a desecration of the Sabbath in merely allowing the snares to remain down on Sunday? He must be supposed to have been behaving in a decent way all Sunday. In order to make profitable use of these snares he must be near them to take the grouse out, otherwise the game would be devoured by kites or vermin.

BLACKBURN, J.—There is no doubt that the Legislature, when they passed this Act of Parliament, bound curiously together and mixed up provisions relating to Christmas Day and Sundays with those respecting close-time, for they proceed on different grounds. By sect. 3 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, it is enacted that if any person whatever shall kill or take any game or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument for the purpose of killing or taking any game on a Sunday or Christmas Day, he shall be liable to a penalty of 5l. There cannot be any doubt that when a person on Saturday night puts down a snare with the intention that it shall be in operation on Sunday, and it kills game on that day, he has made himself liable to that statute. Mr. Holker argued that he must be personally present, but it is clear that one who intentionally causes the death of a grouse on a Sunday comes within the terms of the Act. Now, what this man is convicted of is that he left the snares there on a Sunday, and we must take it that it was his intention for them so to act as they would probably do—viz., kill game on the Sunday. Is not that "using" the snares on a Sunday? I think it is. If he left the engine in such a state as to kill game, is not that "using it to kill game?" Then, as to the contention that "snare" is not a word ejusdem generis with the words "dog, gun, or net," if it were once made out that a personal use of the instrument were required by the terms of this section of the Act, then that argument might have weight. But the word "engine" (derived from (a.) The latter part of the section contains provisions for the offence of killing game in specified close time.

THOMAS v. PURCELL.

[Q. B.]

ingenia) includes a snare, which is a "contrivance" or "device"—an "engine" for killing game.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LUSH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Indeed, according to Mr. Holker's argument, there could be no using a snare longer than the moment during which it was being laid down. That cannot be the intention of the statute which says "If any person whatever shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument, for the purpose of killing any game on a Sunday or Christmas Day," he shall be liable to a penalty. That means if any person puts down a snare and keeps it down on the Sunday.

THOMAS v. PURCELL.

County Court—Power of amending pleadings—Case sent down for trial after issue joined—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 26, 57.

Where a cause commenced in a Superior Court is sent down, after issue joined, for trial in a County Court under sect. 26 of the County Courts Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108):

Semble, per Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.—The judge of the County Court before whom the cause is tried may, by virtue of sect. 57 of the above Act, amend all defects and errors in the proceedings, such as variances and accidental mistakes, but cannot add a new plea, as that would be raising a different issue from that which the judge of the Superior Court in his discretion sent down to be tried.

Semble, per Hannen, J.—In such a case the judge of the County Court may not only amend variances and accidental mistakes, but may exercise the same powers of amendment generally as a judge of the Superior Court sitting at Nisi Prius.

This was an action commenced in the Court of Queen's Bench, and sent down, after issue joined, for trial in the Westminster County Court, under sect. 26 of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108.

The declaration was on a bill of exchange, accepted by the defendant, and indorsed to the plaintiff, and there were also the ordinary money counts.

The defendant pleaded (1) a denial of the acceptance; and (2), to the money counts, never indebted.

Issue was joined on both pleas.

The declaration was delivered on the 29th July 1869. Issue was joined on the defendant's pleas on the 25th Oct. of the same year. The cause was set down for trial before the judge of the Westminster County Court on the 16th Nov., but it was by consent adjourned from that day to the 26th Nov., on the ground of the absence through illness of a material witness on the part of the defendant. On the 26th Nov., when the hearing came on, the counsel for the defendant applied to the County Court judge to amend the record by adding a plea of fraud. The learned judge refused to make the amendment asked for, partly, if not wholly, on the ground that he had no power to do so in cases sent down for trial under sect. 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. The issue having been found in favour of the plaintiff, a rule nisi was obtained by Cutbill, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict obtained in the case before the judge of the County Court should not be set aside, and a new trial had on the ground that the learned judge had power to amend, and ought to have amended, the pleadings by adding a plea of fraud.

Sect. 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 enacts that

Where in any action of contract brought in a Superior Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed 50*l.*, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded 50*l.* is reduced by payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding 50*l.*, a judge of a Superior Court, on the application of either party, after issue joined, may, in his discretion, and on such terms as he shall think fit, order that the cause be tried in any County Court which he shall name; and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge with the registrar of such court, such order and the issue; and the judge of such court shall appoint a day for the hearing of the cause, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the registrar to both parties, or their attorneys; and after such hearing the registrar shall certify the result to the master's office of such Superior Court, and judgment in accordance with such certificate may be signed in such Superior Court.

Sect. 57 of the same Act provides that

The judge of a County Court may at all times amend all defects and errors in any proceeding in such court, whether there is anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error be that of the party applying to amend or not; and all such amendments may be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as to the judge may seem fit; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made, if duly applied for.

Bosanquet now showed cause against the rule. The County Court judge had no power to amend the record by adding the plea which he was asked to add by the defendant. The issue must be joined before a cause can be sent down by a judge of the Superior Court in which the action is brought for trial in a County Court; and after the issue is joined the judge of the Superior Court is to exercise his discretion in sending it down. The record still remains in the Superior Court in which the action was commenced; the trial of the issue only is to take place in the County Court, and the registrar of the County Court is, after the hearing, to "certify the result to the master's office of such Superior Court, and judgment in accordance with such certificate may be signed in such Superior Court." If the judge of the County Court could add a plea in a case sent down for trial before him after issue joined, he could alter the whole issue sent down without any exercise of the discretion of the judge of the Superior Court on the new issue thus raised. In Balmforth v. Pledge, 7 B. & S. 425, after referring to the latter part of sect. 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which provides that the registrar of the County Court is to certify the result to the master's office of the Superior Court, and that judgment in accordance with the certificate may be signed in such Superior Court. Shee J. says, "Now, if the construction which Mr. Kemplay contends for were right, this last clause of sect. 26 would be useless, because it does not effect anything which could not be done under sect. 49; for, the cause having become a County Court cause, the judgment would under that section, if for an amount exceeding 20*l.*, be removable by certiorari into a Superior Court in order that execution might be had thereon. Sect. 26 makes it obligatory on the registrar to certify the result to the Superior Court, because the cause still remains in it, and judgment is therefore to be signed in that court. . . . The registrar in certifying the result does only a ministerial act; the cause never leaves the Superior Court." And Lush, J. observes, "The judge of the County Court is in the same position as the sheriff is placed in by a writ of trial, and as a judge of one of the Superior Courts when acting as a commissioner at Nisi Prius: the latter tries the cause as commissioner and not as a judge of the Superior Court; and the general jurisdiction over the cause as to granting a new trial, &c., remains in the court out of which the record came."

THOMAS v. PURCELL.

Bain v. Gregory, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601, was referred to on this point. Further, if the judge had power to amend by adding a plea, he was justified in refusing to do so by the circumstances of the present case; the defendant having had ample time to make the application long before the day of the trial, which had been postponed from a previous day at his request.

Cutbill in support of the rule.—The County Court judge had power to make the amendment asked for. The 26th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 provides that the "cause" is to be sent down for trial in the County Court, in this respect differing from 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, by which the "issues" were to be sent to be tried before the sheriff or judge of any court of record for the recovery of debt in the county. If the word "cause" is to have its ordinary meaning in this section, then all the incidents of the trial of a cause at Nisi Prius are annexed to it, and the County Court judge must have the same powers of amendment as a judge at Nisi Prius has. In Edwards v. Edwards, 5 C. B., N. S., 538, in answer to an argument of counsel that there was no substantial distinction between a reference of a cause for trial to the County Court under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26, and a reference to a County Court judge under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 7, Williams, J. said: "I think decidedly there is. In Wheatcroft v. Foster, 27 L. J. 277, Q. B., the effect of the order was to make the cause, for the purpose of trial, a cause in the County Court, whereas the reference under the Common Law Procedure Act is a mere step in ascertaining the damages." [MELLOR, J.—He says "for the purpose of trial."] If it is a cause in the County Court, the County Court judge has by sect. 57 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 the power of making the amendment asked for. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is only a cause tried in the County Court, and by the 26th section of this Act it cannot be sent down until after issue has been joined.] The issue paper sent down is the record, and it has been held that that is the record which can be certified on by the County Court judge. [BLACKBURN, J.—I go with you to this extent, that the County Court judge has power to amend all variances and such like defects. But the addition of a plea raises quite a different issue from that which was sent down for trial, and therefore I think it is not an amendment within the meaning of the 57th section.] This County Court Act was passed after the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and its 57th section, following as it does almost verbatim the 196th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, ought to be taken to confer on the judge of the County Court the same power of amending that the latter enactments confer on the judge of the Superior Courts. [MELLOR, J.—The exercise of the discretion of the judge at chambers as to the sending down the case would be greatly influenced by the nature of the issue then before him. If that issue could be altered by the County Court judge, he might try what the Superior Court judge would never have sent down.] If the County Court judge had the power to amend he was bound to make the amendment under the circumstances of the case.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that in this case the rule ought to be discharged. The case involves one question of considerable importance, on which I have formed my own opinion. Perhaps, however, it is not absolutely necessary to the decision in this case. It is this, whether the judge of the County Court, to which a case is sent down for trial under the 26th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, has power to add a plea so as to change the issue which was sent to be tried. There is in point of substance a very great difference between altering or amending a plea so as to make it what it was really intended to be, and adding a plea so as to change the issue from what it originally was to something quite new. Sometimes, no doubt, the distinction is very nice between the two things; but there is, notwithstanding, a substantial difference. It is clear that what the County Court judge was asked to do in the present case was to add to the issue of non-acceptance as to the bill of exchange, a completely new plea, and not merely to change or amend the old one. What we have to see, then, is whether the judge had power to make an alteration of that character. It seems that the learned judge was of opinion that he had not the power to do so; but it appears also that he was of opinion, and I think on very reasonable grounds, that the defendant was too late in making the application to add the new plea, and that even if the judge considered he had the power, as a matter of fact he would not, upon the merits of the case, have added the plea which he was asked to do; and I am of opinion that he had good reasons for refusing. But had the County Court judge power to add the plea if he had been so minded? The 26th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 enacts that "where in any action of contract brought in a Superior Court, the claim endorsed on the writ does not exceed 50*l.*, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded 50*l.*, is reduced by payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding 50*l.*, a judge of a Superior Court on the application of either party after issue joined may, in his discretion, and on such terms as he shall think fit, order that the cause be tried in any County Court which he shall name; and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge with the registrar of such court such order and the issue; and the judge of such court shall appoint a day for the hearing of the cause, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the registrar to both parties or their attorneys; and after such hearing the registrar shall certify the result to the master's office of such Superior Court, and judgment in accordance with such certificate may be signed in such Superior Court." The words of that section are "after issue joined." Now we have already decided in the case of Bainforth v. Pledge, 7 B. & S. 425, and I think quite rightly, that when a case is sent down for trial in the County Court under that section, the case is not turned into a County Court case, but is sent down merely in order that it may be tried there and the result certified to the Superior Court from which it is sent; and, therefore, that a motion for the new trial of a case so sent down must be made in the Superior Court and not in the County Court. Then comes the question as to amendments which justice would require to be made, which of them can be made by the County Court judge? The 96th sect. of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, as it seems to me, is not so worded as to give the County Court judge the power of making amendments. That section provides that "it shall be lawful for the Superior Courts of common law, and every judge thereof and any judge sitting at Nisi Prius, at all times to amend all defects and errors in any proceedings under the provisions of this Act, whether there is anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error be that of the party applying or not; and all such amendments may be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as to the court or judge may seem fit; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made if duly applied for." We cannot, I think, bring the

THOMAS v. PURCELL.

[Q. B.]

County Court judge within the words "Superior Courts of common law, and any judge thereof, and any judge sitting at Nisi Prius," and therefore that section does not give him the power of amendment. But in the County Courts Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), there is a section, the 57th, which enacts, in words almost identical with the 96th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, that "the judge of a County Court may at all times amend all defects and errors in any proceedings in such court, whether there is anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error be that of the party applying to amend or not, and all such amendments may be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as to the judge may seem fit; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made if duly applied for." When a case, then, has been sent down from a Superior Court for trial in a County Court, after issue joined, I think the case becomes a "proceeding" in the County Court, and that therefore all defects, errors, variances, and such other things as exist by mistake, can be amended by the County Court judge, for this is incidental to the trial. But when he is asked to alter the issue altogether, and not merely to amend a slip in the pleadings, such a power does not, I think, fall within the meaning of the words of the section. I think that adding a plea does not come under any of the words used, and that that can only be done by a judge of a Superior Court having the power to do so. We do not generally amend by adding pleas at Nisi Prius after swearing the jury, but summonses are taken out for that purpose. I do not think it was the intention of the Legislature to confer such a power on the judge of the County Court, in cases sent down for trial before him. The judge of the Superior Court is to have the issue joined before him and to send down that case to be tried, and any alteration which would have the effect of making it a different case must be made by him. Altering the defence to one of fraud is altering the issue which was sent down to be tried; and if the attention of the Legislature had been called to the matter they would, I think, have said that they did not intend that the case sent down by the Superior Court Judge for trial in a County Court should be altered by the judge of the County Court. I mention all this because the point is one of considerable importance; but I do not think it is necessary to decide it here, because the alteration asked for was one which the judge would not have made even if he had the power. The rule therefore must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Before the case of Balmforth v. Pledge was decided, a difficulty did present itself to my mind which would have induced me to think that the judgment delivered in that case should have been the other way, because of the inconveniences which might result from holding that the judge of the County Court has not power to amend the record by adding a plea if necessary, and I thought that the use of the word "result" in the 26th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, providing that the registrar of the County Court is "to certify the result" to the Superior Court, involved the power of making such an amendment. I can now, however, say that I assent to the view of the law which was expressed by my brothers in that case, and to the principle on which that case was decided, because I am convinced that the intention of the Legislature was that the Judge who sent down the issue for trial in the County Court should exercise his discretion on the matter. The 26th section says, that "where in any action of contract brought in a Superior Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed 50*l.*, &c., a judge of a Superior Court, on the application of either party, after issue joined, may, in his discretion and on such terms as he shall think fit, order that the cause be tried in any County Court which he shall name, &c." Now, if the County Court judge can entirely change the issue sent down to the County Court when it comes on to be tried before him, he may try a cause which the judge of the Superior Court in the exercise of his discretion would not have sent down to the County Court at all. I think, therefore, that the strong and explicit words used in the section confine the power of the judge of the County Court to making such amendments, as variances and other defects of that kind. The governing words of sect. 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, as bearing on this point are "after issue joined." Consequently I am of opinion that it was not intended by the Legislature that the County Court judge should exercise his discretion in altering the issues sent down to be tried before him by a judge of the Superior Court acting in the exercise of his discretion. Our judgment in this respect is entirely supported by the decision in Balmforth v. Pledge. But it is not absolutely necessary for us to decide the question in the present case, because I think that in the circumstance that the defendant must have possessed a knowledge of the facts on which he moved to add this plea, long before the trial at which the application was made, the County Court judge had abundant reason for thinking that the application was not a bonâ fide one, and for refusing to amend the record by adding the plea which he was asked to add by the defendant.

HANNEN, J.—If it were necessary to decide the question whether the County Court judge has or has not power in cases sent down for trial before him under the 26th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, to amend the record by adding a plea, I should have required more time before I gave my judgment, for I have considerable difficulty in agreeing in the opinion expressed on this point by my brother Blackburn. I cannot help thinking that it was intended by the Legislature to confer on the County Court judge in such cases the same powers of amendment as are exercised generally by a judge of a Superior Court at Nisi Prius, by virtue of the 196th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. No doubt the words "after issue joined" in the 26th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, show that the judge of the Superior Court is to have the issue joined between the parties before him in order to assist him in making up his mind as to whether the case is a fitting one to be sent down for trial before the judge of a County Court. But we all know that it must frequently happen that though the facts as they appear to the judge of the Superior Court when he makes the order, are such that the case seems fit to be tried in a County Court, yet, when the case comes on to be tried, facts may come out which, if they had been brought to the knowledge of the Superior Court judge in the first instance, would have induced him to refuse to send the case down to the County Court. If such a state of things occurs, must the case be postponed until an application can be made to the judge at chambers? That is a course which would lead to great inconveniences. However, I mention all this merely as showing that if it were necessary to decide this point, I should require more time before I gave my decision. But I agree in the judgment to be pronounced on the ground that, if he had the power to do so, this was not a case in which the judge of the County Court ought to have added such a plea as he was

JOHN v. BACON.

Negligence—Contract to carry—Invitation—Responsibility for negligence of others.

The defendant was part owner and manager of a line of steamers that plied between M. and L. It was the usual course to take passengers from the shore of M. on board a small steamer to a hulk that was moored in the harbour, and from this hulk the passengers went on to the sea-going steamer. On the hulk there was an office, where a servant of the defendant sold tickets to persons going by the steamer. W., the owner of the hulk, let it to different persons as a depôt for goods. Amongst others he let it to the defendant at a yearly rent for the convenience of passengers and the storage of goods; and it was agreed between him and the defendant that W. should fit it up for the accommodation of passengers to the satisfaction of the defendant's agent, and that the defendant should light it. One servant of W. was stationed on the hulk to look after it. The defendant advertised his steamers to go from M. to L., and in the advertisement the above mode of transit was described. The plaintiff, in pursuance of the advertisement, went in the usual way by the small steamer on to the lower deck of the hulk, up a ladder to the upper deck, where he bought his ticket; then down to the lower deck again for the purpose of going on board the sea-going steamer, when he fell through an open hatchway that was just at the bottom of the ladder, and was much injured. It was quite dark at the time, and there was no light on the lower deck. In an action for compensation for the injuries sustained, the jury having found that there was negligence in leaving the hatchway in this state, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was Held, that, irrespectively of the question whose servants they were who were guilty of the negligence, the defendant was liable, both on the contract to carry safely, and on the contract implied by the invitation given to persons intending to go by the steamers to come on board the hulk.

This was an action for negligently carrying the plaintiff, whereby he fell down a hatchway, and was much injured.

Pleas: 1. Not guilty; and, 2. Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

The action was tried before Channell, B. at the last summer assizes at Pembroke. It appeared that the defendant was the part owner and manager of a line of steamers that plied between Haverfordwest and Liverpool, calling at Milford Haven on the way. One of this line of steamers—the Sovereign—was advertised by the defendant to call at Milford Haven on May 6th 1868, at ten o'clock. On the way-bill containing this advertisement, it was stated that intending passengers might start from the shore of Milford Haven on the evening in question in a small steamer called the Gipsy, and be carried by her, free of extra charge, to a large hulk that was moored in the harbour, alongside of which the Sovereign was to come. This hulk was a large ship of 1200 tons, so that its upper deck was considerably higher than that of the steamers. It was accordingly the practice for passengers, intending to go by the steamers, to be landed from the small steamer called the Gipsy that plied between the hulk and the shore, through a port hole on to the lower deck of the hulk. There was on the other side of the lower deck of the hulk another port-hole, through which the passengers went on board the large sea-going steamers. Midway between these port-holes was a ladder leading on to the upper deck, on which there was a ticket office, in which the defendant's servant sold tickets to persons going by the steamers. Passengers, however, were at liberty, if they chose, to pay their fares when they got on board the steamer. The plaintiff, on the evening in question, went in the Gipsy, from the shore of Milford Haven to this hulk, and landed in the usual way through the port-hole on to the lower deck. He then went up the ladder on to the upper deck, and bought his ticket at the ticket office. He then waited on the upper deck until the Sovereign (which was about two hours late), came up. He then went down the ladder on to the lower deck, intending to go through the port-hole on board the Sovereign. On arriving, however, at the bottom of the ladder, and taking a short step forward, he fell down an open hatchway into the hold of the hulk, and sustained very severe injuries. There was no light on this lower deck, and the open hatchway down which the plaintiff fell, was not more than a couple of feet from the bottom of the ladder. There was one person on board the hulk, who was permanently in charge of it, he was the servant of Williams, the owner of the hulk. The other men who were assisting in the embarkation of passengers by the Sovereign, were the servants of the defendant, and had come over with the plaintiff in the Gipsy. These servants swore that they cautioned the plaintiff to be careful, and that the plaintiff laughed at the caution, saying this was not the first time he had been on board ship. The plaintiff, however, denied that any such caution was given him, or that he made any such reply, and he was corroborated by several of the passengers.

The agreement between the defendant and Williams was put in by the plaintiff. By it Williams agreed to let the defendant have the use of the hulk at a yearly rent, for the embarkation of passengers and the storage of goods. Williams was to have it properly fitted up for the accommodation of passengers to the satisfaction of the defendant's agent, and the defendant undertook to light it. The defendant, however, had not the sole use of the hulk, but it was used by several other persons as a depôt for goods. The plaintiff's counsel also put in a copy of the way-bill, advertising the departure of the defendant's steamers, for the purpose of showing how it was proposed to make the transit from the shore of Milford. It was stated, at the bottom of the way-bill, that the defendant would not be responsible for any accident happening to passengers on board the hulk. The plaintiff, however, was not cross-examined as to whether he had seen this last notice, and no evidence was given by the defendant to show that he had seen it. The ticket sold to the plaintiff made no allusion to this notice, and merely stated the fare, the class, and the names of the places—Milford Haven to Liverpool.

On this evidence the defendant's counsel submitted that there was no evidence to go to the jury, and the learned judge decided that there was, and the jury having negatived the charge of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and having assessed the damages, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, subject to a special case for the opinion of the court.

Allen having obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground that the jury ought to have found for the defendant on the point of contributory negligence, it was agreed that the special case should be abandoned, and the points that were to have been raised in it argued with the rule.

Bowen and De Rutzen showed cause. The defendant's servants were the persons guilty of the negligence; there was but one servant of Williams permanently on board the hulk, while several servants of the defendant were there superintending the embarkation of the passengers. But even if it was the servants of Williams whose negligence caused this accident, the defendant is responsible, as the accident happened in the course of the transit from Milford Haven to Liverpool, during the whole of which the defendant had contracted to carry the plaintiff safely:

Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, 7 H. & N. 987; 31 L. J. 346, Ex.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94;

Buxton v. North Eastern Railway, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 549; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795; Muscamp v. The Lancaster &c. Railway Company, 8 M. & W. 421.

[SMITH, J. cited Francis v. Cockrell, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 203.] Moreover, irrespectively of the questions whose hulk it was and whose servants had charge of it, the defendant was bound, having invited the plaintiff and others to come on board the hulk to take their tickets and embark on the steamer, to see that the hulk was in a fit and proper state, and not having seen to that he is liable in this action:

Indermaur v. Dames, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 311; 36 L. J. 181, C. P.

Quain, Q. C. Allen, and Coleridge, in support of the rule.—The facts clearly show that the servants of Williams were responsible for this negligence. It must have been they who left the hatchway in this dangerous state. That being so, the defendant is not liable. In Blake v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) the court decided on the ground that the arrangement between the South Wales and the Great Western Railway Companies was such as virtually to make the South Wales line part of the Great Western Railway, and also to make the two companies partners quoad this journey. [BOVILL, C. J.—I think that the case was decided on the ground that there was a contract between the Great Western and Blake, by which the company agreed to carry him safely the whole distance. Moreover the servants, through whose negligence the accident happened, in that case were the servants of the South Wales Company only, and had nothing to do with the train in which Blake was being carried.] Blackburn, J. rested his judgment in the case of Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) on The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, but the decision in that case did not justify him in delivering the judgment he did. The hulk was a quasi public place, kept by Williams, and let out by him to various persons. The agreement between Williams and the defendant shows that the defendant had not such exclusive possession of, and control over, the hulk as to make him liable. Moreover, the nature of the contract is disclosed in the way-bill, which shows that the defendant expressly declared he would not be liable for any accident on board the hulk. [BOVILL, C. J.—You never showed that the plaintiff agreed to be bound by that condition.] The plaintiff himself put the way-bill in as part of his case. Moreover, the plaintiff was not bound to go on this hulk. As many passengers went out by boats and got on board the steamer as went on to the hulk. Again, the evidence of contributory negligence was so strong, that the defendant is entitled to a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

BOVILL, C. J.—At the trial of this case, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 100*l.*, and the learned judge who presided, gave leave to the defendant to move to have the verdict entered for him, if the court should be of opinion that, on the facts and documents in the case, there was no evidence of negligence for which he was responsible, and the court were to have power to draw inferences of fact. In pursuance of that leave Mr. Allen obtained a rule, and he also obtained a rule for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The questions raised in this case seem to me to be, first, whether there was any negligence on the part of anybody which led to the accident; secondly, whether the defendant is responsible for the consequences of that negligence; thirdly, whether the defendant is protected by the notice given in the time table; and fourthly, whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff conducing to the accident. The jury found that there was negligence in leaving the hatchway as it was, and that there was no contributory negligence. It can scarcely be disputed that there was evidence of negligence on the part of some one with regard to the hatchway. With respect to the question of contributory negligence, I must confess that there certainly seems to me to be a preponderance of evidence in favour of the defendant. Still there are certain points in the evidence given by the defendant's witnesses, which might form fair subjects of comment. At any rate, the jury, who had a great deal better opportunity of arriving at the truth than we have, believed the plaintiff and his witnesses in preference to the witnesses called for the defendant; and, as the learned judge who tried the case has not reported himself dissatisfied with the verdict, we must decline to interfere. With regard to the question of negligence in leaving the hatchway as it was, I do not hesitate to say that there was negligence on the part of somebody. Was the defendant responsible for that negligence? The defendant represents the owners of a line of steamers plying between Haverfordwest and Liverpool. One of these vessels was advertised to leave Milford Haven for Liverpool at ten o'clock at night on the 6th May last year. Now, what was the mode in which that transit was to be performed? According to the time-table, passengers were to embark at Milford on board the Gipsy, to be carried free of charge to the stationary hulk. It is stated that the Gipsy was to ply between Milford and the hulk in connection with the steamers. The defendant thus made himself a carrier of passengers for reward from Milford to Liverpool, and the transit was, according to the time-table, to be commenced on the Gipsy. The Gipsy was to land the passengers on board the hulk, and they were then to remain on the hulk until the steamer came. There was a ticket office on board the hulk, at which the defendant sold tickets for the whole journey. The plaintiff was received by the defendant to be carried as a passenger from Milford to Liverpool. He did not pay in the first instance, i.e., on board the Gipsy; but in many cases where persons travel by steamer they do not take their tickets until they get on board, and, to all intents and purposes, the defendant was carrying the plaintiff for reward. Before the accident happened, the plaintiff had taken his ticket and paid his fare. The plaintiff, having got on board the hulk, had to wait there until the steamer came up. The steamer was not very punctual; it was advertised for ten but did not arrive till twelve o'clock. The defendant had taken means to secure the use of the hulk for the passengers. In his answer to the interrogatories, he says, "We had the use of the hulk for receiving goods and passengers." We have, moreover, before us the agreement between him and the owners of the hulk. That shows that the defendant had secured the use of the hulk for the accommodation of the passengers, and in it the defendant stipulates with the owner of the hulk that it is to be fitted up and arranged to the satisfaction of the defendant's agent for the use of passengers by the steamer, and further the defendant engages to provide proper lights. The defendant had not the sole and exclusive use of the hulk, but he was bound to light it himself, and also to see that it was properly fitted up for the accommodation of the passengers. In this state of things the defendant went on board the hulk. He went through the port-hole up the ladder to the upper deck, where he took his ticket at the ticket office. His right course then, when the steamer came up, was to go down the ladder to the lower deck, and thence on board the steamer. The defendant undertook to carry him in this way, and there was a clear invitation on his part to the passengers to go where the plaintiff went. That transit was highly dangerous. There was a hole in the lower deck of a very dangerous character, which was neither lighted nor covered, and the plaintiff, without any negligence on his part, fell into this hole, which was nothing more nor less than a dangerous trap. The defendant had clearly received payment for the journey from Milford to Liverpool, and in the course of this transit there was a dangerous place and no precautions taken. There was a direct invitation to the plaintiff to take this particular course, and, besides that, the plaintiff had contracted to carry the plaintiff, and to use due and reasonable care in so doing. This raises the question whether, independently of the question whether it was the defendant's servants who had charge of the hulk, the defendant was not responsible on this contract. I think, in the first place, that the case falls clearly within the principle of those cases where a man has been held liable for the consequences if he has invited another person to a place where there is a hidden danger in the nature of a trap. A fortiori the defendant is liable on his contract to carry safely, on the authority of The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (ubi sup.), and Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.). In the former case the servants of the South-Wales Railway Company, through whose negligence the accident happened, were in no sense the servants of the Great-Western Railway Company. The facts are not very fully stated in the report of the case. I was engaged as counsel in the case, and I know very well that the engine which caused the accident was not connected with the Great-Western Railway Company, and the agreement between the two companies to share in profits only related to the money paid by the passengers who were carried by the Great-Western Railway Company on the South Wales lines. The agreement between the two companies had no relation to the servants who put the engine on the line, and the case was substantially decided on the ground that the Great Western Railway Company had contracted to carry over the whole space. That doctrine was confirmed in Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, and in the recent case of Francis v. Cockrell (ubi sup.). The latter case is stronger than the present, as the person who sold the tickets for the grand stand was held to have warranted that the stand had been properly constructed by third parties, whereas here we need only decide that the defendant had contracted to use due and reasonable care. The case also falls within the decision in Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B., N. S., 470. It comes, then, to this: that the plaintiff was lawfully on this hulk, on the invitation of the defendant, and fell down 'this dangerous hole, without any negligence on his part. Under such circumstances who is responsible if not the defendant? Besides that, the defendant had the use of this hulk, with power to see that it was properly fitted up, and with the obligation (as between himself and the owner of the hulk) to see that it was properly lighted, and as he contracted to carry the plaintiff, and the passage across the hulk formed part of the transit, I think he is clearly responsible if the hulk was in an unsafe and improper condition. With regard to the condition inserted in the time bill, I do not think it is necessary to inquire whether that would protect the defendant against the consequences of such negligence as this, as there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff had notice of the condition, so as to import it into the contract between him and the defendant. Moreover, the point was not raised at the trial, nor was the rule granted on this point. True, the time-bill was put in evidence by the plaintiff at the trial but it was not put in as evidence of the contract, nor does the plaintiff appear to have been cross-examined as to whether he saw the time-table before taking his ticket. On these grounds, I think that this rule must be discharged.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case falls within the principle of cases that have long been decided and acted upon, and that the defendant is clearly liable. The defendant held out an invitation to the plaintiff to come on board the hulk, of which he had not certainly the exclusive possession, but of which he had such a possession as to throw on him the duty of seeing that those whom he invited on board were not brought into undue danger. The plaintiff, having been so invited on board, went up the ladder to the upper deck, got his ticket, and on the arrival of the steamer, he went down the ladder again. On his getting on to the lower deck, he met with this accident in consequence of there being a hatchway close to the bottom of the ladder, which was uncovered, and very badly lighted. That is quite sufficient to make the defendant liable. I also entirely agree that the defendant is liable on the contract. He contracted to take the plaintiff from Milford Haven to Liverpool, and it was clearly in course of the transit from one place to the other, that this accident happened. Whether the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants, or by that of the servants of Williams (the owner of the hulk), is, on the authority of the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (ubi sup.) immaterial. I cannot agree that that case was decided on the ground suggested by Mr. Quain, viz., that there was an agreement between the Great Western and the South Wales Railway Companies to share in profits so as to make the servants of the latter company the servants equally of the former. In my opinion, it was decided on the ground that by their contract with their passengers the Great Western Company had undertaken to use due care on the whole journey for which they had received payment. I was a party to that decision, and my impression corroborates that of my lord, that that was the ground on which the judgment proceeded, though one or two of the judges used expressions which might bear another interpretation. I think, then, that on this ground also the defendant is liable. Another ground taken on behalf of the defendant is that the notice in the time-table exempts him from liability. But there was no evidence to show that this notice was ever brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff. He may have seen the advertisement, but there is nothing to fix him with knowledge of this condition. The ticket is silent as to it, and where it is necessary to bind a party by terms of special exemption it is necessary to show that he had notice of them. I think that the cases have already gone far enough in presuming notice. It can never be said that a party must be taken to know all the contents of a time-table, which he is not shown to have ever seen at all. As to the question of contributory negligence the evidence was conflicting; the jury decided in favour of the plaintiff, and the learned judge has not reported himself dissatisfied with the verdict. I think, therefore, that this rule ought to be discharged.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is immaterial whether or not the hulk was in the exclusive possession and management of the defendant. Suffice it to say, that it was used by the defendant for the purpose of the embarkation of passengers, which took place under the control of the defendant's servants. If these servants merely held out to the public that passengers might take their tickets on this hulk and embark from it on the steamer, I think that, on the authority of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.), that is sufficient to make the defendant responsible for an accident caused by a hidden danger on the hulk to a person who was lawfully there and on his invitation. But I also think that the defendant had contracted to carry the plaintiff from the shore of Milford Haven to Liverpool, and that it was an essential part of such a contract that the plaintiff should be carried with due care. The main contention on the part of the defendant is, that there was no want of care on the part of the defendant's servants. But I think that, the defendant having contracted to use due care throughout the whole of the transit, the passengers have a right to see that due care is exercised in the management of the vessels engaged in the transit, whether they are under the charge of the defendant's servants or of those of a third party. That is established by a series of authorities, the leading case on the subject being the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (ubi sup.). The recent case of Francis v. Cockrell (ubi sup.) has carried a similar obligation into contracts not relating to carriage. There the person who received payment for admission to a race-stand was held to have warranted that due care had been exercised in its erection. If carriers choose not to perform the whole journey themselves, and contract with others to do a part of it, they are still bound to see that due care is taken of their passengers, and are responsible if it is not. As to the other points raised, I also agree that this rule must be discharged.

BRETT, J.—I think that, on the question of contributory negligence, there was strong evidence for the defendant, and I am not prepared to say, that, if I had been on the jury, I should not have found on this ground for the defendant. Still, for the reasons given by the rest of the court, I do not think that the verdict of the jury should be disturbed on this ground. With regard to the point raised as to the defendant being absolved from liability by the notice given in the time-table, I also agree with the rest of the court. The question, then, is reduced to this, whether the defendant is liable for the admitted negligence on the part of somebody in leaving the hatchway in such a dangerous state. It is argued, first, that the defendant is liable, as his servants had charge of the hulk. I cannot, however, satisfy myself that that is so. It was not the duty of the defendant's servants (looking at the matter as between the defendant and Williams) to open or close the hatchways. I am not at all satisfied that any part of the agreement between the defendant and Williams could be relied on to prove the liability of the defendant for this accident. If the negligence in this case could be said to be partly the negligence of the defendant's servants, in not seeing the place properly lighted, and partly that of Williams' servants in not shutting down the hatchways, I think the defendant might be held liable; and there is strong evidence to show that, as against Williams, the defendant was bound to provide lights. But I think that, even if we assume that the accident was caused partly from the hatchway being left open, and partly from the absence of lights, and that the servants of Williams were responsible for both these pieces of negligence, the question arises whether the defendant is not even then liable. He had contracted to carry the plaintiff from the shore of Milford Haven to Liverpool. The advertisement of the defendant's steamers was put in by the plaintiff, not as part of the contract between him and the defendant, but to show how that contract was to be carried out. This advertisement showed that the proposed mode of performing the contract was by carrying passengers on the Gipsy from the shore to the hulk, by leaving them on the hulk until the steamer came up, and then by transferring them to the steamer. Thus the hulk was made a part of the mode of transit, and there was negligence in leaving that part in an unsafe state. If that was so, then, irrespectively of the question whose servants were guilty of the negligence, I think that, as there was a contract to carry from the shore of Milford Haven to Liverpool, the defendant is liable for this accident. I think he is so, on the authority of the Great Western Railway Company v. Blake. The view taken by the Lord Chief Justice and by Mr. Justice Byles in that case is confirmed and explained in Buxton v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.), and seems to me a clear authority in favour of the plaintiff. Moreover, the recent decision in Francis v. Cockrell, is a strong authority to show that, in all these cases, where one party contracts to carry another from one place to another, there is an implied warranty that no accident shall happen to the passenger through the negligence of anybody.

COUCHMAN v. SILLAR AND ANOTHER.

Apprenticeship agreement—Dissolution of partnership—Demurrer.

To an action upon an agreement of apprenticeship against the defendants, who were partners, for not teaching the plaintiff's son, the defendants pleaded that they were always ready and willing to perform the agreement, but that the plaintiff's son absented himself from the service of the defendants, and thereby prevented the defendants from performing the said agreement on their part, and refused to permit them to do so.

The plaintiff newly assigned, and the defendants pleaded that before the alleged breaches the partnership between the defendants was dissolved, and the defendants ceased to carry on the business of tea and general colonial brokers in partnership, and the said business was, therefore, carried on as before, and as in the agreement in the declaration referred to, by one of the defendants alone, and he was always ready and willing to teach and instruct the plaintiff's son in the said business, and gave him every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the same, and in all respects to the utmost of his power helped the plaintiff's son to a thorough knowledge of the said business in pursuance of the agreement set out in the declaration :

Held, on demurrer, that the plea to the declaration was good, but the plea to the new assignment was bad.

This was a demurrer to two pleas, one a plea to the declaration, the other to a new assignment.

The declaration stated that an agreement was entered into between J. C. Sillar and A. H. Bateman, tea and general colonial brokers, of the first part; Charles Couchman (the plaintiff) of Morley-road, Lewisham, Kent, of the second part; and Charles Couchman, the younger, of Morley-road aforesaid, a minor, son of the said Charles Couchman, of the third part; whereby the said J. C. Sillar and A. H. Bateman, in consideration of 99*l.* 19*s.* paid by the said Charles Couchman, the elder, to them, agreed with the said Charles Couchman, the elder, to take the said C. Couchman, the younger, into their business of tea and general colonial brokers for two years from the date of the agreement; and during such two years to teach and instruct the said C. Couchman, the younger, in all branches of the said business as the same shall be carried on by them, and to give the said C. Couchman, the younger, every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the said business that occasion may afford, and in all other respects to the utmost of their, or either of their, power to help the said Charles Couchman, the younger, to a thorough knowledge of the business of a tea and general colonial broker. Then followed a covenant by Couchman, the elder, for Couchman, the younger, faithfully to serve the firm. It was then averred that the plaintiff paid the said sum of 99*l.* 19*s.* above mentioned to the defendants, and all things were done, &c., to entitle the plaintiff to have the said agreement kept by the defendants, and to sue for the breaches thereafter mentioned, and the defendants did for a certain period observe and perform the same, and receive the said C. Couchman, the younger, into their service and teach him for a certain part of the said two years; yet they did not nor would teach and instruct the said C. Couchman in all or any branches of the business of tea and general colonial brokers during the residue of such two years, nor give him every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the same that occasion might afford, nor did nor would in all other respects to the utmost of their, or either of their, power help the said C. Couchman, the younger, to a thorough knowledge of the said business, but failed, neglected, and refused so to do, and wrongfully and without any cause, dismissed the said C. Couchman, the younger, from their services, and did not nor would permit or suffer him to serve them in their said business of tea and general colonial brokers as agreed, and did not nor would during the said two years after the making the said agreement carry on the said business of tea and general colonial brokers, but before the expiration of that time dissolved partnership, and ceased to carry on such business, and by their own acts and defaults disabled themselves from carrying on the said business, and performing their said agreement; whereby the plaintiff lost the benefit thereof, and of the expenses which he was put to and in and about the same, and the advantage which he would have obtained from having the same further performed by the said defendants, and was and will be put to expenses in and about having the said C. Couchman, the younger, instructed by other persons in the said business.

There were also counts for money had and received, and on accounts stated.

The third plea stated that the defendants, as to so much of the said first count as alleges that they did not nor would teach or instruct the said C. Couchman, the younger, in all or any branches of the business of tea and general colonial brokers, during the residue of the said two years, nor give him every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the same that occasion might afford, nor did nor would in all other respects to the utmost of their or either of their power help the said C. Couchman, the younger, to a thorough knowledge of the said business, but failed and neglected so to do; say that they were always ready and willing to perform the said agreement upon their part, but that the said C. Couchman, the younger, absented himself from the service of the defendants, and thereby prevented the defendants from performing the said agreement on their part, and refused to permit them so to do.

The plaintiff demurred to the third plea, and newly assigned.

The ground of the demurrer was stated to be that the absence of C. Couchman, the younger, was not alleged as having happened before breach, and the absence after breach would not release a prior breach, or excuse the defendants from performance, except during such absence, and that therefore the plea attempted too large a justification.

There was joinder in demurrer, and for a second plea to the plaintiff's new assignment the defendants said that before the alleged breaches the partnership between the defendants was dissolved, and the defendants ceased to carry on the business of tea and general and colonial brokers in partnership, and the said business was thenceforth carried on as before, and as in the agreement in the declaration referred to by the defendant, A. H. Bateman, alone; and the defendant, A. H. Bateman, was always ready and willing to teach and instruct the said Charles Couchman, the younger, in the said business, and gave him every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the same, and in all respects to the utmost of his power helped the said C. Couchman, the younger, to a thorough knowledge of the said business in pursuance of the agreement set out in the declaration.

This second plea to the new assignment was demurred to, on the ground that it admitted the breaches complained of in the declaration without avoiding or justifying the same.

The issues of fact had been tried, and a verdict of £40 entered for the plaintiff, subject to the decision of the court upon these demurrers.

Garth, Q.C. (with him Collier) argued for the plaintiff.—The third plea omits to say whether it was before or after the alleged breach that the plaintiff's son absented himself from the service of the defendants; and if he really absented himself only after the breach the plea is no answer: (Hughes v. Humphery, 6 B & C. 680.) The second plea to the new assignment states as a reason for the defendants not fulfilling their contract, that they had dissolved their partnership, i.e., having by an act of their own rendered it impossible for them to do what they had agreed to do, they give that act as an excuse for not carrying out the agreement. In the case of Brook (app.) v. Dawson (resp.), 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 611, the Court of Queen's Bench affirmed a decision of a magistrate to the effect that upon the dissolution of partnership of two persons to whom a boy was jointly apprenticed, the person carrying on the business alone could not take steps under the magistrates' summary jurisdiction against the apprentice for misconduct.

Brown, Q.C. (with T. Salter) for the defendants.—There is no authority exactly in point, although Popham v. Jones, 13 C. B. 225, and other cases like it, nearly touch the matter. The nearest is that cited by the other side, but in the argument there

Lloyd v. Blackburn, 11 L. J. 210, Ex., was cited, where Lord Abinger said, "It is possible that where, on a dissolution of partnership, one partner agrees to resign the apprentice to another, the apprenticeship may still subsist." The question really is whether this was an engagement on the defendant's part that both partners should personally instruct the apprentice, or merely cause him to be instructed. The words "their or either of their power" suggest that one partner alone could perform the agreement. [Not heard as to the plea to the declaration.]

BOVILL, C. J.—I have no doubt the plaintiff has a right to bring this action. He paid his money to the defendants, and in consideration of that payment, and the services of his son, the two defendants agreed to take the plaintiff's son into their business of tea and general colonial brokers for two years, and during such two years to teach and instruct him in all branches of the said business as the same should be carried on by them, and to give him every facility for acquiring a full knowledge of the said business that occasion might afford, and in all other respects to the utmost of their or either of their power to help him to a thorough knowledge of the business of a tea and general colonial broker. To the alleged breach of this agreement, the defendants have answered that before breach the partnership between the defendants was dissolved, and the defendants ceased to carry on the business of tea and general colonial brokers in partnership, and the said business was thenceforth carried on as before, and as in the agreement referred to, by the defendant A. H. Bateman alone, and the defendant, A. H. Bateman, was always ready and willing to teach and instruct the plaintiff's son in the said business, &c. The defendants admit that they have disabled themselves from carrying out their contract, and by every principle of law non-performance of a contract cannot be excused by a fault of the person whose duty it is to perform it. As to the other demurrer, the plea is perfectly good; it is in substance a complete answer to the action, although it might, perhaps, upon a special demurrer, be bad for the omission of some more particular words. The clause, "thereby prevented the defendants from performing the said agreement," shows that the plaintiff refers to a time before the breach.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think any objection made by Mr. Brown would go to show that there was no breach of the agreement. But it is admitted on the record that both defendants did not, and could not, teach the plaintiff's son as they agreed to do.

BRETT, J.—I was anxious to hear what could be said in support of the plea to the new assignment, and it seems to me, as I expected, that it cannot be a good answer to a breach of the agreement. I think the other plea demurred to is perfectly good.

PEMBROKE BOROUGH ELECTION.

Wednesday, May 11.

Re AN ELECTION PETITION; HUGHES v. MEYRICK.

Withdrawal of petition—Costs—Expenses of respondent before delivery of particulars—Election Petitions Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), sect. 41—Regulæ generales, Mich. Term, 1868, No. 6.

An election petition had been fixed to be tried on the 1st April (Thursday in Easter week), and an order was made on the 22nd March that particulars should be given three days before the trial of all persons alleged to have been bribed, treated, and unduly influenced; no particulars were delivered, but on the 29th March (Monday in Easter week) notice was given to the respondent that an application would be made by the petitioner to withdraw his petition; on the 5th April an order was made that the petitioner should be at liberty to withdraw, and that he should pay the costs of the respondent.

Upon the taxation of costs, the master disallowed all the respondent's expenses, with the exception of 10 guineas, for expenses of the respondent's attorney in getting up the defence, and in drawing the briefs, for fees paid to counsel, and for subpoenas:

Held, upon a rule to review the taxation, that the liability for costs is not to be limited to expenses incurred by the opposite side after the delivery of particulars, but that the master should exercise his discretion whether, under the circumstances, it was reasonable for the respondent to make preparations for defence before he had notice of the charges to be brought against him.

A rule nisi had been granted calling upon the petitioner to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of the respondent's costs in the matter of the said petition, viz., first, as to the disallowance of instructions for briefs; secondly, of charges for briefs; thirdly, of fees to counsel with their briefs, and charges for attendance therewith; fourthly, of the costs for issuing subpoenas, and the service of some of them.

It appeared from the affidavit of the respondent's attorney, who had conducted the defence to the petition, that

The petition was served on the respondent on the 14th Dec. 1868. On the 26th Feb. 1869 notice was given that the petition would be tried at Pembroke on the 1st April 1869 (being the Thursday in Easter week), and on such other subsequent days as might be needful.

On the 22nd March 1869 an order was made that the petitioner should, three days before the day appointed for trial, leave with the master, and also give the respondent or his agents, particulars in writing of all persons alleged to have been bribed, of all persons alleged to have been treated, and of all persons alleged to have been unduly influenced, before, during, and after the election, and that no evidence should be given by the petitioner of any objection not specified in such particulars, except by leave of a judge, upon such terms, if any, as to amendment, postponement, and payment of costs, as might be ordered.

No particulars were delivered in pursuance of the said order, but on the 29th March 1869 (being the Monday in Easter week) between the hours of five and six p.m., a notice was served at the office of the respondent's attorney, that the petitioner proposed to apply to withdraw his petition, on the ground that the evidence which he had been able to obtain in support of his petition was not sufficiently strong to justify the further prosecution thereof.

On the 5th April 1869, an order was made by Martin, B., the judge who had been appointed to try the petition, that the petitioner should be at liberty to withdraw the petition, and that the petitioner should pay the costs of the respondent.

In pursuance of this order, the costs of the respondent were taxed, and the master made his allocatur dated the 23rd Feb. 1870, whereby he allowed the sum of 63l. 6s. 6d. for the costs of the respondent.

The borough of Pembroke consists of the several boroughs, towns, or districts of Pembroke, Pembroke Dock, or Pater, Monkton, Milford, New Milford, or Neyland, Hakin Tenby, and Wiston, some of which places are situate at considerable distance from each other.

In order to prepare for the defence of the respondent,

C. P.]

PEMBROKE BOROUGH ELECTION.

and ascertain what charges might possibly or probably be brought forward in support of the petition, it was necessary to employ persons in each of the places above mentioned to keep a watch upon the movements of the petitioner and his agents, and other persons acting in his interest, and collect evidence to rebut such charges. It was also necessary to collect evidence to show generally that the election had been conducted with perfect purity and absence from bribery (treating and undue influence as, alleged by the petition), on the part of the respondent or his agent. The preparation for the defence also involved very voluminous correspondence with the persons so employed as aforesaid, and attendances upon respondent and other persons, including a journey to Pembroke, where the respondent's attorney was personally engaged for six days, and in his judgment I could not properly have conducted the defence had the petition come on for trial without preparing for the same in the manner detailed, inasmuch as the particulars ordered to be given by the petitioner could not, even if transmitted by telegraph, have been made available at Pembroke for more than two clear days, before the trial, which, having regard to the extended nature of the constituency, would not have allowed sufficient time for the necessary inquiries and collection of evidence.

That the bill of costs of the respondent included a charge as "instructions for briefs," comprising the work just referred to, and including a sum of 189*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* for the charges of the persons employed on behalf of the respondent as aforesaid, amounting to the sum of 367*l.* the whole of which was disallowed by the master.

The bill of costs also included a sum of 8*l.* 4*s.* for the expenses which the respondent's attorney actually incurred by his said journey to Pembroke, which was also disallowed by the said master.

The said bill of costs also included a charge of 29*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for drawing the brief for the defence, with a charge of 14*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for a copy thereof for use, in respect of all which charges the master allowed a sum of 10*l.* 10*s.* only.

The facts and matter stated in the brief were material, and were set out bona fide, and the charges for the same were fair and proper.

The bill of costs also included a sum of 210*l.* 10*s.* for the fee paid with the brief to the senior counsel, and a sum of 110*l.* for the fee paid to the junior counsel retained, the defence, together with the usual and proper charges for attendances on them respectively with their briefs, which were actually delivered and the fees were actually paid before the notice was given by the petitioner of his intention to apply for leave to withdraw from the petition, but the said fees and charges were wholly disallowed by the master.

In consequence of the offices of this court being closed on the Monday and Tuesday in Easter week it was necessary during the previous week to obtain such a number of subpoenas for witnesses as having regard to the size of the constituency, which consisted of nearly 3000 voters, and the general nature of the allegations contained in the petition, would be required; as, if such subpoenas had not been obtained until the Wednesday in Easter week after delivery of particulars, such subpoenas could not have been transmitted to Pembroke and the other places comprised in the borough for service in time to ensure the attendance of witnesses at the trial on the following day, even assuming they were all to be served in the neighbourhood, but the master disallowed the whole of the charges for such subpoenas, which were also included in the bill of costs.

In consequence of the petitioner's agents having verbally informed the respondent's attorney that he intended to proceed on a charge of undue influence by a commander of one of H. M.'s ships, it became necessary to subpoena two persons as witnesses who, as he was informed and believed, could disprove such undue influence, and one of such witnesses was then serving on board one of H. M.'s ships at Plymouth, and the other was about to join his ship at Portsmouth, and in order to ensure their attendance in due time it was necessary to subpoena such two witnesses, without awaiting for the delivery of the particulars, but the whole of the charges included in the said bill of costs for the expenses attending the serving of the said witnesses with subpoenas, as well as the payments made to them, were disallowed by the master.

The amount of costs claimed for the respondent was 918*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*; of which the master disallowed 854*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*; leaving only to be paid by the petitioner 63*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*

H. James, Q. C. showed cause against the rule. —By the 6th of the general rules drawn up in pursuance of the Act of 1867, "the court or a judge may order such particulars as may be necessary to prevent surprise and unnecessary expense," and to ensure a fair and effectual trial, in the same way as in ordinary proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas, and upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as may be ordered." The election judges have fixed three days as the usual time before trial at which particulars should be given, and this court has approved of that practice: (Beal v. Smith, L. Rep. 4 C. P., 145; 19 L. T. Rep. 565.) The question is, whether it is reasonable for a respondent to incur expense in preparing and delivering briefs before he can know what case is to be brought against him. Under the old system of parliamentary petitions, no particulars were delivered until the trial had actually commenced; the object of the alteration was to put an end to unnecessary expense of this very kind. [SMITH, J.—If the master thought a brief should never, as a rigid rule, be delivered before the receipt of the particulars, this review, perhaps, should be allowed; but if, as a matter of discretion, the master thought this was a case in which there was no necessity to incur expense for the defence before the particulars were known, we should be unwilling to interfere.]

Upon inquiry, it was understood that the master had acted in accordance with the rule supported by the petitioner's counsel.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Harrington), for the respondent, was not heard in support of the rule.

BOVILL, C. J.—The Legislature has declared that the costs of election petitions are to be taxed according to the same principles as costs between attorney and client are taxed in a suit in the High Court of Chancery (sect. 4 of the Election Petitions Act 1868), and rules have been drawn up which this court considered in the case of Hill v. Peel, L. Rep. 5 C. P., 172; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 98. We there concluded that parties who obtained an order for costs were entitled to an indemnity for all expenses that were reasonably incurred by them in the ordinary course of matters of this nature; and we also intimated an opinion, which I now repeat, that the parties are entitled to have the judgment of the master upon particular items, if they think fit. No definite rule can be laid down as to the interpretation of expenses reasonably incurred; it must depend upon the facts of each case, and if the master has exercised his discretion after consideration of all the circumstances, we are very unwilling to interfere with his decision. He seems here, however, to have acted on the principle that the delivery of particulars has the same effect as that of notice of trial in an ordinary action; I am of opinion that is not the correct view either of the Legislature or of this court. It is true that the election judges and this court concluded in the case of Beal v. Smith that the petitioners should give, three days before the trial of an election petition, particulars in writing of all persons alleged to have been bribed, treated, and unduly influenced; but we have never intimated, at least I never intended to intimate, that the respondent's brief was not to be delivered until after the particulars had been received by the respondent. It would be hard upon the respondent if his case is to be prepared only after the delivery of particulars. The election judge must make his arrangements as to the day on which the trial is to commence, and if the petitioner persists in prosecuting his petition until within a day or two of the time for the delivery of particulars, and then withdraws, it would be a denial of justice if he should escape the payment of the reasonable expenses which the respondent has already incurred. Generally, the party petitioned against may get some information upon which he can act, before he knows the particular cases relied on by the other side; for instance, the persons who had acted as his agents can be consulted, and a variety of other matters may be considered upon which the master should exercise his discretion as to whether expense was properly incurred. Here, although I do not wish to fetter the master's discretion, I do not think he has acted upon the rule that all expenses reasonably incurred are to be allowed. The fact that the trial was fixed to take place in Easter week should not be altogether disregarded in considering the fair time for delivering the briefs; but I will not go into details. The parties are entitled to the opinion of the master upon every item of the costs, and the same rule applies to the subpoenas. The briefs need not always be delivered immediately upon the filing of a petition; but the master should exercise his discretion as to whether the expenses charged are reasonable between attorney and client for the defence of a prudent and reasonable man. This taxation should go back to the master in order that he may act upon the principles laid down in Hill v. Peel.

REG. v. ELIZABETH BROWN.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is a principle which cannot be recognised that no brief ought to be delivered to a counsel on behalf of a respondent before the particulars have been received. Each case ought to depend upon its circumstances, and although the particulars ought not to be lost sight of in the consideration of the amount of preparation for the defence, we cannot expect that a respondent should do nothing up to three days before the trial.

SMITH, J.—I concur in making this rule absolute on the ground that the master has acted on a wrong principle, viz., that the petitioner should be responsible for no expense, beyond that of a nominal brief, which the respondent may have incurred before he receives particulars. I think he ought not to have so confined the costs which the petitioner should pay. In some cases the respondent might be entitled to incur considerable costs about a matter concerning which he has reason to expect, without specific notice, that an attack is going to be made. He is in a state of war, and if the petition is withdrawn he is entitled to be indemnified against all expenses which he reasonably incurs, or those expenses which a prudent man would have paid out of his own pocket. I do not say that in this case the briefs were not delivered before it was necessary, but whether it was so or not is a question for the discretion of the master. I may say that it is not fair either to counsel or their clients that the delivery of briefs should be delayed until a day too close upon the trial. The master seems to have exercised no discretion upon this point, and therefore this taxation should go back to him.

BRETT, J.—It seems to me that the only rule which should govern this matter is that the costs should be allowed if they were incurred in respect of an act which the attorney would have been justified in doing without specific instructions from his client. As I understand it, although the master considered the delivery of the briefs at this time a reasonable act, he has refused to allow the costs, because the respondent had not then received the petitioner's particulars. Such a rule might, I think, cause the greatest injustice, and a petitioner can always protect himself by withdrawing his petition earlier than was done here.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. ELIZABETH BROWN.

Concealment of birth—What is—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60.

What is a secret disposition of the dead body of a child within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, is a question for the jury, depending on the circumstances of the particular case.

Where the dead body of a child was thrown into a field over a wall 4½ ft. high, separating the yard of a public-house from the field, and a person looking over the wall from the yard might have seen the body, but persons going through the yard or using it in the ordinary way would not, it was held that this was evidence from which the jury might infer a secret disposition of the body.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Mr. Justice Brett:—

The prisoner, Elizabeth Brown, was tried and convicted before me at Newcastle, at the last Spring Assizes for the county of Northumberland, for endeavouring to conceal the birth of her child by secretly disposing of the dead body thereof.

The evidence as to the disposition of the body was a statement by the prisoner that she had put the body over a wall near which it was found; and statements before the jury by witnesses that the wall was 4½ ft. high, dividing a yard from a field; that the yard was at the back of a public house, used for the convenience of that house and three other tenements by the occupiers thereof; that there was no thoroughfare into or through the yard, and no other entrance to it than by a narrow passage from the street; that the prisoner, who did not live at the public-house or at any of the tenements, must have passed from the street into the yard in order to throw the body over the wall into the field; that a person looking over the wall from the yard would see the child, but persons going through the yard or using it in the ordinary way would not see the child; the wall would hide the child from such persons; that the field in which the body was found was a grass field, used by a butcher to graze cattle; that it was a field with no gate into it from any road or from the public-house yard, but with a gate from the butcher's own yard; that there was no public path through the field; that there was no track or path in the field which would take anyone within sight of the body; that no person going into the field in their ordinary occupation would go near the body or see it; that no one in the field would see it unless he went accidentally or on search up to the part of the wall where the body lay; that a little girl picking flowers in the field went accidentally to the wall and found the body; that it was close to the wall, as near to it as could possibly be. It seemed as if it had been thrown over the wall; there was blood on the wall; the body was lying on its face, at twenty yards from the gate, naked, with nothing on or over it, nothing to conceal it but its situation in the field and the wall.

Upon this evidence, it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that there was no evidence of a secret disposition of the dead body, and the case of Reg. v. Nixon, 4 F. & F. 1040, was cited.

I left, upon this part of the case, the following question to the jury:—

Did the wall and the position of the child in the field, and with regard to the wall and the mode in which the field and the yard were used, conceal the body from all the world, unless from a person who, by searching for the child, might find it, or by going out of the way in the field or by looking over the wall might accidentally discover it. I told them that if they found an answer in the affirmative they might find that there was a secret disposition of the body, but that if they found an answer in the negative, they could not, in my opinion, find that there was a secret disposition. The jury found the prisoner guilty.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. GUTHRIE.

I desire the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal upon two points, first, whether there was any evidence of a secret disposition of the dead body of the child within the meaning of the statute; and, secondly, whether, if there was such evidence, the form in which the question was left to the jury was wrong in law.

If the court should be of opinion that there was no evidence, or that the form of the question was wrong, then the conviction to be quashed; but if the court should be of opinion that there was evidence, and that the form of the question was not wrong, then the conviction to stand.

WM. BALIOL BRETT.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Ridley for the prosecution.—The question is whether there was any secret disposition of the body of the child. The case of Reg. v. Nixon was one where the prisoner was seen to remove the body out of the house, and it was afterwards found in the penfold or pond, 150yds. off an open place (though locked), surrounded with a wall 5ft. high on the outside, and along which was a public pathway, so that anyone who passed could look over and see it. In that case the probability was that people passing would find the body; here the circumstances are such that probably no one would find the body. In Reg. v. Clarke, 4 F. & F. 1040, it was held to be a question for the judge whether there has been a secret disposing of the body, i.e., a disposing of it in such a place as that the offence may have been committed (and a dustbin is such a place), but it is for the jury to say whether there has been such a disposing of the body by the prisoner. In the old statute, 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 14, the words were "by secret burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body of the child;" but in the present Act, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, the words are "every person who shall by any secret disposition of the dead body of the child;" the change is material. And in Reg. v. Sleep, 9 Cox Crim. Cas. 559, the words of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, were held to mean the putting the body of the dead child in a place where it is not likely to be found, but merely placing it in an open box in a bedroom, and afterwards, on inquiry by the medical man, informing him that the body was in the box, was held not a secret disposition within the statute. In Reg. v. Eliza Cook, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 216, it was held that though the placing the dead body of the child in an unlocked box is not of itself sufficient evidence of concealment of birth, yet all the attendant circumstances must be considered, in order to determine whether or not the offence has been committed within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60.

BOVILL, C.J.—The first question is whether there was any evidence of the secret disposition of the dead body of the child within the meaning of the statute. Now, what is a secret disposition of the dead body depends upon the circumstances of each case. One may conceive of such a disposition where the circumstances might also amount to a public exposure, as placing the body in the middle of a large moor in winter, or on the top of a high mountain where persons are not likely to go. It is for the jury in each case to say what amounts to a secret disposition of the body. In the present case there was abundant evidence of a secret disposition of the body, for the body was put over a wall near which it was found, and the wall might conceal the body, and whether it did so was a question for the jury. A woman might throw the dead body of a child over a cliff on to the seashore, and if the shore was frequented by persons at the spot, the act might not amount to a secret disposition of the body; but if it was unfrequented, then it might amount to a secret disposition. The only other question is as to the direction of the learned judge to the jury, and we think that that was correct, and that the conviction ought to stand.

The rest of the COURT concurring,

REG. v. GUTHRIE.

Carnal knowledge of a girl under twelve—Assault—Indictment.

An indictment charged that G., in and upon D., a girl above the age of ten, and under the age of twelve, unlawfully did make an assault, and her the said D. did then unlawfully and carnally know and abuse against the form of the statute.

Held, that the indictment contained two charges, one of common assault, and the other of the statutable misdemeanor (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 51), and that the prisoner might be convicted of a common assault upon it.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by John Robert Davison, the chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county palatine of Durham.

Durham, to wit. At the general quarter sessions of the peace of our lady the Queen, holden at Durham, in and for the county of Durham, on Monday the 4th April, in the thirty-third year of the reign of our sovereign lady Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen defender of the faith, and in the year of our Lord 1870. Before John Robert Davison and Anthony Wilkinson, and John Fawcett, Esqs., and Edmund Hector Shipperdson, clerk, and others their fellows justices of our said lady the Queen, assigned to keep the peace of our said lady the Queen, and also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors done and committed in the said county.

John Guthrie was tried on an indictment, of which the following is a copy:—

Durham, to wit. The jurors for our lady the Queen, upon their oath present, that John Guthrie, on the 24th Dec., in the year of our Lord 1869, in and upon one Margaret Davidson, a girl above the age of ten years, and under the age of twelve, to wit, of the age of ten years and three days, unlawfully did make an assault, and her the said Margaret Davidson did then unlawfully and carnally know and abuse against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said lady the Queen, her Crown and dignity.

There was no other count in the indictment.

The offence of carnally knowing and abusing the girl was disproved, but there was evidence of an assault of an indecent and very violent character, which I left to the jury, who found the accused guilty of a common assault.

I did not sentence the prisoner, who remains in gaol, being unable to find bail.

The opinion of this Honourable Court is requested as to whether John Guthrie could be properly convicted on this indictment of a common assault.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

John Edge, for the prosecution.—The indictment, which contained only one count, was founded on the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 s. 51, which makes it a misdemeanor to carnally know and abuse any girl being above the age of ten and under the age of twelve years. The count, however, as framed, charges substantially two offences — the first, a common assault, and the second the statutable misdemeanor created by sec. 51. If the count had stopped with the words "unlawfully did make an assault," it would have been a sufficient charge of a common assault. And those words are not necessary in the indictment for the misdemeanor created by sect. 51. After conviction this objection cannot be entertained. In Nash v. The Queen, 4 B. & S. 985; 38 L. J. 94, M. C., a count of an indictment framed under sect. 221 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 charged that the defendant was adjudged bankrupt in the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, and that upon his examination in the said court with intent to defraud his creditors he did not fully and truly discover to the best of his knowledge and belief all his property, to wit all his personal property in money and goods, and did not as to part of his property fully and truly discover to the best of his knowledge and belief how, and to whom, and for what consideration, and when he had disposed of, assigned or transferred such part thereof, to wit 1000*l.*, 1000 sacks of corn, &c. The defendant having been convicted on this count, and having brought a writ of error, it was held that if the count charged two offences, duplicity was not a ground of error. In Rex v. Withal and Overend, 2 East P. C. 515, it was held that different offences might be laid in the same indictment, and that the prisoner might be acquitted of part and found guilty of the rest; as, if the prisoner be charged that he feloniously and burglariously broke and entered the dwelling-house of J. S., and then and there certain goods of J. S. feloniously and burglariously did steal, &c., the indictment comprises two offences, viz., burglary and larceny; and therefore he may be acquitted of the burglary, and found guilty only of the larceny. [CLEASBY, B.—You would not say that if the prisoner was found guilty of carnally knowing a girl under the age of twelve with her consent, you could upon this indictment find him guilty of a common assault?] No; in that case he ought to be found not guilty of the common assault. In Rex v. Dawson, 3 Stark. Rep. 62, Holroyd, J. held that the averment of intention was divisible in an indictment which charged the prisoner with having assaulted a female child with intent to abuse and carnally know her, the jury having found that the prisoner assaulted the child with intent to abuse her but not with intent to carnally know her. In Reg. v. Cockburn, 3 Cox Crim. Cas. 543, where, upon an indictment which charged the prisoner with carnally knowing a girl under the age of ten years, and upon the evidence the charge of rape could not be sustained, the counsel for the prosecution suggested that the prisoner might be convicted of an assault, and that the consent of the child could not be presumed by reason of its tender age; but Patteson, J. directed an acquittal on the ground that a child could give such consent as to render the attempt no assault. But in Reg. v. Banks, 8 C. & P. 574, Patteson, J. held that the offence of carnally knowing and abusing a female child under ten years old is not a felony which includes an assault within the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 11, even though it be stated in the indictment that the prisoner made an assault on the child, on the ground that the very offence showed that there was no assault. In Reg. v. Oliver Bell, C. C. 287, it was held upon a count for assaulting, beating, and wounding, and occasioning actual bodily harm, against the statute, that a prisoner might be convicted of a common assault. [BOVILL, C. J.—The case of Reg. v. Yeadon, L. & C. 81; 9 Cox Crim. Cas. 91; is to the same effect.] Reg. v. Taylor, 11 Cox Crim. Cas. 261; L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 194; was also cited.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. HENWOOD.

distinctly an offence at common law that the prisoner in and upon one Margaret Davidson, a girl above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years, unlawfully did make an assault. And it further charges, "and her, the said Margaret Davidson, did then unlawfully and carnally know and abuse against the form of the statute." The second charge is a statutable one. If there is any objection to the indictment on the ground of duplicity, it is no objection at this stage of the case. It was only necessary to prove such facts as were material to support either charge. With regard to the charge of assault, that would not have been made out if consent on the part of the girl had been proved. There is no ground for saying that the prisoner was not properly convicted if the charge is contained in the indictment. The cases of Reg. v. Gliver, Reg. v. Yeadon, and Reg. v. Taylor, show that the conviction for the assault was right. Then, the addition of some more serious charge in the indictment does not prevent the prisoner being found guilty of the assault.

WILLES, J. concurred.

BYLES, J.—My mind is not free from doubt in this case, but the doubt is not sufficiently strong to make me differ from the rest of the court.

HANNEN, J. concurred.

CLEASBY, B.—I thought at first that the indictment charged one offence only, but it may be read as including the two offences. And, if so, the prisoner was properly convicted of a common assault.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. HENWOOD.

Larceny—Indictment—Election—Continuous taking —24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 6.

An indictment charged an assistant to a photographer with stealing divers articles belonging to his employer. It did not appear when the articles were taken, whether at one or more times, but only that one particular article could not have been taken before a given month: Held, that this was not a case in which the prosecutor should be put to elect upon which articles to proceed under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 6.

At the Quarter Sessions for the borough of Brighton held on the 11th March 1870, before me, John Locke, Esq., one of Her Majesty's counsel and Recorder of the said borough, Charles Henwood was indicted for stealing a quantity of negatives, chemicals, and other things, the property of John Jabez Edwin Mayall, a photographer, his master. The indictment was in the words following:

Borough of Brighton to wit.—The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present that before and at the time of the committing of the offence hereinafter mentioned, Charles Henwood was servant to one John Jabez Edwin Mayall, and that the said Charles Henwood, whilst he was such servant to the said John Jabez Edwin Mayall, to wit, on the 17th Jan. 1870, feloniously did steal, take, and carry away twenty negatives, twenty sheets of photographic glass, fifty mounting cards, four black sheets of publication portraits, fifty mounted positives, four quires of aluminised paper, 4oz. chloride of gold, one Winchester quart of collodion, 20oz. of nitrate of silver, 10oz. of proto-sulphate of iron, 1oz. of spirit varnish, or the goods and chattels of the said John Jabez Edwin Mayall, his said master as aforesaid, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

There was a second count for receiving the same things.

First. The prisoner had been in the service of the prosecutor for nine years, and was in his service on the 17th Jan. 1870, and the evidence given in support of the indictment was that on that day a number of articles similar to those mentioned in the indictment and which were proved to be the property of the prosecutor, were found at the prisoner's lodgings in a box belonging to the prisoner, but there was no evidence given as to when any of the said articles were taken by or came into the possession of the prisoner, or were first missed by the prosecutor.

BOVILL, C. J.—In this case the indictment charges

Secondly. With reference to one of the articles, namely, the photograph of a lady, it was contended by the prisoner's counsel that it was taken by the prisoner in the month of March 1868, but although it was clear that it could not have been taken before that time there was no positive evidence as to when it was taken.

Thirdly. Counsel for the prisoner then objected that under these circumstances such a state of things arose as to bring into operation the 6th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, and require the prosecutor to elect.

Upon this counsel for the prosecution abandoned the case as to the photograph of the lady mentioned in paragraph 2, but contended as regarded all the other articles named in the indictment that the taking was continuous, and he referred to the case of Reg. v. Firth, L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 179.

I was of this opinion; but at the request of the prisoner's counsel, I reserved the point for the opinion of this Court.

The prisoner was convicted and liberated on bail.

The question for the court is whether the conviction was right.

JOHN LOCKE, Recorder of Brighton.

Besley for the prisoner.—The question arises on the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 6. "If upon the trial of any indictment for larceny it shall appear that the property alleged in such indictment to have been stolen at one time, was taken at different times, the prosecutor shall not by reason thereof be required to elect upon which taking he will proceed, unless it shall appear that there were more than three takings, or that more than the space of six months elapsed between the first and the last of such takings; and in either of such last-mentioned cases the prosecutor shall be required to elect to proceed for such number of takings not exceeding three, as appear to have taken place within the period of six months from the first and the last of such takings." The question was reserved upon the following passage in a judgment of Bovill, C. J., in Reg. v. Firth, L. Rep. Cr. Cas. Res. 175; 11 Cox Crim. Cas. 234. "Another case might be suggested of a man at work in a house stealing on different days out of different rooms, and taking one article out of one room, and another out of another at intervals of a quarter of an hour or longer, all during the same job of work. I should rather suppose that this would be one continuous act, and might be included in one indictment." When once it appears that any one article was taken more than six months from the others the statute applies. In this case the photograph was so taken. [By the COURT.—The case as to that was abandoned.]

BOVILL, C. J.—The objection raised at the trial was that the prosecutor ought to be put to his election under sect. 6 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. Thereupon the counsel for the prosecution abandoned the case as to one particular photograph, and the case then proceeded with respect to the other articles. To make the statute applicable it must appear that the different articles enumerated in the indictment were stolen at different times, but there is nothing in this case inconsistent with all having been taken at one time, or in such a way as to form one continuous taking. Now the statute says that the prosecutor shall not be required to elect except in certain events. In the first place it must appear that the property was taken at different times, then that there were more than three takings, or that more than six months elapsed between the first and the last of such takings. The statute, therefore, has no application to this case. Had there been evidence of distinct takings it would have made no difference, for the case would then have been similar to the taking of coal at different times in a mine (Rex v. Bleasdale, 2 Car. & K. 675), and the case of cutting trees at such times as to form one continuous taking (Reg. v. Shepherd, 87 L. J. 45, M. C.; 11 Cox Crim. Cas. 110), and to the case of taking gas for a long time in succession: (Reg. v. Firth, 11 Cox Crim. Cas. 234.) The conviction, therefore, must be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

THE BRISTOL ELECTION PETITION.

Wednesday, May 11.

(Before BRAMWELL, B.)

BRETT AND OTHERS v. ROBINSON.

Bribery and treating—Personation—Test ballot—Time for giving particulars.

A vacancy having occurred in the representation of a city, several candidates of like politics started but agreed to a test ballot to decide which should continue the contest. It was alleged that corrupt practices had prevailed at this ballot:

Held, that the trial of the petition being fixed for Monday, May 23, particulars must be given on the 17th, with permission to add to them up to the 19th, containing the names and addresses of the persons alleged to have been bribed and treated, and of those who bribed and treated, and the places where and times when the alleged treating took place.

This case came before his Lordship on an application by the sitting member for particulars of the charges alleged in the petition against him. It was the first case in which bribery and treating have been alleged in reference to a test ballot. Of the three Liberal candidates at the recent election for Bristol, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Odger, the test ballot was in favour of Mr. Robinson, and at the election he was returned, thereby defeating the Conservative candidate. A petition was subsequently presented under the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 against Mr. Robinson, in which he was charged with bribery, treating, and the personation of voters. The seat was not claimed by the petition. Bramwell, B. appointed Monday, the 23rd instant, for trying the petition at Bristol, and a summons was taken out for particulars of the charges alleged.

The Hon. Chandos Leigh appeared as counsel for the sitting member; and Barrow, solicitor, for the petitioners.

The summons was for particulars in writing containing the names and addresses of the persons alleged to have been bribed, and of the persons alleged to have been treated, and of the persons by whom such persons were bribed or treated, and as far as known the places where and the times when the alleged treating occurred, and similar particulars of the other corrupt practices and personations of voters mentioned in the petition.

Leigh said the other election judges had under the General Orders held that "forthwith," in reference to giving particulars, should mean three clear days before the hearing. He had, however, to ask his Lordship that the particulars should be directed to be given on the Monday or Tuesday in the week preceding the trial.

THE ANDRINA.

[ADM.]

Barrow thought the rule laid down of three clear days should be adhered to. He was willing to give all the particulars he could before the period prescribed, but from the large constituency of Bristol, and the number of voters on the last occasion, it might not be in his power to comply with the order if his Lordship made one.

Leigh said there was in this case a circumstance which rendered it necessary that more than the usual time should be given for inquiries to be made. At the late election there was a test ballot, and Mr. Robinson was returned, and as it was before the election the petitioners alleged bribery and treating before the election. It was therefore necessary that full particulars should be given, and that Mr. Robinson should know what charges he was called upon to answer.

BRAMWELL, B. said as only one day was, in fact, between the parties, perhaps some particulars would be given before the usual time, and, if necessary, additional information afterwards. Perhaps the best course would be to order the particulars to be given on or before Tuesday, the 17th inst., and additional particulars, if necessary, on the Thursday following.

The following was the order made:

"Upon hearing counsel for the respondent, and the attorney or agent for the petitioners, I do order that the petitioners shall, on or before Tuesday the 17th inst. (with liberty to add up to the 19th inst.), leave with the master, and also give to the respondent or his agents particulars in writing containing the names and addresses of the persons alleged to have been bribed, and of the persons alleged to have been treated, and of the persons by whom such persons were respectively bribed or treated, and, as far as is known, the places where, and times when, the alleged treating took place, and similar particulars of the other corrupt practices and personation of voters mentioned in the petition, and that no evidence be given of any objection not specified in such particulars without leave of the judge."

Friday, May 20.

Further particulars—Christian names and addresses—Times and places.

Order made for further and better particulars, giving the Christian names of parties bribing and bribed and treated, and the time when the respective corrupt acts alleged took place

Particulars had been furnished in this matter, but not, as alleged by the respondent, sufficient to comply with the terms of the order, and therefore another summons was taken out for fuller and better particulars, specially in relation to the persons by whom the voters were alleged to have been bribed and treated, and for the addresses and Christian names of all such persons, as also for the specific times at which the treating was alleged to have occurred.

A produced to his Lordship the particulars delivered, and contended that they were not in compliance with the order made by Bramwell, B. Several names were coupled together, and nothing specific was alleged as to the bribery. It was impossible for a member of Parliament to meet such a case.

HANNEN, J., inspected the particulars, and concurred in this opinion.

Barrow submitted that the particulars were sufficient, and referred to the Hastings petition, and also to the Reigate case. It was not like an action at law where definitive particulars could be given. The question of bribery was a difficult one, and until the parties were put into the witness-box, and indemnified from consequences, would they give full information on the subject?

Leigh said there was no Reigate case under the new Act.

Barrow said it was under the old Act, but the other case—the Hastings petition—was under the new Act. He held it in his hand, and the particulars were furnished in the same manner as in the present case.

Leigh said there was a laxity in the first petitions as to particulars.

HANNEN, J. expressed an opinion that they were not sufficient, and he must grant the application for better particulars.

Leigh then referred to the persons alleged to have been treated, and the time specified was from Feb. to March. He had to ask for better particulars on that point.

Barrow said the best particulars had been furnished considering the short time allowed. It was not possible that he could give the addresses and Christian names of the parties.

HANNEN, J. said he must make the order as asked, and better particulars must be given.

Leigh mentioned that some particulars were given at nearly twelve o'clock on Tuesday night, and some afterwards, as allowed by the order of Bramwell, B.

Barrow professed his inability to give the Christian names and addresses of the parties.

HANNEN, J. made an order for better particulars. There must not be a merely colourable compliance with the order of Bramwell, B.

An order was made in compliance with the terms of the summons.

THE ANDRINA.

Apportionment of salvage—Derelict.

Where a derelict brig was met with by a passenger steamer, and which had also a valuable cargo on board, and was towed into port against a strong wind, with a heavy sea rolling, the values of the brig, cargo, and freight being about 2800l.

The court awarded to the salvors 900l.

This was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master and crew of the steam vessel Athlete, against the brig Andrina, her cargo and freight.

The following are the principal facts which were stated in the petition:—

The Athlete is an iron screw steamer of 356 tons register, with a crew of seventeen hands all told. She has engines of 90-horse power nominal, working up to 363-horse power, and is of the value of 8000l. or thereabouts. On the 6th Jan. 1870, the Athlete left Liverpool, on a voyage to Bristol, with a valuable cargo, and three passengers on board.

At about 9.15 on the evening of the 9th, the

[PROB.]

Athlete was off Skokham Island. The wind was blowing very strong from the northward, with a high sea. The night was clear and moonlight, and the mate of the Athlete reported what appeared to be a vessel apparently unmanageable about half a mile distant on the starboard bow.

The course of the Athlete was altered so as to bring her under the lee of the vessel which was lying in the trough of the sea. She was rolling heavily with the sea breaking over her.

The quarter boat of the Athlete was lowered, and the mate and four men who volunteered for the service, proceeded to the vessel. The mate and two men with great difficulty succeeded in getting on board. They found that she was the Austrian brig Andrina, totally abandoned. She had a strong list to port, and was much down by the head. The sea was breaking constantly over her, making it difficult and dangerous to do anything on board. The moon at this time had set, and it was quite dark. By means of the boat and the two men left in it a line was taken from the Athlete to the Andrina, and a 6in. hawser was thus passed from the Athlete to the Andrina, and made fast. The boat was then hoisted up, and the Athlete began to tow slowly. After towing for a quarter of an hour the hawser parted, owing to the heavy sea. Those on board the Andrina set her foresail and jib, and kept her before the wind, whilst the crew of the Athlete hauled in the broken hawser, and again lowered a boat for the purpose of sending another line to the Andrina. With much difficulty, and after several failures having at one time been obliged to let go the hawser as the two vessels were nearly fouling each other, they succeeded in getting another 6in. hawser, and afterwards a new 5in. hawser on board the Andrina, both of which were made fast. The Athlete then proceeded to Milford with the Andrina in tow, and the latter vessel was brought to anchor in Milford Haven at about four a.m. on the 10th Jan. If the Andrina had not been taken in tow by the Athlete, she would have gone ashore in the course of the night upon the rocks of Skomar Island, or otherwise would have been totally lost. The men who went to the Andrina in the boat were in great danger of their lives, the sea running very high on both the occasions on which the boat was lowered. The Athlete herself also ran great risk of injury by collision with the Andrina, and incurred the risk also of her propeller being fouled by the towing hawsers, in which event she would have been in great peril. The owners of the Athlete employed men to pump out the water from the Andrina, and incurred expenses amounting to 93*l.* or thereabouts in taking care of the vessel, trimming and securing cargo, and in temporary repairs, and they estimated the damage to the hawsers at about 30*l.*

The owners of the Andrina, and the owners of the cargo laden on board her, submitted to the judgment of the court upon the facts stated in the petition. It was argued that the value of the Andrina was 825*l.*, the value of her cargo 1450*l.*, and the value of her nett freight 500*l.*

Butt, Q. C., and W. C. Gully, for the owners, master, mate, and the bulk of the crew of the Athlete.

Inderwick for others of the crew of the Athlete.

E. C. Clarkson for the owners of the Andrina.

Lodge for the owners of the cargo of the Andrina.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—There can be no doubt that an important salvage service has been rendered in this case; it is owing to the exertions of the salvors that the property has been saved from being totally lost. It is admitted in the case that the men who went in the boat to the Andrina were in danger of their lives, but at the same time I must bring my experience to bear upon the statements in the case, and I am satisfied that the danger incurred by them cannot have been extreme. I award the sum of 900*l.* to the salvors. I direct it to be apportioned as follows: I award 450*l.* to the owners of the Athlete; this sum I intend to cover the expenses and damages they have sustained. I award 100*l.* to the master of the Athlete, and 200*l.* to the boats' crew, the amount to be distributed amongst them according to their rating; and 150*l.* to the rest of the crew of the Athlete, the amount to be distributed amongst them in like manner. I see no reason why more than one set of costs should be allowed to the plaintiffs.

Proctors for the owners, master, mate, and some of the crew of the Athlete, Pritchard and Sons.

Solicitor for others of the crew of the Athlete, Eaden.

Solicitors for the owners of the Andrina, Fielder and Sumner.

Administration—Will and copy of later will—No proof of existence of later will.

A testator left a will dated in 1831, and the copy of a will dated 1847, the original of which was not forthcoming. The copy was signed by the testator, but it had not been reattested; and the person who made the copy could not depose to the signature of the testator, nor of the attesting witnesses in the original.

The court held that there was no evidence of the existence of the will of 1847, and granted administration with the will of 1831 annexed.

Wm. Gray, late of Manchester, died Aug. 23, 1863 leaving a will, dated April 18, 1831, and the copy of a will, dated June 4, 1847. Both papers were similar in effect, being in favour of the testator's wife Mrs. Gray. The question was whether the will of 1831 was revoked by the will of 1847, of which only a copy was forthcoming. The circumstances attending the making of that copy were explained in the affidavit of two persons of the name of Scott. About three years before his death, the testator produced to the Scotts a paper writing which he declared to be his will, and which he desired to have copied for him to sign, because as he alleged there was some writing indorsed on the back of it. Thereupon Wm. Scott copied out the will, including the names and descriptions of the attesting witnesses, and the deceased affixed his signature to it, but there was no attestation of the document thus copied.

The original will and the copy were then returned to the testator, and the former was never seen again. Both the attesting witnesses to the will of 1847, one of whom was Mr. Kay, the solicitor of the deceased, have since died, and the Scotts being unacquainted with their signatures, were unable to depose to their handwriting. After the death of the testator in 1865, the widow deposited the will of 1831, and the copy of the will of 1847 in the district registry of the Court of Probate at Manchester, and died in 1869, without having taken out probate of either. It did not appear that any search had been made for the original will of 1847 in the repositories of the testator during the widow's lifetime, but it was made without success after her death, and the offices and papers of Mr. Kay were also unsuccessfully searched for proof of his having made a will for the testator.

The matter now came before the court on the application to grant administration of the effects of the deceased with the will of 1831 annexed, to the executors of the widow the sole universal legatee of the testator under that will. The Scotts in their affidavit stated that they were unable to depose to the handwriting of the testator, and that at the time the copy of the will of 1847 was made the said original will was produced to them by the testator, and declared by him to be his will legally drawn up and signed by him.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Lord PENZANCE. — When this case came before the court there were some defects in the papers, but since then the particulars which were wanting have been supplied. The testator made his will many years ago before the Wills Act, and no doubt that will is still existing as a valid will unless revoked. The mode in which it is said it may have been revoked is by a subsequent will of 1847. That will is not in existence, and it is said it has been destroyed animo revocandi by the testator. The first question is whether it ever existed as a valid document. Before the court can hold an existing will to have been revoked by another instrument it must be satisfied that that instrument has existed, and that it was a valid document. The paper itself is not in existence, and all the court knows about it is, that shortly before his death the testator called on two people of the name of Scott, and asked one of them to write a copy of a paper, which he called his will. Wm. Scott says he did duly copy out the paper. The copy before the court is all in the handwriting of Scott, and it is apparently a will, with the names of two attesting witnesses. Scott did not copy the name of the testator, the statement being that the testator wished to sign the will, and that he thought that, by having a copy made with the names of two attesting witnesses, and by signing that copy, he could make it a good will. Clearly that cannot be so. The question is whether there is evidence of the original will having existed as a valid will. Scott does not state that he is able to depose to the original paper being signed in the handwriting of the testator, nor does he depose to the handwriting of the attesting witnesses. The result is this, the court has before it a paper, apparently with the name of the testator and the name of two attesting witnesses. But there is no proof of the handwriting, only a statement by the testator to the Scotts that he did make a will. I am constrained to say that this does not appear to the court to be satisfactory evidence of the existence of the will of 1847. It has already been held at common law, that the statement a testator makes is not evidence. There is a question which will have to be considered at some future period, because there will be cases in which it will be impossible to exclude the evidence of testators. But it has been held up to the present time that these statements are inadmissible. But supposing the statement of the testator in this case had been in evidence, does it go far enough? I think not. The court ought to have some evidence besides the statement of the testator as to the will having been duly signed by these two people as attesting witnesses. I think, therefore, the proof of the will of 1847 having been in existence fails altogether, and without that the other questions connected with the case fail also. Nothing appears to me to stand in the way of the original will of 1831 being admitted to probate.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF MICHIGAN—IN ADMIRALTY

HOME INSURANCE COMPANY v. PROP CONCORD.

Bonded vessel—Jurisdiction of court—Right of mortgagee to intervene pendente lite.

A bonded vessel was remanded to the custody of a marshal of a Court of Admiralty, on the ground that the sureties had become insolvent since the bond was given:

Held, that a mortgagee might intervene, pendente lite, to obtain the discharge of the vessel:

Held, further (following The Kalamazoo, 15 Jur. 885), that a vessel once released on bond cannot be again arrested in the same suit, and that the order remanding the vessel into custody was bad.

The only remedy where sureties become insolvent is to apply to the court for an order requiring new sureties to be given.

The following judgment, which explains the case, was delivered by

LONGYEAR, J.—In this case the propeller was arrested Nov. 10, 1868, and bonded on the same day by John Hutchings, claimant, with two sureties. Dec. 18, 1868, Hutchings mortgaged the propeller to Eber B. Ward, who has intervened pendente lite, setting up his mortgage as the basis of his right to intervene. July 5, 1869, an order was entered in this court, remanding the propeller to the custody of the marshal, on the ex parte application of the libellants, on the ground that the sureties had become insolvent since the bond was given. Ward now moves to vacate the order so remanding the propeller on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the vessel after she was so bonded, and therefore had no power to make the order. It is contended, on behalf of libellants, that Ward has no standing in court, he being a mortgagee merely, and not the owner or an agent, consignee or bailee, or the owner, as required by rule twenty-six. Rule twenty-six has been considerably altered and enlarged, if not entirely superseded by the Act of March 3, 1847, (9 Stat. 181.) But the rule and the Act relate exclusively to the conditions to be complied with to entitle a claimant to avoid an arrest of the property or to obtain its discharge after it shall have been arrested, and not to conditions necessary to entitle a party to intervene pendente lite, to participate in the distribution of proceeds, or to protect any interest he may have in the subject-matter of the litigation. The right of a party to intervene for these purposes has been recognised both in England and in this country as extending to judgment-creditors who have acquired a lien, and also to attaching creditor: (See 1 Conk, Ad. 55, 66-70, citing The Flora; 1 Haggard R., 298, 303; Ware's R. 204; The Mary Ann, decided by Judge Ware, in the District Court for the District of Maine.) This being so, what reason can there be why a mortgagee should not be admitted to intervene for protection of his own interest, and contest a forfeiture so far as his right or interest would be prejudiced by the decree? I can see none. I am therefore clearly of the opinion that Ward is properly admitted to intervene as mortgagee, and consequently that he has a right to make this motion and to be heard upon it. The next and remaining question is as to the validity of the order remanding the vessel. I shall not stop to argue the question. It seems to be too well settled, both in this country and in England, to need further elucidation, that the vessel, on being discharged from arrest upon the giving of the bond or stipulation, returns into the hands of her owner, discharged from the lien or incumbrance which constituted the foundation of the proceedings against her for ever, and for all purposes whatsoever, the surety taken being as a substitution for the vessel, and the court has no power or jurisdiction over her thereafter in the same suit or for the same cause: (The Union, 4 Blatch. C. C. R. 90,93; The White Squall, ibid 102; The Kalamazoo, 15 Jur. 885.) No question of fraud, mistake, or improvidence in entering into the bond or discharging the vessel arises in this case, and therefore need not be considered. The only remedy that seems to be provided in a case where the sureties shall become insolvent, is an application to the court for an order requiring new sureties to be given. Disobedience to such order would put the party in contempt, and he could be proceeded against accordingly, and be denied the right further to appear and contest the suit until he complied with the order, or otherwise purged his contempt: (Adm. Rule 6; Ben. Adm. sec. 492; Conk. Adm. 112). I am therefore of opinion that the court had no power to make the order remanding the vessel into the custody of the Marshal, and the motion to vacate the same must be granted.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND v. HOUGHTON AND OTHERS.

Several fishery—Tidal river—Royal franchises—Forfeiture—Prerogative—Merger—Markets, free warren, waifs, wreck, &c.—Time immemorial—Grant before Magna Charta—Presumption of, from modern user—Statute of Limitations—Proper mode of directing a jury—Evidence.

A several fishery in the waters of the river Tyne, the immemorial existence, and, consequently, the legal origin of which, by an original grant from the Crown to the prior and monks of the monastery of Tynemouth, anterior to Magna Charta, was proved, was claimed by the plaintiff: and, it being proved on the trial that, subsequently to Magna Charta, temp. Edw. 1, "certain liberties and free usages," claimed by the prior and his predecessors, "had been adjudged by the king's court to have been forfeited," the defendants contended that the fishery in question came within the terms "liberties and free usages," and so had merged on reverting to the Crown by forfeiture, and could not be re-granted:

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Martin and Pigott, BB.), that the plaintiff had a sufficient title to the several fishery to enable him to maintain trespass against the defendants.

Evidence of actual user and enjoyment, by a plaintiff, of a right of several fishery in a tidal river for 110 years prior to action brought, is, of itself alone, satisfactory evidence upon which a jury, if not actually called upon to presume, would be amply justified in presuming that the right had existed from time immemorial, and, consequently, that there must have been a valid grant of the fishery by the Crown anterior to Magna Charta; and it lies on the defendant, who questions the right to establish either that the fishery was, in fact, created since the time of legal memory and Magna Charta, or that, at some period subsequent thereto, no such fishery was in existence.

By Kelly C.B. and Pigott B., there was no evidence of forfeiture of the fishery subsequently to Magna Charta, a several fishery being a franchise which could not, in common parlance, or legally, be held to be included within the words "liberties and free usages," and therefore the question of merger did not arise.

*By Martin, B. (and, semble also, if the question of merger had arisen and it had been necessary to decide the point, by Kelly, C.B. and Pigott, B.), a several fishery, granted by the Crown before Magna Charta, does not merge in the Crown upon reverting to the king by forfeiture or otherwise, it being a franchise in the same category with fairs, markets, warrens, "et similia," enumerated by Lord Coke as franchises "originally created by the king, and not before flowers in the garland of the Crown, and which therefore, on reverting to the king, remain as they were before in esse, not merged in the Crown," and differing in that respect from franchises such as felons' goods, waifs, estrays, wrecks, &c., which, "being flowers in the garland, are merged in the Crown on reverting to the king, and he has them again in jure coronæ:" (See The Abbot of Strata Marcella's case, 9 Rep. 24a; Heddy v. Wheelhouse, Cro. Eliz. 558-591.)*

*By Martin, B., the proper mode of dealing with such a question, in summing up to the jury, is that pointed out and laid down by Parke, B. in Jenkins v. Harvey, 1 Cr. M. & R. 877; 2 Ib. 407; 5 L. J., N. S., 17 and 21, Ex., and cited with approbation by Blackburn, J. in Sheppard v. Payne, in the Exchequer Chamber, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 194; 16 C. B., N. S., 126; 33 L. J. 158, C. P.*

This was an action of trespass by the plaintiff against the defendant for breaking and entering an alleged several salmon fishery of the plaintiff in the waters of the River Tyne, in the county of Northumberland, and catching and disturbing the fish there. After the commencement of the action, by agreement between the parties and a judge's order, a special case was stated, without pleading, for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, in which the history of the fishery, claimed by the plaintiff, from the time of King William Rufus down to the present day, with the various charters, documents, and other evidence, showing the existence of the fishery in question from before the time of legal memory, and also evidence of the continuous user and enjoyment of it by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title for 110 years prior to the time of action brought, were set out at very great length. The following abridged abstract of the case will be sufficient for the purpose of this report.

Paragraphs 1 to 6: The priory or monastery of Tynemouth, which was in existence in the time of the Saxons, was, early in the reign of William Rufus, endowed by Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, subject to and dependent, as a cell, on the Abbey of St. Albans, and by letters patent of confirmation, by inspeximus of 55 Hen. 3, it appeared that King Henry II. by his charter granted and confirmed to God, and St. Alban, and St. Oswyn, of Tynemouth, and the monks there serving God, the church of Tynemouth, and all the churches, lands, &c. . . . And, moreover, whatsoever Robert, Earl of Northumberland, and his men, had given to the aforesaid church and St. Oswyn. Wherefore he willed and commanded that the church and monks aforesaid should have all the above said freely and quietly, with all their appurtenances in wood and plain, &c. . . . And fisheries, and pools, within borough and without. And they might have their court as fully and freely as he himself had, and as the charters of King William and King Henry, his grandfather, did testify, and he willed that they should maintain and defend the aforesaid church from all injury as his own alms.

7 to 13: By charters of 10 Ric. 1, and 5 John, and two charters of Hen. 3, the priory of Tynemouth was confirmed in all its abovementioned possessions and privileges.

14 and 15: In the 20th Edw. 1 (A.D. 1292) disputes arose touching the rights of the monastery of Tynemouth; and, from the record of the proceedings with reference thereto, it appears that the burgesses of Newcastle instituted a suit in the King's Court against the prior of the monastery, and, by the King's attorney, complained that the prior had made a port and forestalled the merchandise, and had had raised a new town of Sheeles; and taken there wreck which belonged to the king, and prisages and customs from vessels of wine, and from vessels and boats of seafish, and had raised weirs at Tynemouth, and had a market there, and took amendment of bread and ale without warrant. The prior, by his answer, as to wreck and forestalling of merchandise, justified the same by setting out the beforementioned charters of Ric. 1. And as to founding a new town he denied having done so, and said that the king had no soil or freehold there, for that the soil and freehold of the monastery extended into the middle of the water of Tyne, and that between the middle of the water and the lands of the monastery he (the prior) had his free fishery by the length of the same land in the same water; and that he and his predecessors had built houses there, for fishermen and others who had sold bread, ale, and fish, without amends to the king, but only to the same prior; and as to the fishermen and bakers, &c., that his predecessors had their own private fishermen at their pleasure fishing in the water aforesaid, for the support of their house, without paying toll to the king, notwithstanding that the port of the water of Tyne specially and entirely belonged to the king; and that the same have had certain their tenants at Sheeles with their boats free within their demesne lands; and as to the market, he claimed there no market, but there was a tumbrell, and there were bakers and brewers, and ovens for hire, and stalls for putting up bread, &c., for sale.

The burgesses, by the king's attorney replied; and afterwards in 19 Edw. 1., an inquisition was taken before the king's justices in eyre, by the oaths of twelve lawful men, who found against the prior and in favour of the Crown with respect to the matter complained of by the said burgesses in the said suit, and they assessed the damages in respect of the said several matters, and thereupon judgment was given in favour of the Crown; but neither in the replication nor in the judgment was any reference made to the fishery, or the claim of the prior thereto, nor was the right of the prior to such fishery in any way affected by the said judgment.

16: King Edward I., by charter of the 27th year of his reign (A.D. 1299), after reciting that certain liberties and free usages claimed by the prior of Tynemouth and his predecessors, by virtue of their charter, had been adjudged by the king's court to have been forfeited, and were seized into the king's hands, did, for himself and his heirs, restore and yield up all the aforesaid liberties and free usages unto the said prior and monks, to have and to hold, to them and their successors, &c., for ever, as fully, as well in land and water as in other places, as they had and held the same, by virtue of the said charter, before the said seizure.

17 to 33: Set out a commission of 25 Hen. 6, and an inquisition taken under and by virtue thereof respecting certain alleged encroachments and usurpations by the prior of Tynemouth in the soil of the river Tyne, within the flux and reflux of the said river, and also a charter of the 3 Edw. 4 (A.D. 1464), granting and confirming to the Abbot of St. Albans, and to the prior and convent of Tynemouth, and their successors, the rights and privileges in the said charter mentioned; and a charter of confirmation of 2 Hen. 8, setting forth and confirming the aforesaid grant by inspeximus.

34 to 36: In the 30 Hen. 8, the said monastery of Tynemouth, which had previously been granted and confirmed to the king, his heirs, and successors, was dissolved, and all the possessions, estates, and rights belonging to the said monks of St. Albans, which, at the time of the said grants and dissolution respectively, were above the clear yearly value of 200*l.*, became and were vested in the Crown, and by letters patent in the same year (30 Hen. 8), shortly after the dissolution, the site of the said monastery, with its demesne and other lands and hereditaments to the late monastery formerly appertaining, together with (inter alia) "the tithes of fish of all vessels and boats fishing at the Shelths, in Tynemouth, parcel of the rectory of Tynemouth," were demised by the Crown to Sir Thomas Hylton, for 21 years, at certain reserved yearly rents.

37 to 46: Accounts of the said fishery were, from time to time, during the reigns of Hen. 8 and Eliz., rendered into the Exchequer, and in accounts for the year 31 Hen. 8, one of the accountants (the said Sir Thomas Hylton) answered for "the ferm of the site of the said priory, demesne, lands, tithes, and other commodities," and in the account of another of the accountants, one Thomas Johns. there is the following entry:—

Ferm of Salt pans with a Fishery.—Of the ferm of the salmon fishery in the salt waters within the bounds of the township of Sheeles and Tynemouth, he (the accountant) answers not here, because the fishermen there are bound to deliver for every 20 salmon so taken, one fish to the hands of the bailiff there, by ancient custom, and no such fishing hath been made or had by the time aforesaid.

And in an account rendered for the 20 Eliz. there is the following (amongst other entries):—

North Sheeles.—The account of Robert Arderne, bailiff there, of any profit arising from the ferm of the salmon fishery in the salt waters, within the bounds of the town of Sheeles and Tynemouth, where the tenants of the town ought to answer for every twenty salmon one salmon. For the time of this account he doth not answer, because no such fish have been taken within the bounds aforesaid during the same time.

Again, at the conclusion of a survey of the Manor of Tynemouth (12 Jac. 1, A.D., 1608), there is the following note.

"ITEM. There is a fishing for salmon there in the water of the Tyne, extending from the mouth of the river, where Tyne falleth into the sea, into Howden Head, near the territories of Willington, for which there hath been anciently paid 3*s.* 4*d.* by the year."

And by letters patent, 7 Jac. 1. (A.D. 1610), certain messuages, &c., in North Sheeles together with a salmon fishery described as "Our Salmon Fishery, in the water of Tyne, aforesaid extending from a place where the water of Tyne, aforesaid, falls into the sea, unto a place called Howden Head, near the territory of Willington, for which no rent is now answered but of the yearly value of 8*s.* 4*d.*," parcel of our manor of Tynemouth, and to the late monastery of Tynemouth aforesaid formerly belonging, and late parcel of the lands and possession thereof were granted by the King to Watkinson and Helme, for 21 years, at reserved yearly rents, and by letters patent, 21 Jac. 1. (A.D. 1624), parcel of the possession of the said late monastery were granted by the King in fee, to Henry, Earl of Northumberland, an ancestor of the plaintiff, without any express mention of any fishery, but with the usual general words, and amongst them the words "all and singular fisheries and fishings to the aforesaid messuages and lands, &c. belonging or appertaining."

47 to 71. By letters patent, 1 Car. 1 (1625) the king granted to Edward Ramsey and Robert Ramsey, their heirs and assigns, at a rent (inter alia) "A salmon fishery," described as "all that salmon fishery in the water of Tyne, extending from the place where the water of Tyne falls into the sea unto a place called Howden Head, near the territory of Willington aforesaid," and mentioned to have been devised to William Watkinson and, Henry Helme, and to have been parcel of the lands and premises of the Monastery of Tynemouth; and by indenture of bargain and sale, 15th Feb. 1637 (13 Car. 1), "all those fishings for salmon in the water of Tyne aforesaid, extending from the place where the water of Tyne falls into the sea unto the place called Howden Head aforesaid," with the appurtenances, were (inter alia) granted by the said Robert Ramsey (who had survived the said Edward Ramsey) unto George and William Milburn, their heirs and assigns, in fee farm rent, for ever, from whom, by a series of transmissions by deed, the said fishery passed into the hands of various successive owners, until, by indenture of 2nd May, 1759, it became the property of Hugh Earl of Northumberland, his heirs and assigns for ever, by the description of "all those fisheries or rights of fishing, piscaries, and fishing places in the river Tyne, at the Low Lights near Clifford's Port," with all appurtenances; and in settlements executed by the descendants of those claiming under the said Hugh Earl (afterwards Duke) of Northumberland, since the date of the last-mentioned indenture to the present time, a salmon fishery is mentioned and comprised, and is described as "all that salmon fishery in the river Tyne near adjoining to Tynemouth and North Shields, purchased by the said duke of Mr. Hall."

There was evidence set out in the remaining paragraphs of the case of the exclusive user, occupation, and enjoyment of the fishery in question, as a several fishery, by the plaintiff and his predecessors from 1759 to the commencement of the present action, being a period of 110 years. The trespass and grievance complained of were admitted if, upon the facts above stated, the plaintiff was entitled to a fishery in the said river.

The court were to have the same power of drawing inferences of fact that a jury would have; and the question for the court's opinion was whether, under the circumstances stated, the plaintiff had a sufficient title to a several fishery in the river Tyne to enable him to maintain the action?

Mellish, Q.C. (with him were Manisty, Q.C., and Pinder) for the plaintiff: It is impossible for the defendants successfully to contend, in the face of the overwhelming documentary evidence set out and referred to in the special case, that the several fishery in question had not a legal origin long anterior to Magna Charta, and going back beyond the time of legal memory applicable to such a question; and again, the evidence of continuous user and enjoyment of the fishery by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title for a period of 110 years prior to action brought, was equally conclusive and overwhelming on that point. But the defendants will seek to meet the plaintiff's case by urging that the fishery was forfeited and reverted to the Crown in the time of King Edward, or upon the dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII., and so had merged. But in the first place there is no distinct or sufficient evidence of the alleged forfeiture (temp. Edw. 1), and secondly, the doctrine of merger is not applicable to such a franchise as a several fishery. It is not within the range of the "liberties and free usages" found in the case to have been forfeited in Edward I.'s time. Such "liberties and free usages," are more analogous to wrecks, estrays, and felons' goods, &c., which on the forfeiture of the manor would belong to the king in jure coronæ, and not as lord of the manor; but a free or several fishery is in the same category with free warrens, markets and fairs, with toll, &c., which do not merge or become extinct by the accession or reversion of them to the Crown. For this proposition the case of The Abbot of Stratu Marcella, 9 Rep. 24 A, is a direct and decisive authority. See also Com. Dig. tit. "Franchises" G. 1. With regard to the alleged merger at the dissolution of the monastery, the Act of 32 Hen. 8, c. 20, reviving in the Crown all the late privileges and franchises of the abbots, &c., would operate to prevent any such merger.

Pickering, Q.C. (with him Gainsford Bruce), for the defendants. This fishery, with all other liberties and franchises of the priory, was forfeited, and consequently merged in the Crown, temp. Edw. 1 at a period subsequent to Magna Charta, since which there could be no new creation or grant of a several fishery. See Hale de Portibus Maris, pl. 2, Hale de Jure Maris, c. 2, p. 7, and c. 4; 4th Institute p. 300; Bro. Abr. "Quo warranto," pl. 9, 11. There being no direct authority on the express point, recourse must be had to principle. It could work no injury to the Crown who, upon resuming possession of a several fishery, had power immediately afterwards to recreate it, even in water where the soil belonged to a private individual; differing, it is submitted, in this respect from a free warren, which could not be created by the Crown, in invitum, in a subject's lands; though, upon consent of the proprietor of the soil being obtained, there would be no merger of the recreated warren, on its reverting to the Crown, since it is not the property of the Crown by virtue of the prerogative; but the Crown had an interest of pleasure in these fisheries as part of its prerogative, as is stated by Hale. There is no analogy between it and a warren: (Rogers v. Allen, 1 Campb. 310.) The Abbot of Strata Marcella's case is distinguishable and not applicable here as being decided on the terms of 32 Hen. 8, c. 20; but, if not so, there is no similarity or analogy between a fishery and a warren,—the former resembling more closely other franchises, such as wreck, waifs, estrays, &c., which admittedly merge upon reverting to the Crown, and so become extinct. KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. His claim is to a several fishery in the tidal waters of the river Tyne, and, in support of it he has clearly proved that he and his ancestors have been in the actual possession (so far as that term can be applied to an incorporeal hereditament) and enjoyment of the fishery from 1759 to the present time. Now, this evidence alone of the actual user and enjoyment of a right of this nature for 110 years, would, if the case rested there, be satisfactory evidence upon which a jury, if not absolutely called upon to presume, would be amply justified in presuming that the right to the fishery had existed from time immemorial, and, consequently that there must have been some valid grant of it by the Crown anterior to Magna Charta. But, the case does not rest there. It appears by paragraphs 37, 38, and 39 and several subsequent paragraphs of the special case, that from the year 1540, at least, a fishery in these waters had been actually in existence and had been used and enjoyed (but for a short time only) by King Henry VIII., and afterwards by the several persons, grantees of the Crown, or claiming title to it, from Henry VIII. The first mention of a free fishery, or a several fishery, by that name and clearly describing the fishery in question, as now claimed, is in the above named three paragraphs, where it appears, by the minister's accounts, rendered to the Exchequer, temp. 31 Hen. 8., that one of the accountants answers for the ferm of the site of the said priory, demesne lands, tithes, and other commodities by the yearly rent reserved to the Crown. And in the account of another accountant is the following entry: "North Sheeles. The account of Thomas Johns, bailiff there for the time aforesaid, Ferm of salt pans, with a fishery. Of the ferm of the salmon fishery in the salt waters, within the bounds of the township of Sheeles and Tynemouth, he (the accountant) answers not." And he gives reasons for not answering, which, in effect, would go to show that the fishery was actually enjoyed by fishermen, who were bound to render for every twenty salmon, one fish to the bailiff. I refer to that, to show that at that time a fishery existed, and was enjoyed in these waters. As early, therefore, as 1540, we find there was a fishery existing which must have been a several fishery of the nature, as well as in the same water as that now claimed by the plaintiff. Again, in 1608 (6 Jac. 1), a survey was made, and among the items we find this:—"There is a fishery for salmon in the water of the Tyne, extending from the mouth of the river, where Tyne falleth into the sea, unto Howden Head, near the territories of Willington," and so forth. That carries us from the year 1540 (31 Hen. 8) to 1608 (6 Jas. 1). Again we find in 1610, two years afterwards, in the reign of the same last-named king, by letters patent, the "salmon fishery in the waters of Tyne aforesaid" (describing it by its limits) as "extending from a place where the waters of Tyne aforesaid fall into the sea, unto a place called Howden Head, near the territory of Willington, for which no rent is now answered, but of the yearly value of 3s. 4d; and all which said premises are therein described as being parcel of our manor of Tynemouth, in our said county of Northumberland, and to the late monastery of Tynemouth aforesaid, formerly belonging and appertaining, and late were parcel of the lands and possessions thereof." Here there is direct and incontrovertible proof that this fishery, as now claimed, existed in 1610; that during the reign of James I. it had existed and was the property of the monastery before its dissolution, and that upon that event it had passed into the hands of other parties from and through whom it passed to the plaintiff's ancestor. That is prima facie, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, conclusive evidence that this fishery existed by law and according to law before the time of legal memory, and, consequently, before Magna Charta. The proposition then being established that this fishery existed under some valid and lawful grant before the time of legal memory and Magna Charta, it lies upon the defendants, who question the right of the plaintiff to the fishery, to establish one of two propositions, either that this fishery (though upon the evidence it may be presumed to have existed before) was in fact created since the time of legal memory and Magna Charta, and so could not be lawfully created, but of such a fact as that there is no evidence whatever; or, that at some period subsequent to Magna Charta no such fishery was in existence, in which case it could have come into existence at such subsequent period only by the grant of the Crown to the subject, which grant, being contrary to Magna Charta, would be void in law. How then does the case stand with regard to that? We find prima facie and presumptive evidence of the fishery being not only in existence, but of long actual user and enjoyment of it for 330 years and more; and on looking at the documents we find, in the first place, that the priory or monastery of Tynemouth was in existence in Saxon times; and that as early as the reign of William Rufus, "the priory was endowed by Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, subject to and dependent as a cell upon the Abbey of St. Albans, in the county of Herts." Now it is quite possible, though we have not the express words, properly to be a grant of this fishery, in the charter of William Rufus, that it may have been granted thereby, and coupling with that possibility, even if it be no more, the evidence to which I have adverted of a user of 330 years and upwards, we may fairly presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that this fishery was granted by William Rufus to the predecessors, whosoever they may have been, of the present Duke of Northumberland, the plaintiff in this suit. Then we come to the next document, the letters patent of confirmation by inspeximus of 55 Hen. 3., which, of course, if they had purported to grant the fishery at that date, would have had no such effect in law. But they state "that King Henry the Second, by his charter, granted and confirmed to God and St. Alban and St. Oswin of Tynemouth, and the monks that serve God, the Church of Tynemouth, and all the churches, lands and tithes, and other tenures, to the same appertaining; that is to say, Wyteley and Setun, and Sihal," &c., and then, after a number of other matters, we find this: "These things above said, and moreover whatever Robert Earl of Northumberland and his men have given to the aforesaid Church and Saint Oswyn, &c., hath been, or shall be in future, reasonably given to the same by any donor whomsoever, He, the said King, granted and confirmed to the same in perpetual alms;" and then come these general words, that the church aforesaid and the monks "should have and hold all the things above said well and in peace, freely and quietly, wholly and honourably, with all their appurtenances, in wood and plain, in meadows and feedings, in ways and paths, in waters and mills, and fisheries and pools," &c. And then follow some other general words. It is quite true that that is not a direct grant of the fishery; but it clearly recognises that in former grants at least there may have been a fishery; and when we couple that with the charter of William Rufus, and again with the long user and enjoyment of 330 years and more, it is fair to presume that this, although not a direct grant of the fishery, yet with the charter of confirmation of lands, manors, and other possessions, included that as granted, which was granted incidentally. Passing through the whole of the documents, we come to the question whether there is any one of them (it is not necessary to go through the whole of them) which, either in distinct terms or by necessary implication, raises even a presumption that at any time, subject to Magna Charta, this fishery did not de facto exist? I can find nothing upon which even an argument can be suggested to that effect, unless it be in the document set forth first in the appendix to the case—namely, the “abstract of the record of the proceedings between King Edward I. and the burgesses of Newcastle, and the prior of Tynemouth.” It certainly appears there that “the prior answered in the said suit as to wreck of the sea and forestalling of merchandise by setting out the charter of Ric. I.” (referred to in par. 8 of this case), and then as to founding the new town at Sheeles, and so forth, he denied that he had encroached upon the rights of the king in any way in those respects. Then he went on to say that “the king had no soil or freehold there, for that the soil and freehold of the monastery extended into the middle of the water of the Tyne, and that between the middle of the water and the land of the monastery he had his free fishery by the length of the same land in the same water, and that he and his predecessors had built houses there for fishermen and others, who had sold bread, ale, and fish without making any amends to the king, but only to the said prior,” and then proceeded further with his answer. In the first place, the suit was instituted for certain purposes which are clearly expressed and defined, and the claim was not for the fishery. There was no question raised as to the right of the monks or the monastery to the fishery, and if there had been any general words in the decree, or in what was insisted upon by the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, tending to negative the right of the prior to this fishery, it would have scarcely amounted to a satisfactory answer to this claim. But what was then claimed was not anything touching the fishery, but “that the prior had made a port and had forestalled merchandise, and had raised a new town, at Sheeles, and took there wreck of the sea, which belonged to the king, and took prisages and customs from vessels of wine, and from vessels and boats of sea fish, and so deprived the king of his prisages and customs, and that he “had raised four ovens at Tynemouth, and had a market there, and took amendment of bread and ale without warrant.” Now all these things were encroachments upon the royal prerogative, or something which the king might have granted to the burgesses of Newcastle, but it involved no claim to the fishery which is now in question before this court. But upon looking further at the replication of the Attorney-General, and at the decree, or judgment in the case, and upon which the jury assessed damages, we find that which satisfies me that the claim to the fishery was in no way interfered with, but rather, on the contrary, that it was indirectly and by implication admitted. First of all, the prior, on behalf of the monastery, had claimed the land from high water-mark to the middle of the river, and had claimed also the free fishery now in question; the Attorney-General replied that the prior had in Sheeles sixteen fishermen or more fishing with great boats in the sea through the year for the sake of trading, and not for the sake of supplying his house, from whom the king did not receive any toll or his due custom, and also that the prior “had caused to be made the twenty-six houses upon the soil, which ought to belong to the king, because it was included in the flow and overflow of the sea,” and therefore the Attorney-General denied the right of the monastery to the soil, in the flow and overflow of the sea, but he did not anywhere, either expressly or by implication, deny the right of the said monastery to the fishery which the prior had incidentally only, but yet in full, clear, and express terms, claimed in his answer to the suit. Then in the decree or judgment we find nothing at all touching the claim to the fishery, which had appeared in express terms on the record. The paragraph concludes thus: “concerning herrings and haddocks and other fish, they said that so many fishermen and other men are dwelling there, that sailors and fishermen landing there found so much demand for their merchandise, that they unloaded their vessels and sold their fish, whereby the king lost his prisages.” That is, fishermen who took fish in the river or sea, came and sold them upon the land, upon what afterwards became the town of Shields or Tynemouth, and so the king lost his prisages. But that has nothing to do with the fishery or the claim to it. The judgment then proceeds thus: “and as to founding the town of North Shields, they said that certain houses were built there on the lands of the king, and that certain other houses built between the bourne and the flood marks on the soil of the said priory were there, which had quays built beyond the flood marks on the soil of the king, and the jury assessed the damages in respect of the said several matters.” That is, they assessed that the soil between high water mark and the middle of the river was then the property of the king. So it may have been, and so it probably was; but there was no reference direct or indirect to any right in the Crown or burgesses, or anybody else to the fishery in question. As far as the record of the proceedings taken altogether applies, or can be made applicable to the present case, there is, in the answer of the prior of the monastery, a clear and distinct claim to the fishery now in question before this court, and no reply denying that claim, and no judgment at all relating to it, although there is a judgment against the prior as to other allegations and other claims made in the course of the proceedings. As to this document, therefore, which is the only document I can find, from the beginning to the end of this case, upon which even an argument can be suggested that the fishery was not in existence except in the Crown at some period subsequently to Magna Charta, I find, not only that that is not the fair inference to be drawn from the whole of it taken together, but that the contrary presumption arises, namely, a presumption that the prior who claimed the fishery at that very early period, was then entitled to it by law. We find then, that there has been the actual user and enjoyment of this fishery for more than 330 years; that there are documents in existence before Magna Charta, and before the time of legal memory, under which the fishery may have been granted by the Crown to the predecessors in title of the present plaintiff, and that there is no evidence whatever of an original grant of the fishery subsequently to Magna Charta, or that at any period between Magna Charta and the present time, this fishery did not de facto exist, and was not de facto enjoyed. This really brings me to the end of the case with the exception of the sole remaining question of merger. Now as to that, it has been contended that, by law, a several fishery is parcel of the prerogative of the Crown, and though it might have been lawfully granted away to a subject before Magna Charta, yet if, after that Act of Parliament, it reverted to the Crown, whether by forfeiture or any other legal means of transmission, that it would then become merged in the Royal prerogative and extinguished. Now before we could accede to that doctrine, and admit it to be a sound and true proposition of law, I certainly, speaking for myself, should desire to pause and consider what the effect of a decision to that effect of a court of law in Westminster Hall would be upon a great number of titles to valuable fisheries in many parts of the kingdom, I do not say that the mere circumstance that the title to fisheries which have been held and enjoyed for centuries by descent, or otherwise, by various families in the kingdom, would be thereby made defective, would justify us in rejecting that which we were satisfied, upon argument and authority, was a sound proposition of law. But it is certainly well to consider whether such a proposition is so incontrovertibly established upon authority that we are bound to accept it, and make it the foundation of our decision in the present case. In the first place, however, I do not see any satisfactory evidence at all that this fishery ever did revert to, or ever was in the possession or enjoyment of, the Crown subsequent to Magna Charta until the dissolution of the monasteries in the time of Henry VIII. It is stated in paragraph 16 that King Edward I., by his charter of the twenty-seventh year of his reign (A.D. 1299), recites that "certain liberties and free usages claimed by the Prior of Tyne-mouth and his predecessors by virtue of their charters had been adjudged by the King's Court to have been forfeited." But in a case in which the decision we are called on to pronounce would go to shake the title to perhaps half the fisheries in the kingdom, I do not think we should give an effect to the words "certain liberties and free usages" which does not necessarily follow from the language used, and which language seems to me to point rather to the contrary conclusion. No doubt, there may be "liberties and free usages" of various kinds, and which may be forfeited; but I do not think that a several fishery granted by the Crown to a subject before Magna Charta can be taken in common parlance, or be held in law, to be included within the terms "liberties and free usages." I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that there is no evidence that this fishery ever did revert to the Crown until the reign of Henry VIII. As our attention has been called to the several conditions upon which it was contended that a free fishery, when it reverted to the Crown, merged in the prerogative, I may observe that, looking to the description of rights and franchises, which have been decided to be extinguished by merger in the prerogative, upon coming, back from a subject into the possession of the Crown and without intending to pronounce any final and decisive opinion upon the subject, that it certainly appears to me that such rights and franchises are waifs, estrays, wreck, and such like, and do not include a several fishery, which does not, in my opinion, at all range itself within them. Those rights or properties which have been held not to be merged in the Crown, are free warrens, markets with tolls, and fairs, et similia, whilst those which have been held to merge, are waifs, estrays, wrecks, felons' goods, &c., and certainly if I were called upon I should be inclined to hold that a several fishery, granted by the Crown to a subject before Magna Charta, would rather range itself within "free warrens, markets with tolls, and fairs," and so forth, than within the other franchises to which I have before alluded. But it is unnecessary to decide that question. If, therefore, the right of the plaintiff to the fishery is established by the evidence already referred to of this long user and enjoyment, and is not met by any evidence on the part of the defendants to the effect that it was originally granted by the Crown to a subject subsequently to Magna Charta, or that there was any period of time between Magna Charta and the dissolution of the monasteries in which this fishery was proved not to exist, I am of opinion that the right was clearly established, that the objection on the ground of merger in the prerogative cannot prevail, and that the plaintiff, consequently, is entitled to the judgment of the court.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action of trespass brought by the Duke of Northumberland against the defendants for breaking and entering his several salmon fishery in the river Tyne, and catching and disturbing the fish therein. The case has been argued with very great ability on both sides, and Mr. Pickering, on behalf of the defendants, has fully brought before us, and with the greatest candour and fairness, everything that could be urged on their behalf. He has dealt with the real difficulties of the case, and has not relied on mere extrinsic matter, which would have been unsatisfactory when the real facts of the case came to be known. By so arguing a case counsel greatly assist those who have to adjudicate upon it, and are entitled to every consideration which the court can give. I should state for myself, that I should not have been prepared to have delivered my judgment in this case immediately after the conclusion of the argument, had it not been that my attention has been very much called to the same question, within the last six months, in a case before this court, in which the Duke of Manchester, as the plaintiff, claimed a toll of 2d. upon every beast sold in the market of St. Ives. That was a claim depending substantially upon the same principle as the present case. It certainly seems a strange and anomalous thing that although by the law of England twenty years' possession would give to the Duke of Northumberland an absolute right to the soil of the river Tyne, which by reason of the Statute of Limitations could not be disputed, yet it has been a matter of controversy before us to-day whether an exclusive possession for 110 years of this fishery in the waters of that river does or not give him a title to such fishery. That does seem to be a very great anomaly, and a matter which, if possible, ought, I think, to be put upon a different footing. It may be accounted for thus. The only Statute of Limitations which affects property like a fishery, a market, or a toll, &c. is one which passed in the reign of Edward I., and no subsequent Statute of Limitations has affected such franchises. But in dealing with land we have a Statute of Limitations passed in the reign of King William IV., whilst, with respect to tithes, we find a Statute of Limitations passed in the reign of George IV.; but when we come to deal with a fishery or a toll, we must go back to the Statute of Limitations passed at a time when the period of limitation was made to run from certain well-known events; and the Statute of Limitations upon which this case depends is the return of King Richard I. from the Holy Land, after his great military performances there, and after his imprisonment by the Duke of Austria on his way home, which were events no doubt well known to all the people of this country. So that, in dealing with such cases as the present, we have to go back from living memory to so remote a period of time as the return of King Richard I. from Palestine. It seems to me that the proper mode of dealing with such a question is that which is pointed out by the late Lord Wensleydale (then Parke, B.) In the case to which I have referred, in the course of the argument, of Jenkins v. Harvey (1 Cr. M. & R. 877; 5 L. J., N. S., Ex. 17), Alderson, B., at the conclusion of his judgment in that case (p. 895), says: "If an uninterrupted usage of upwards of seventy years, unanswered by any evidence to the contrary, is not enough to establish a right like the present" (that was with reference to a toll in the harbour of Truro), "there are innumerable titles which could not be sustained." I am sure it may be well said that if the exclusive occupation of this fishery by the Duke of Northumberland and his lessees and licencees for 110 years cannot establish a right to this fishery, a vast quantity of this kind of property would be gone. It seems to me that we ought to give to this, and every case of the kind, great, if not conclusive weight, to such a long period of possession. But I will adopt the rule laid down by Parke, B. in the case to which I have just referred. Now, that learned judge there says (1 Cr. M. & R. 894): "The correct mode of presenting the point to the jury would have been that from the uninterrupted modern usage they should find the immemorial existence of the payment, unless evidence be given to the contrary." "That," he goes on to say, "is the ordinary mode in which such questions are left to a jury; and it is very important that the rule should be observed, not only with respect to claims like the present, but also with regard to various public exemptions depending upon usage, such as a modus and similar rights. The learned judge, however, did not so leave the case to the jury. He told them merely that he was not aware that there was any rule of law to prevent them from presuming the immemorial existence of the right from the modern usage; but he did not advise them that they ought to make such presumption unless some evidence to the contrary appeared." And, in commenting on that case, Blackburn, J., in his judgment in the case of Sheppard v. Payne, in the Exchequer Chamber (at p. 135 of 16 C. B., N. S.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 194; 33 L. J. 160, C. P.), says, "The true rule seems to be laid down by Lord Wensleydale (then Parke, B.) in Jenkins v. Harvey, 1 Cr. M. & R. 877, where he says that the correct mode to direct a jury is to tell them that, from uninterrupted modern usage, they should find the immemorial existence of the payment (if that be necessary for its validity), unless some evidence be given to the contrary; or, as he says, on delivering the written judgment of the court, in the second trial of the case, 2 Cr. M. & R. 407 (5 L. J., N. S., 21, Ex.), from proof that an office existed in 1752, the jury may and ought to presume it to be prescriptive if that be necessary to make it valid, unless the contrary be proved." Blackburn, J., goes on to say, "The claim in that case (Jenkins v. Harvey) was by the corporation of Truro for a metage due of 4d. per chaldron of coals in that port, and it was supported. I mention this as showing what is meant by the latter part of the sentence quoted. I suppose neither the Barons of the Exchequer, nor the jury as antiquaries, believed that 4d. per chaldron was actually paid before Richard I. returned from the Holy Land; but the modern user was enough to cast upon the other side the onus of proving that it was a usurpation." I apprehend the present case must be dealt with in the manner stated by Parke, B. Now, it appears that in the conveyance of this property, now claimed by the plaintiff, a predecessor in title to the duke, it is described simply as "the fishery at Low Lights." But after the Duke of Northumberland purchased it in 1759, he immediately dealt with it in a different way, and it is always competent by extrinsic evidence to show the subject-matter of the grant. He, so long ago as 1760, which is now 110 years ago, described it as a fishery extending "from where the Pow Burn enters the Tyne, to the centre of the Tyne, and down to the place near to the bar," and therefore I apprehend, when it is found that he had been in possession for an immense number of years, the rule of Parke, B. is immediately let in, and it is incumbent upon the defendants to show that the fishery could not by possibility have existed at the time when the period of legal memory commenced. It may be taken, then, that the Duke of Northumberland had for 110 years exclusive use of this fishery, and what evidence do the defendants produce to show that it could not exist? So far from their adducing any, it seems to me that the evidence in this case is as strong as possible to show that the fishery did exist, and my real belief is that it did exist before the time of legal memory, and did exist in the abbot, or prior, or monastery, at Tyne-mouth. Now, what is the history of it? In the year 1637, upwards of 200 years ago, it is described in paragraph 50 as a fishery contained in the river, exactly as it is described now. It is true it was a fishery from the mouth of the river up to Howden Pans; but Mr. Pickering said to-day, and most correctly, that, where a person had a fishery from Howden Pans down to the mouth of the river, it was competent for him to divide it, and grant a portion of it, as was done by the then owner, from whom the Duke of Northumberland claims. It seems to me that that paragraph in the grant of King Charles I. had a strong tendency to show the existence of this right. Then we find in par. 47, the fishery described in express terms as a fishery "from Howden Pans down to the mouth of the river." We find it so far back as the reign of Elizabeth; and it is dealt with as a fishery while in the hands of the Crown, and dealt with as distinct from the other property. Then it is established that in the reign of William Rufus, Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, gave this property to the monks of Tynemouth Castle; and as early as the reign of Henry III., we find that "the lands which had been granted by the Earl of Northumberland and his men, to the aforesaid Church and St. Oswyn, were granted by the King and confirmed to the church." My real belief is that this was a portion of the property which did belong to Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, and from his grant came into their possession, and which continued in their possession, or that of their representatives, down to the present time, and that a portion of it is undoubtedly in the possession of the present Duke of Northumberland. I think that it is not merely a potential, but an actual state of things, and in my judgment it is the strongest case of title of this kind which I have ever seen or heard proved, and I have had to deal with many such. And now with respect to the question of merger. It seems to me that this case comes directly within the judgment of my Lord Coke in the case of The Abbot of Strata Marcella (9 Rep. 24 a.), and that it is also in precise conformity with the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Popham and the other judges of the Queen's Bench in their judgment, in Heddy v. Wheelhouse (Cro. Eliz. pp. 558, 591). The question in the former case was very much the same as that which is raised on the present occasion. The king (Henry VIII.) had, I take it, seized and laid hands upon that with all the other monasteries; and, according to Lord Coke, it becoming a question whether the intention of the Act of the 32nd Hen. 8, c. 20, was "to advance these possessions;" that is, the possessions which the Crown had got hold of, "as well in valuation as estimation, and to revive actually and really such privileges, liberties, franchises and temporal jurisdictions, which the late owners of the abbies had," &c.; then it is to be considered (he says) "what privileges, liberties, franchises, and jurisdictions were extinct in the Crown by the accession of the said possessions to it." Therefore Lord Coke is dealing with this very identical point in his judgment in that case, namely, the franchises, liberties, and privileges belonging to the abbots, which were merged. Then he proceeds, "And as to that, it is to be known that when the king grants any privileges, liberties, franchises, &c., which were privileges, liberties, or franchises, in his own hands, as parcel of the flowers of his Crown, as bona et catalla felonum fugitivorum, utlagatorum, &c., bona et catalla, raviata, extrahit, deodanda, wreccum maris, &c., within such possessions there, if they come again to the king they are merged in the Crown, and he has them again in jure coronæ" (not merged by reason of going into the land, but by reason of their coming to him in right of the Crown); "and if the wreck or goods waived, estrays, &c., were appendant before to possessions, now the appendancy is extinct, and the king is seised of them in jure coronæ; but when a privilege, liberty, franchise, or jurisdiction was, at the beginning, erected and created by the king, and was not any such flower before in the garland of the Crown, there, by the accession of them again to the Crown, they are not extinct, nor the appendancy of them severed from the possessions; and if a fair, market, hundred leet, park warren, et similia, are appendants to manors or in gross, and afterwards they come back to the king, they remain as they were before, in esse, not merged in the Crown; for they were at first created and newly erected by the king, and were not in esse before, and time and usage has made them appendant, which difference (says Lord Coke) "was agreed per totam curiam." Now, I cannot conceive any two things to be more similar the one to the other than a several fishery and a free warren; the one is an exclusive right to take certain descriptions of birds and animals upon the land, and the other is an exclusive right to take fish in the sea. I am of opinion, therefore, that the present case falls directly within the judgment in the case of The Abbot of Strata Marcella. It seems to me to be the strongest case of the kind that has ever come before me.

PICOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The sole question here, is, whether, under the circumstances above stated, the plaintiff had a sufficient title to a several salmon fishery in the river Tyne, to enable him to maintain the present action. That involves the question whether this has been proved to us in point of fact, taking the law to be correctly laid down, as it has been by my Lord Chief Baron, and my Brother Martin. I agree with the observations of my brother Martin, and think that we are very much indebted to both the learned counsel for the arguments that have taken place upon this case. The real points have been elucidated and presented to us clear of all fallacies and obscurities, which do not arise when the facts come to be understood, and only those objections which really arise upon the case have been taken. There is clear evidence of possession and enjoyment by the Duke of Northumberland of this fishery from the year 1759. Then we find in addition to that, from deeds, documents, and letters patent, which are set forth in the case, that the existence of this fishery is shown from the year 1540. The long user which has been thus shown, raises the presumption of a legal origin prior to Magna Charta, and the question then is, whether there is anything, either in point of fact, or upon the true construction of the documents, to rebut that presumption. Mr. Pickering has made two prominent objections. One is, that, when the language of these old charters and deeds comes to be closely looked at, they do not identically mention this fishery, as a several fishery, and that the words used may well be referable to some other species of fishery. But in answer to my question on that point, Mr. Pickering failed to give me the name of any other kind of fishery, because probably he felt a difficulty in giving a name to any such property. Now with regard to the weight of the objection; we find, first of all, no doubt, that in several of these documents it is called "a salmon fishery in the waters of the Tyne" simply; in another document in James I.'s time, "a fishing for salmon in the waters of the Tyne." Then if we go back to one of the minister's accounts in the time of Queen Elizabeth, it seems to me that language is used which is very precise and definite to show that this must have been a several fishery. In the accounts of Robert Arderne, the bailiff, of any profit arising it is described as being "for the ferm of the salmon fishery in the salt water within the bounds of the town of Sheels." If it is "a ferm of the salmon fishery," I do not know what it can be but a "several fishery." It is truly represented as being a ferm of the salmon fishery. But another objection was made arising out of the language of the same account, and it was said that the account, together with the language of the document of 22 Hen. 8 and the letters patent, shews that what the monastery was entitled to was not a "several fishery," but the tithes of the fish. And if the language used would bear that construction, it would carry Mr. Pickering a long way on his journey to rebut the presumption of its being a several fishery; but I think the language of the minister's accounts in the time of Queen Elizabeth itself rebuts the notion that they are speaking of tithes. It speaks of "the ferm of salmon fishery in the salt waters within the bounds of the town of Shields and Tynemouth, where the tenants of the towns aforesaid ought to answer for every twenty salmon, one salmon, for the time of this account he doth not answer because no such fish have been taken within the bounds aforesaid during the same time." That does not give one the notion of a tithe of salmon; because I never heard of a tithe being one in twenty. But, be that as it may, "the ferm of the salmon fishery," is what is spoken of in that document, and that has, in my judgment, nothing to do with a mere right to tithe. The letters patent of Hen. 8, it is true, speak of "hereditaments to the late monastery formerly appertaining, together with certain tithes, including the tithes of fish of all the vessels and boats fishing at the Shelth in Tinemouth, parcel of the Rectory of Tinemouth." But they are there speaking of tithes nominatim. That has nothing to do with the several fishery. It is a different matter altogether. I do not, therefore, find anything in any of these documents which goes to rebut the presumption, that we are bound to make of the legal origin of this fishery, from the long user and enjoyment of it, and from the deeds which have been put in evidence to show that it was existing at a time prior to the time as to which there is any evidence of enjoyment. There is one other document to which we ought to allude, and it is a very ancient one, and the only other one which could raise, as it seems to me, an argument of a presumption contrary to the existence of this fishery, and that is the record of the proceedings in the time of Edward I. I must say for myself that I cannot say there is not something there which looks inconsistent with "a several fishery at the Low Lights, and extending from the Low Lights to the Pow Burn," and that is the part of the river opposite to where the monastery was. There is no doubt that the prior there was setting up a right to the soil of half the river, "and that between the middle of the water and the land of the monastery he had his free fishery by the length of the same land in the same water, and that he and his predecessors had built houses there for his fishermen." I think, however, it would be giving too much importance to that to draw the conclusion that that does rebut the presumption of a several fishery existing in the waters of the Tyne, as described in these deeds. I do not go more into detail after the explanation which my Lord has given upon that, and the judgment that has proceeded upon it; but I do not think that that is enough to raise any serious question. Then I come to the remaining question of merger, on which Mr. Pickering has argued with so much ability and fairness, though I cannot assent to his argument. The question is whether there is any evidence of merger in this case, and, if so, what the law is upon that subject? I find no evidence in the case showing that there was a merger in point of fact, or that the fishery was ever forfeited. I do not think it necessary to say more about it, or go into a detailed examination of the different cases upon the subject. It is sufficient to say that I am not satisfied that there was any merger, but that if it were necessary to decide that point now, which it is not, I should be of opinion that a several fishery would not, upon reverting to the Crown, be merged in the prerogative, as contended for by Mr. Pickering; but would exist in the King as a distinct and separate property, capable of being regranted by him to a subject. It seems to me to be a mistake to say that a right like a free or several fishery merged in the prerogative of the Crown, and for this reason, that it did not originally grow out of the prerogative. I take it that the origin of such a right is that the king was formerly considered the universal lord and original proprietor of all the lands in this kingdom; that from that arose this right to grant property like this fishery, or those which are mentioned as being like this. It is quite possible, then, that the king might have parted with the very land out of which this franchise was granted; and then, if this franchise came back to him, it would not merge in the land, for he would no longer possess the land; nor in the prerogative of the Crown, because it did not grow out of the prerogative of the Crown. It is not like "a flower in the garland of the Crown," as wrecks, estrays, or waifs are, but rather like a free warren, and such like franchises, which, it is conceded, would not be destroyed by reverting to the Crown. It is not, however, necessary to decide this. I am of opinion, with the rest of the court, that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment.

Goods at Customs House subject to lien—Pledge of—Constructive delivery, Goods, arriving at Quebec, were taken to the customs examining warehouse, according to the r. the port. The goods were entered by the officer in charge, as consigned to M. and S. The goods remained subject to the lien for freight, and to the charges for customs' duties and storage. Till these several claims were discharged the officer in charge was bound not to part with the goods. Subsequently M. and S. obtained an advance from the appellants on the security of these goods, and gave to them a request note, signed by M. and S., and directed to the officer in charge, requesting him to hold the goods "subject to the order," of the appellants, "they paying the duty and storage charge before removal." This note was sent to the officer in charge, who accepted it and made a corresponding entry in his book. Afterwards the goods, while still lying at the customs' warehouse, were seized by the respondent, a judgment creditor of M. and S.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Quebec, Canada, appeal side), that the seizure was bad, there having been a valid constructive delivery and transfer of the goods to the appellants as pledgees.

This was an appeal brought to try the right to certain wire rope and other goods, which were taken in execution, on the 17th June 1865, by the sheriff of Quebec, while lying at the Government Examining Warehouse in that city.

The writ under which the goods were seized was issued by the respondent, on the 30th May 1865, on a judgment obtained by him against Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson, merchants, of Quebec, on the 13th October 1864.

To this seizure the appellants, on the 27th June 1865, filed an opposition afin d'annuler, alleging in effect that the goods had been previously assigned to them in pledge by the said Maxwell and Stevenson as security for an advance of 1800 dols., together with interest, commission, and other charges thereon, and that, at the time of the seizure, the said goods were in their lawful possession as pledgees as security for a sum of 2058½ dols. to which the whole sum so due to them then amounted.

To the opposition so filed, the respondent, on the 3rd Oct. 1865, pleaded the general issue, and also as a special exception péremptoire en droit, that Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson were, at the time of the advance, notoriously, and to the knowledge of the opposants, insolvent, and had stopped payment, and that the goods pledged constituted their whole estate, and the transaction was illegal, and in fraud of the creditors.

On these pleadings, issue was joined, on the 11th Oct. 1865.

Both parties subsequently proceeded to take evidence, when the following were shown to be the facts of the case:—

The goods in question were sent from Liverpool by the steamer St. David, in the summer of 1864, consigned to the said Maxwell and Stevenson, and, on their arrival at Quebec, were landed and placed in the Government examining warehouse on the 6th Aug. in that year.

The examining warehouse is a part of the customs department, established under the authority of the Canadian Customs Act (Consolidated Statutes of Canada), c. 17, s. 11, cl. 4, and s. 14, cl. 4.

The routine of the Custom House at Quebec was proved to be as follows:—"In the first place the master of a vessel arriving produces a manifest or statement of his cargo; then the respective owners of goods possessing bills of lading, or any other legal mark of ownership, pass entries for them. If this is not done, the goods are sent to the examining warehouse as unclaimed; when there, they are held until properly passed through the customs; that is to say, either the duty paid, or the necessary bond given." If this be not done within three months, a power is given by the Customs Act, s. 17, to sell the goods, to pay the duty, and the expenses of warehousing, &c. When an entry of goods is passed, whether on their first landing, or while lying at the examining warehouse, the duties are paid at the time of such entry, and a permit given for their removal, or a bond is given by their owner for the due payment of the duties, and the goods are then entered in the bonded warehouse book, and placed in some bonded warehouse; the examining warehouse is treated as a bonded warehouse for this purpose, and goods which are there before entry remain so afterwards. Goods which have been so bonded are not delivered out of the examining warehouse, or other bonded warehouse, without a permit from the head locker, who at the time in question was one James Sealey. Special statutory provisions are contained in the Customs Act, s. 46, for the transfer by bill of sale of bonded goods, and a book was kept by the said James Sealey for the purpose of entering such sales.

The whole of the customs department is under the control of the collector of customs at the port of Quebec, but the examining warehouse has been for 15 years under the special charge of François Xavier Métivier, who, on his appointment to that position, received from the collector the following written instructions:—

Charged with the care of the examining warehouse, it will be his duty to keep an exact account of all merchandise and goods received into and passed out of the examining warehouse, according to the warrants addressed to him, and to collect and keep an accurate account of all storage dues.

Métivier received no express instructions from the collector to accept any order for the delivery or transfer of goods from the parties owning them, but it was always his custom to do so, and considered by him to be the rule of the office, and though it appears to have been known to, was never objected to by, the collector.

Shortly after the goods were bonded and placed in the examining warehouse, Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson applied to the appellants, who were also merchants at Quebec, carrying on their business under the style of "D. D. Young and Co.," for a loan of 1800dols. upon the security of their goods. The appellant having consented, gave to Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson their promissory note at three months date for that amount, and received from them the following document:—

Quebec, 19th Aug., 1864.

Received from D. D. Young and Co., their note at three months date for eighteen hundred dollars, being an advance on eighty-nine packages of wire rope rigging, marked M. & S., No. 1 @ eighty-nine ex-stmr. "St. David," and now in H. M. examining warehouse, said advance to be repaid to D. D. Young and Co., on or before the maturity of their note, together with a commission of 5 per cent. on the amount advanced. Should the advance not be prepaid by that time, D. D. Young and Co., to have the right of selling the rigging, &c., and paying themselves out of the proceeds.

MAXWELL AND STEVENSON.

Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson at the same time gave to the appellants the following order on the officer in charge of the examining warehouse:

The Officer in charge of H.M. Examining Warehouse.

Quebec, 19th Aug. 1864.

Will please hold, subject to the order of D. D. Young and Co., thirteen coils wire rope, Nos. 1 to 13; one bag iron-work, No. 14; seventy-four coils rope, Nos. 15 to 88; and one bale merchandise, No. 89, all marked M. & S., landed from the steamer St. David, on her last passage from Liverpool, they paying the duty and storage charge before removal, and oblige

MAXWELL AND STEVENSON.

This order was the same day taken by one of the appellants' clerks to the said François X. Métivier above-mentioned, who wrote across it, "accepted, F. X. Métivier," and at the same time wrote opposite the entry of the goods in the warehouse book kept by him, "subject to D. D. Young's order."

Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson discounted the appellant's note, and employed part of the proceeds in paying the freight upon the goods. The exact date of this payment was not proved.

Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson were unable to repay the advance before the note became due; but at their request the appellants consented not to sell the goods, but to hold them as security for their advance, in consideration of being paid an extra commission of 2½ per cent. for an extension of time of three months. Interest was also to be paid at 7 per cent. the appellants accordingly retired the said note at maturity, and continued to hold the goods.

Shortly after, on 30th Dec. 1864, Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson duly entered the goods and bonded them. An entry of them was then made in the bonded warehouse book, kept by James Sealey as above-mentioned, but the goods remained in the examining warehouse.

In the month of June 1865 the three months' extension of time having expired, the appellants prepared to sell the goods, and gave instructions to their brokers, A. J. Markham and Co., to that effect. The sale was, however, stopped by the seizure of the goods in execution as above-mentioned.

The enquêtes of both parties having been closed, the case was heard on the merits before Stuart, J., who, on July 2, 1867, gave judgment for the appellants, declaring them pledgees of the goods in question, and granting main levée of the seizure thereof.

The respondent having inscribed the cause upon the roll for review before three judges, the cause was again argued before Meredith, C. J., and Stuart and Taschereau, JJ., and on the 5th Feb. 1868, the court gave judgment, reversing the judgment of the preceding 2nd July, on the ground that the appellants did not obtain possession of the goods so as to give effect to the contract of pledge, and dismissing the opposition of the appellants with costs, Stuart, J. dissenting.

From this judgment the appellants appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench of the province of Quebec, Canada, and on the 19th Dec. 1868, that court gave judgment confirming the judgment of the Superior Court, on the grounds that the warehousekeeper was the agent and depositary of the goods for the shipowner or master to retain possession of them for him, and to prevent control over them by the consignees till freight was paid; that the case was different from one of sale or deposit of a bill of lading, but was one of an ordinary pledge of goods in which possession must accompany the pledge; and that here the goods had been landed and stored in the customs-warehouse in the interest of the shipowner or master only, and had never been actually or constructively in the possession of the consignees. The court referred to Massé, Droit Commercial, vol. 6, pp. 498, 502; Troplong, Hypothèques et Privilèges; Civil Code of Canada, arts. 1971-2; Meyerstein v. Barber, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 359; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 51.

It was from this judgment that the present appeal was brought.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., and Bompas, for the appellants.—Métivier had authority to accept the order of Maxwell and Stevenson, that the goods should be held subject to the appellants' order. The possession of Métivier was, from the time that he accepted such order, the possession of the appellants, notwithstanding the lien of the shipowner for freight, and, if not, it became so as soon as freight was paid. At the time of the seizure, Maxwell and Stevenson had no legal right, or actual power, to take possession of or interfere with or sell the goods without first paying to the appellants the sum due to them; and the creditors of Maxwell and Stevenson could have no further rights in that respect than their debtors. The goods had been validly pledged to the appellants, and were in their constructive possession at the date of the seizure, and goods in the possession of a pledgee cannot be taken in execution by judgment-creditors of the pledgor. They referred to benefit of a seizure of goods, under a writ of fieri facias, issued on a judgment recovered by him against Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson, of Quebec, merchants. The writ was issued on the 30th May 1865, and certain goods, alleged to be the property of Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson, were seized under the writ by the sheriff. The appellants opposed the execution on the ground that by a contract in writing, bearing date the 19th Aug. 1864, the property of Maxwell and Stevenson in the goods in question was conveyed to them, and an authority to sell expressly conferred by Maxwell and Stevenson for the purpose of securing repayment of advances made by the appellants on the faith of this contract; and as repayment had not been made, that the seizure under the writ should be set aside. The cause was heard in the first instance by Mr. Justice Stuart, one of the judges of the Superior Court of Lower Canada. He allowed the opposition, and, after declaring that the opponents were pledgees of the goods in question, he granted main levée of the seizure thereof, that is, directed an amoveas manus against the execution-creditor. The decision was reviewed by the full court. The majority of the judges held that the contract had not been perfected by delivery of possession of the goods so as to constitute a pledge; and on this ground they reversed the decision of Stuart, J., and dismissed the opposition to the execution. The case was then taken by appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the judgment of the Superior Court was affirmed. The appeal to Her Majesty in Council now under consideration has been brought against the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. In the reasons of the judges, which have been elaborately drawn up by Badgley, J., the material point of contention is stated to be "the opposants' want of possession of the pledge, actually or constructively," on or after the 19th Aug. 1864. It is at the same time stated that "the preferential privilege of the pledgee in the thing pledged, according to our law, is undeniable, over the creditors of the pledgor when the contract is complete and perfect." It is suggested (but for the first time) that supposing the contract of pledge to have been completed, the course adopted by the appellants in opposing the execution was not in accordance with the Canadian law. The goods in question were shipped at Liverpool, on board a steamer called the St. David. They arrived at Quebec early in Aug. 1864, and were reported by the master of the vessel at the Customs in Quebec as consigned to Messrs. Maxwell and Stevenson. According to the regulations of the Customs, the goods were taken to their examining warehouse, and in the book of M. Métivier (the chief officer in charge of the warehouse) an entry was made of them as consigned to Maxwell and Stevenson. They were marked "M. and S." The lien on them for freight continued, and they were also liable to detention until the charges for customs duties and storage had been satisfied. Subject to these conditions the consignees had the ownership and the possession of the goods and also the right of dealing with them according to the rules of law applicable to transfers of goods that are subject to charges, and actual delivery does not take place at the time of the transfer. The officer in charge of the warehouse was bound not to part with the goods until the several claims for freight, duties, and storage had been discharged. But he was at liberty, with the sanction of the consignees, to substitute in his warehouse book the name of another as entitled to their property and possession subject to the conditions then subsisting. "The general rule of my office," says M. Métivier, "is, when a party applies to transfer the goods to another party, I generally make a remark in my book to keep in mind of asking a proper order from the party to whom the goods are transferred, and that is very often." The goods having thus been placed in the customs' examining warehouse, and the entry having been made in the book of M. Métivier, Maxwell and Stevenson, on the 19th Aug., 1864, asked for and obtained from the appellants an advance of 1800 dols. on the goods, described in the receipt for the "advance, signed by Maxwell and Stevenson, as wire-rope, rigging, &c., marked M. & S., ex steamer St. David, and now in Her Majesty's Examining Warehouse; said advance to be repaid to D. D. Young and Co., on or before the maturity of their note, together with a commission of 5 per cent. on amount advanced. Should the advance not be repaid at that time, D. D. Young and Co. to have the right of selling the rigging, &c., and paying themselves out of proceeds." A request note of the same date, directed to the officer in charge of Her Majesty's Examining Warehouse, and signed by Maxwell and Stevenson, was given by them to the appellants, whereby the officer was requested "to hold the goods" (described as in the receipt) "subject to the order of D. D. Young and Co., they paying the duty and storage charge before removal." On the same day this was sent to M. Métivier, who wrote across it "Accepted, F. X. Métivier," and it was then returned to and kept by the appellants. M. Métivier also wrote an entry in his own book opposite to the entry made when the goods were first placed in the warehouse. This second entry was—"Subject to D. D. Young's order." He says, "I made that entry in order that, in case the said wire and rope-rigging were claimed by anybody, I should require the order of D. D. Young and Co. before delivery." He further says that he would not have delivered the goods to Maxwell and Stevenson, or to any other, without an order from the appellants. Thus, as between the customs and the appellants, the latter stood precisely in the position in which Maxwell and Stevenson had stood before the request note was accepted and the entry made in the warehouse-book by M. Métivier; and as between the appellants and Maxwell and Stevenson, the goods in question were sufficiently transferred for the purposes of the pledge or mortgage. It appears to their Lordships that by the express agreement of the parties in this case, followed by the acceptance of the chief warehouse keeper, there was a valid constructive delivery of the property comprised in the contract, and that the judgment under appeal, which dismissed the opposition and gave effect to the seizure under the execution, to the prejudice of the rights of the appellants as pledgees, cannot be supported. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed, and that in lieu thereof it should be ordered that the judgment of the Superior Court, which reversed the judgment of Stuart, J., should also be reversed, and the judgment of Stuart, J. be affirmed with costs in both courts. The appellants are entitled to have their costs of this appeal.

Eyre v. McDowell, 9 H. of L. Cas. 619;Beavan v. Earl of Oxford, 6 De G. M. & G. 492;Bittlestone v. Cooke, 6 E. & B. 297;Pearson v. Dawson, E. B. & E. 448;Watts v. Porter, 3 E. & B. 743.The appeal was ex parte.

Judgment reversed.

BURDICK v. GARRICK.

Practice—Appeal to House of Lords—Suspending proceedings under decree—Costs.

The costs of a motion to suspend proceedings under a decree, pending an appeal to the House of Lords, are, notwithstanding what was said in Topham v. The Duke of Portland, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11; 1 De G. J. & S. 603, shown by Walford v. Walford, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233, to be in the discretion of the court, in accordance with what was laid down in The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Trappes, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 516; 2 De G. F. & J. 172.

As a general rule it is fair that the costs of such a motion, if successful, should abide the result of the appeal to the House of Lords.

In a suit to compel trustees to account for certain trust-funds a decree was made by the Court of Appeal that defendants should account to the plaintiff and pay what should be found due upon the taking of the account, and also the costs of the suit. The defendants having presented a petition of appeal to the House of Lords against this decree, moved before the Court of Appeal for an order suspending the proceedings under the decree:

Held, that no order ought to be made to stay the taking of the account or the taxation of the costs:

But held, the plaintiff being out of the jurisdiction of the court, that the trust-fund must be paid into court and remain there pending the appeal, unless the plaintiff was prepared to give undeniable security to refund in case the decision should be reversed by the House of Lords. The costs of the suit were ordered to be paid to the plaintiff's solicitor upon his giving satisfactory security to refund them if the decision should be reversed on appeal. If he declined to give that security the amount of taxed costs must be paid into court pending the appeal. The defendants were to give an undertaking to abide by any order which the court might think fit to make with regard to payment of interest into court:

Held, moreover, that the costs of the motion to suspend proceedings pending the appeal must abide the result of the appeal.

As to the facts of this case, it is enough to state that the suit was instituted by a lady resident in America, against defendants who resided in England, for the purpose of compelling them to pay to the plaintiff a fund which she alleged they held upon trust for her.

A decree was made by the Court of Appeal that the defendants should account to the plaintiff and pay what should be found due, together with interest and the costs of the suit. From this decree the defendants presented a petition of appeal to the House of Lords, and then moved for an order to suspend the proceedings under the decree pending the appeal.

Dickinson, Q. C., and G. W. Collins, on behalf of the defendants, contended that there ought to be security that the fund in question in the suit should be forthcoming in case the House of Lords should reverse the decision of the Court of Chancery. The plaintiff was out of the jurisdiction, and therefore the fund ought not to be paid over pending the appeal. If the fund were lost there would be an irreparable injury, and the possibility of irreparable injury had always been held a sufficient ground for the suspending of proceedings pending an appeal. The costs of the present application ought to abide the result of the appeal, there being no settled rule that in such a case the applicant should as a matter of course pay them. On the contrary, it was laid down that such costs were in the discretion of the court.

The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Trappes, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 516; 2 De G. F. & J. 172; Walford v. Walford, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 812.

Greene, Q. C., and Hanson, on behalf of the defendants, urged that no sufficient reason had been shown why the proceedings under the decree should be suspended.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he should order the payment of the money directed by the decree, and the payment of the costs of the suit to be suspended pending the appeal, unless the plaintiff would give undeniable security for the repayment of the money in case the House of Lords should reverse the decree of the Court of Chancery. But the taking of the accounts and the taxation of the costs need not be suspended. The amount of the taxed costs must, however, be paid into court, unless the plaintiff's solicitor would give some reasonable security for repayment. The security need not be so strict a one as that for the repayment of the trust money. As to the costs of this motion, his Lordship thought that it would be right that they should abide the result of the appeal.

Greene, Q. C. and Hanson then argued that it would be sufficient to have the personal undertaking of the plaintiff's solicitor to refund the costs. Gibbs v. Daniel, 4 Giff. 41. As to the costs of this application, it was an indulgence that was asked for, and the applicant ought to pay the costs of it. In Topham v. the Duke of Portland, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11; 8 Ib. 679; 1 De G. J. & S. 603; which was a later case than The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Trappes, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 516, it was said to be the course of the court that the applicant should pay the costs of such an application, and there was nothing said in Walford v. Walford, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 812, inconsistent with that.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he could not see anything in the report of Walford v. Walford which was inconsistent with what was said in Topham v. The Duke of Portland to be the course of the court, and unless there was any subsequent decision to the contrary he could not depart from the rule there laid down. He knew from having been himself counsel in that case that the point was fully argued, and that the then Lords Justices took great pains to come to a right conclusion. They consulted the registrars of the court before expressing their opinion. The costs of such an application could not be very large, and the payment of them went to show that the appeal was a bona fide one, and in that point of view the rule that the applicant should pay them appeared reasonable. If, however, the fund in question in the suit were paid over without some substantial security being given that it should be refunded if necessary, there would practically be a denial of the right of appealing to the House of Lords. The costs when taxed must be paid to the plaintiff's solicitor on his giving satisfactory security to refund. If that was not given the amount must be paid into court, and the defendant must give an undertaking to abide by such order as the court might think fit to make as to the payment of interest. The case might be mentioned again with regard to the security to be given.

[ROLLS.

March 18.—The application was mentioned again to-day with regard to the security to be given.

Greene, Q. C. and Hanson stated that the plaintiff was not prepared to give any security, and therefore the fund would have to remain in court. But her solicitor would give a satisfactory security to refund the costs if called upon to do so.

Dickinson, Q. C., and G. W. Collins, on behalf of the defendants, now stated that since the former hearing of this application they had ascertained that there was a much fuller report of what took place in Walford v. Walford, in 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233, and that it appeared that Topham v. The Duke of Portland was cited to the court, and that, notwithstanding, Wood and Selwyn, L.J.J. said that the costs of such an application were in the discretion of the court. In Walford v. Walford the application was in form an appeal by way of motion from the refusal of Stuart, V. C. to suspend the proceedings under the decree pending an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. But the application was in substance an original motion, for after the notice of appeal motion had been given by the defendant the plaintiff enrolled the decree, and at the bar the defendant asked that the proceedings might be suspended pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

Greene, Q. C. and Hanson said that there were very special circumstances in Walford v. Walford, and as the reports of the case did not agree, it was not an authority to overrule the decision in Topham v. The Duke of Portland, which was come to after the judges had consulted the registrars as to the practice.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he had no hesitation in stating his own opinion to be that the reasonable rule was that the costs of an application of this kind should abide the result of the appeal. It now appeared that in Walford v. Walford the then Lords Justices thought that, notwithstanding the decision in Topham v. The Duke of Portland, there was no inflexible rule that the applicant should pay the costs of the application; but that, on the contrary, the costs were in the discretion of the court. It was to be observed also that the late Knight Bruce, L. J., who took part in the decision of Topham v. The Duke of Portland, said in the former case of The Earl of Shrewsbury v. Trappes, that there was no inflexible rule on the subject. That being so, his Lordship was at liberty to act on his own view of what the former rule was, namely, that the costs should abide the result of the appeal.

BOVILL v. COWAN.

Practice—Affidavit of documents—Sufficiency—Joint possession.

Where a person who makes an affidavit of documents in his possession sets up a case of joint possession, his affidavit will be insufficient if he does not show enough to satisfy the court what is the nature of the alleged joint possession.

This was a suit to restrain the infringement of the plaintiff's patent by the defendant.

The suit was instituted by G. H. Bovill. He afterwards died, and the suit was revived and carried on by his executors. On the 29th May 1869, they, upon the application of the defendant, were ordered "to make and file a full and sufficient affidavit stating whether they, or either of them, have or have had or has or has had in their or either of their possession or power any and what licences, or agreements or duplicates, or counterparts, or drafts or copies of licences, or agreements granted or entered into by the late plaintiff G. H. Bovill, to or with any and what person or persons of the improvements patented by the said late plaintiff in June 1849, and accounting for the same."

In pursuance of this order the plaintiffs on the 16th June 1869 made an affidavit, in which they deposed as follows:

According to the best of our knowledge, information, and belief, we have not now, and never have had in our exclusive possession, custody, or power, or in the possession, custody, or power of our solicitors or agents, solicitor or agent, or in the possession, custody, or power of any other person on our behalf, any licence, duplicate licence, or agreement for the use of the patent of the 5th June 1849, or any copies of such documents, but we have in our possession jointly with a third person who is not a party to the suit a bundle of such documents, and we can only produce the said documents with the consent of such third person in whose possession jointly with us the said documents now are, and we have applied for such consent accordingly, and if accorded we have no objection to produce the said documents.

The affidavit was held insufficient by the Master of the Rolls, and the plaintiffs were ordered to make a further affidavit. This they did, and they then said as follows:—"We have set forth in the schedule hereto the particulars of the bundle of documents referred to in our previous affidavit, and we further say that Mr. John Lockett, of Liverpool, is the person referred to in the said affidavit in whose joint ownership the said documents are." This further affidavit was also held by the Master of the Rolls to be insufficient, and his Lordship ordered the plaintiffs to make another affidavit. From this decision they appealed.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C., and Everitt, in support of the appeal, argued that, from the two affidavits taken together, it was quite clear that the documents in question were not in the possession of a person whom the plaintiffs could compel to produce them. They cited Burbidge v. Robinson, 2 Mac. & G. 244.

Without calling upon Jessel, Q. C., and Ford North, who appeared for the defendant, Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he thought the affidavit insufficient. When parties made an affidavit of this sort, and alleged a joint possession of documents, they were bound to show enough to satisfy the court what the nature of the joint ownership was. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

THE MASONS' HALL TAVERN COMPANY v. NOKES.

Solicitor and client—Formation of company to take over property purchased by solicitors—Sale to company by their solicitors—Liability to account for profit.

A firm of solicitors purchased a certain leasehold property, and soon afterwards they formed a company (of which they were appointed the solicitors) to take over the property, which they sold to the company at a price greatly in excess of that which they had paid for it.

a bill by the official liquidator of the company, which had been ordered to be wound-up, seeking to make the solicitors answerable for the profit which they had made by the sale to the company.

Held, that no fiduciary relation having existed between the parties at the time when the solicitors purchased the property, and there having been no fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation on the part of the solicitors, and all the then members of the company having been fully aware of the facts of the case, the sale could not be opened, and the solicitors were not accountable for the profit made on the transaction.

Bill accordingly dismissed with costs.

The Bank of London v. Tyrrell, 27 Beav. 273; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 10 H. L. Cas. 26; and The Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559, distinguished.

This suit was instituted by the Masons' Hall Tavern Company against William Federau Nokes, George Carlisle, and Swinford Francis, who were solicitors, carrying on business in partnership, in Finch-lane in the city of London, for the purpose of making them answerable for the profits made by them arising from the sale to the company of certain property, on the ground of the relation of solicitor and client which subsisted between them and the company, and of alleged concealment on their part with reference to the sale.

The facts of the case were as follows:

In July 1865, Nokes entered into an agreement with one Charles Hicks, for the purchase of the residue then unexpired (fifty-five years) of the lease of certain hereditaments, known as the Masons' Hall Tavern, at the price of 7500*l.* He bought it on behalf of himself and three other persons, namely, John Kelday, Arthur Kelday, and Edward Habershon, who had agreed together to buy the lease as a joint speculation, for the purpose of resale, at a profit or sub-letting, &c. These four persons were to have each one-fourth of the property, but Nokes' fourth was to be divided into three parts, one of which was to belong to himself, and the other two to his partners, Carlisle and Francis. By the agreement between Nokes and Hicks, the stock-in-trade, fixtures, &c., were to be taken at a valuation, and they were valued at 3900*l.* On the 5th Aug. 1865, the lease was assigned to Nokes, who had previously, on behalf of himself and the other persons interested in the lease, entered into a contract to grant an underlease of the property to one Frederick Potter, for a term of forty-two years from June 1865, at an annual rent of 1000*l.*, subject to a stipulation that Potter should purchase the fixtures, furniture, and stock-in-trade at a valuation, and upon the further condition that Potter would surrender the underlease whenever required so to do on payment to him of 500*l.* The arrangement with Potter fell through, and he held the tavern for some time as manager for Nokes and the other persons interested in it, receiving a per centage upon the profits.

Soon afterwards the persons interested in the tavern projected a company for the purchase of the Masons' Hall Tavern, and Nos. 13 and 14, Basinghall-street, which adjoined it, and a prospectus was issued, which stated that the capital was to be 50,000*l.*, in 5000 shares of 10*l.* each, and that the object of the company was to purchase the property, which was described at the price of 42,000*l.*, and to carry on the business of a tavern, in combination with auction and public meeting rooms. The company was registered on the 12th Oct. 1865.

Nokes had, before the formation of the company, entered into contracts for the purchase of the reversion of the tavern, and also of Nos. 13 and 14, Basinghall-street. The amount to be paid by the company for the whole property, viz., 42,000*l.*, was to include stock-in-trade, goodwill, law costs, and preliminary expenses generally. Nokes and the other persons entitled to the leasehold interest in the tavern in fact received 14,000*l.* for it.

The company was ordered to be wound-up on the 1st June 1867, and in the following year the official liquidator filed the present bill against the solicitors for the object above stated. The two Keldays and Habershon were not made defendants.

Jessel, Q.C., and Lindley, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendants having sold the property at a large profit to a company of which they were the solicitors, they must account for the profit. They cited:

The Bank of London v. Tyrrell, 27 Beav. 273; on appeal, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 10 H. L. Cas. 26;

The Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559;

Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 266;

Great Luxembourg Railway Company v. Magnay, 25 Beav. 586;

Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Haro 461;

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Cottrell, for the defendants, contended that the defendants not having been the solicitors of the company at the time when they purchased the property, and having made no concealment as to their being interested in the property, could not be made accountable for the profit. The cases cited for the plaintiffs were distinguishable.

Lindley was heard in reply.

Feb. 8.—Lord ROMILLY, after stating the object of the suit and the facts of the case as above set forth, continued: This case is, I think, novel in most aspects, nor has any case been cited to me which supports the claim of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs rely on The Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott (sup.) and also on The Bank of London v. Tyrrell (sup.) I will consider these cases, and their application to the present, separately. It is by the combined effect of both that the plaintiffs seek to support their claim to relief. I think that a great distinction exists between this case and that of The Bank of London v. Tyrrell. The distinction consists in this—first, in the fact that a fiduciary relation existed in that case at the time when the solicitor acquired an interest in the property sold to the company; and, secondly, in the fact that the whole of the members of the company existing at the time were aware of and sanctioned the transaction when it was entered into by the company. In Tyrrell's case Mr. Read and others had bought the property in question in Sept. 1864. Tyrrell had then no interest in it. Tyrrell was one of the promoters of the company in Dec. 1854, and applied to persons to become directors of the company, which was incorporated in July 1855; but on the 13th Feb. 1855, Tyrrell and his partner were finally appointed solicitors to the company, the functions of which were maladministered. The negotiations between Tyrrell and Read began on the 9th Feb., at a time when Tyrrell was, as was held by the House of Lords, and indeed as he plainly was, solicitor of the directors who were forming or endeavouring to form a company; he entered into the contract with Read expressly on behalf of the directors and to sell the property to them, and entered into another contract with Read to divide with him the profit to be obtained by the additional price obtained by Read above what he gave for it in the September previous, and all this was concealed from the directors. If Tyrrell had been a joint purchaser with Read in Sept. 1854, and the directors had known this, could they afterwards have disputed

ROLLS.]

DAVIES v. DAVIES.

[ROLLS.]

the right of Tyrrell to his share of the purchase money? I apprehend clearly not. And what could the shareholders have done? Could they have disputed the purchase and required the vendors Tyrrell and Read to refund the purchase money? I think that they could not, their remedy must have been confined to an attack on the directors to make them account for improvidently or fraudulently giving more for the property than it was worth. The great grievance in the case of Tyrrell was that he did not communicate everything to the directors; if he had done so and they had thought fit to complete the purchase, he would have been safe and could not have been called upon to refund. But this case is still stronger, for there were no shareholders other than the directors to whom to communicate the proposed transaction. Suppose there had been ten or twenty shareholders other than the directors at that time, and that they had all known of and sanctioned the transaction, could any subsequent shareholders have disputed it? And yet this is really what is attempted in the present case, for every shareholder in existence knew of it, and approved of it; it is true that all but two were interested in the transaction, but this also was known, and I apprehend that with this limit they were entitled and able to enter into any contract they thought fit. It is, in my opinion, impossible to import into this transaction the doctrine of the court which makes agents accountable to their principals for benefit derived by the agent while he was in that character engaged for the principal, and which benefits were not disclosed to and sanctioned by the principal. This is a suit by the official liquidator, that is, by the company, but the company knowingly entered into and sanctioned the transaction as the means of founding the company; how then can the company now complain of it? It is said that the company now consists of shareholders who were not members of the company at that time; but if this doctrine is to suffice to set aside a previous transaction known to and sanctioned by every member of the company, no contract with any company could safely be entered into. And no case has been, or indeed can be, produced that in the slightest degree sanctions any such doctrine. It is attempted to be supported by the decision of Lord Langdale in the case of The Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott (sub.); but, in truth, on examining the case, the decision, so far as it has at any bearing on the present case, is against the doctrine advanced by the plaintiff. In that case which was a suit by a perpetual corporation which the members of it had no power to alter or terminate, Lord Langdale held that a transaction which materially altered the constitution of the corporation was illegal, that the members of it, though unanimous, had no power to make the alteration, and that any subsequent member of the corporation might complain of it, and might obtain redress and restitution. In fact the corporation there was like a charity or a municipal corporation. The members of it had no power to alter the character or foundation of the institution. But in this case the members had that power. The directors might have modified and converted the company as they pleased; they might have wound it up; they might have dissolved it; they might have given the whole of the property of it to any one of themselves; they might have doubled or halved the capital; their power over the corporation or company was absolute and unlimited, and no person not then a member of the company could complain. In such a case, Lord Langdale expressly says that if the members had possessed that power the transaction in that case could not have been questioned. Such is the case here, and the transaction, in my opinion, cannot be questioned. If the subsequent shareholders, that is, if the persons who have been induced to take shares afterwards on the misrepresentations of the directors have been deceived in this respect, their remedy is either to be struck off the list of shareholders or to make the directors personally liable to them for the loss occasioned by such misrepresentations; but they cannot, in my opinion, open a purchase made by the company from an agent, however improvident or inadequate or excessive the price was, when there was no taint of fraud, and no species of concealment or misrepresentation on the one side, or of ignorance on the other side of what they were about. The result is that, in my opinion, this bill must be dismissed with costs, and this is another added to the numerous instances where in these liquidations cases arise which lead to waste of assets in useless costs. There are other considerations in the case arising from the absence of the three other directors who benefited by the contract and sale, namely, the two Keldays and Habershon, for which no excuse is given in the evidence; but it is unnecessary to dwell on that circumstance as on the merits, in my opinion, this bill cannot be supported.

DAVIES v. DAVIES.

Infant—Voidable settlement—Reversionary interest—Married woman—Confirmation of settlement—Acquiescence.

A., an infant, on her marriage, executed a settlement of certain reversionary shares in personalty to which she was entitled, and she and her husband covenanted to execute a valid conveyance of certain real estate to the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement as soon as she should attain twenty-one. A conveyance was executed in pursuance of the covenant, and constituted a valid settlement of the real estate. The tenant for life of one of the personal funds having given up her life interest, A. directed her share of the fund to be transferred to the trustees of her settlement, and the dividends to be paid to her.

Held, that this evinced her intention to confirm the whole settlement, and that, taken with the execution of the conveyance, which was a partial confirmation of the settlement, it operated as a confirmation of the whole settlement.

By a settlement dated the 17th June 1818, and made on the marriage of William Small and Elizabeth Small (the mother of the plaintiff in the present suit) certain real estate situate at Wiley, in the county of Wilts, was conveyed to trustees to the use of the husband during his life, and from and after his decease to the wife during her life, and from and after the decease of the survivor of the husband and wife, to the use of all and every the child and children of the marriage in such shares, &c., as the husband and wife should by deed jointly appoint, or as the survivor of them should in like manner or by will appoint, and in default of appointment, to the use of all the children as tenants in common.

By his will, dated the 3rd March 1826, Thomas Perrior (Mrs. Small's father) bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees, as to one equal third part thereof upon certain trusts in favour of Mr. and Mrs. Small during their joint lives and the life of the survivor, and after the death of the survivor of them, then upon trust for all and every the child and children of Mr. and Mrs. Small as they should by deed jointly appoint, or as the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children in equal shares.

ROLLS.]

DAVIES v. DAVIES.

[ROLLS.]

Thomas Perrior died on the 13th Sept. 1826.

By his will, dated the 5th Dec. 1835, William Small devised his real estate to the trustees of his marriage settlement upon the trusts of the settlement, and he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust, after the death or second marriage of his wife, for all his children in equal shares.

William Small died on the 5th Jan. 1841, without having exercised the joint powers of appointment given to him and his wife by their marriage settlement and by Thomas Perrior's will; he left him surviving his widow and six children, of whom Elizabeth Davies, the plaintiff (then Elizabeth Small) was one.

By two deeds poll, dated the 9th Sept. 1841, Mrs. Small appointed one-sixth part of the real estate comprised in her marriage settlement, and one-sixth part of one-third part of the residuary estate of her father, Thomas Perrior, subject to her life interest therein, unto and in favour of her daughter Elizabeth absolutely.

By an indenture, dated the 9th Sept. 1841, and made in contemplation of the marriage of the plaintiff with James Davies, the plaintiff, who was then an infant of the age of twenty, purported to assign her share in the residuary estates of Thomas Perrior and William Small, to trustees, upon trust for herself for life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and, after her death, upon certain trusts for James Davies for his life, and, after his death, in trust for the children of the marriage, as the husband and wife should jointly by deed, or as the survivor should by deed or will, appoint; and, in default of appointment, for all the children equally. And the settlement contained a covenant by the husband and wife that they would, as soon as the wife should attain twenty-one, make and execute a good and effectual conveyance of the wife's one-sixth part of the real estate comprised in her mother's marriage settlement, to trustees upon trust to sell, and to hold the proceeds of sale, upon the like trusts as were therein contained, of and concerning her shares in the residuary personal estates of Thomas Perrior and William Small.

This covenant was carried out by a deed dated the 1st June 1842, which was duly acknowledged by the plaintiff.

James Davies died on the 21st May 1846. There was only one child born of the marriage between him and the plaintiff, namely Elizabeth Small Davies, who attained her age of twenty-one, on the 9th March 1864, and died on the 12th Feb. 1865.

By an indenture dated the 12th March 1859, Mrs. Small appointed that, from and after her decease, two equal sixth parts of and in one equal third part of the residuary estate of Thomas Perrior, which then remained unappropriated, should be and remain in trust for her three children Robert Small, John Perrior Small, and Elizabeth Davies, the plaintiff. And about the same time she made a similar appointment of two equal sixth parts (then remaining unappropriated) of the hereditaments comprised in her marriage settlement and in her husband's will. She gave up her life interest in her husband's residuary estate, and Mrs. Davies directed her share of it to be transferred to the trustees of her settlement.

Mrs. Small died in July 1862, and the Perrior trust-funds and the other properties of which she was tenant for life fell into possession.

By an inquisition dated the 26th Nov. 1863, the plaintiff Elizabeth Davies was found to be a person of unsound mind, and not competent for the management of herself or her estate. The present suit was instituted by direction of the Lords Justices to determine whether the plaintiff's shares in the Perrior trust-funds and in the residuary estate of William Small were subject to the trusts declared and contained by and in the indenture of the settlement of the 9th Sept. 1841, which was made when the plaintiff was an infant.

Jessel, Q. C. and Buchanan, for the plaintiff, contended that she had done nothing since she attained twenty-one to confirm the settlement of these shares and to bring them within the trusts of the settlement. They cited

Fitzroy v. The Duke of Richmond, 27 Beav. 190;
Childers v. Eardley, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 166; 28 Beav. 648;
Re Vizard's Trusts, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 815;
L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 588; 35 L. J. 460, Ch.

Southgate, Q. C. and Busk, for persons claiming under the settlement, contended that the conveyance of the realty in pursuance of the covenant in that behalf contained in the settlement being a partial confirmation of the settlement after the plaintiff attained her age of twenty-one, amounted to a confirmation of the whole settlement; she had moreover acquiesced in it, and was bound by it. Feb. 23.—Lord ROMILLY.—In this case the question is, whether a share of the residue of the estate of a gentleman of the name of Perrior is included in a settlement made in the year 1859 by a lady of the name of Small. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case and continued.] The lady was an infant when she executed the settlement, and it was consequently voidable. It would require some act on her part to confirm it; but I think that the acts which she has done do amount to a confirmation of it, and on the authority of Milner v. Lord Harewood, (sup.), I think that they amount to a complete confirmation of the whole settlement, for she went to the trustees and directed the Small fund to be transferred into the names of the trustees of her marriage settlement, and the dividends to be paid to her as tenant for life. It is quite clear that in her view she intended to confirm the whole settlement, and I am of opinion that the partial confirmation operates as a confirmation of the whole, there being no act to the contrary, and it being her intention, I think, to do so. It is true that she became of unsound mind in the year 1863, as was found by an order under the inquisition of Nov. 1863. The result is that the property must go according to the settlement, and does not belong to her absolutely, as it would do if the settlement was not binding. Accordingly I will make a declaration for the purpose of carrying that into execution, but the costs of all parties must be paid out of the fund.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN EVANS, DAVIES, AND CADDICK.

[V.C. S.]

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 11 and 12.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN EVANS, DAVIES AND CADDICK.Arbitration—Appointment of umpire by the court—Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 12.In order to constitute an arbitration under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, there must be something in dispute between the parties.Where, therefore, the validity of a notice to dissolve a partnership was disputed, and it was agreed that in order to avoid litigation one of the partners should retire, and that the value of his interest in the business, and the question of notice (if raised) should be decided by two valuers named in the agreement, or their umpire; and one of the valuers died before the valuation was made, and his successor neglected to join with the surviving valuer in appointing an umpire,The court, upon the application of the outgoing partner, ordered an umpire to be appointed.

This was an adjourned summons for an order that an umpire might (pursuant to 12th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854) be appointed in the above matter. The facts were these:—

By an agreement dated 13th Oct. 1869, and made between Richard Evans of the first part, David Davies of the second part, and William Henry Caddick of the third part, after reciting, among other things, that the said parties entered into articles of partnership in Feb. 1869, and that Davies and Caddick by notice dated the 31st Aug. 1869, claimed to determine the said partnership under the powers given by the said articles of partnership for the reasons stated in such notice, and that Evans disputed and denied the validity of the said notice, and that Davies and Caddick had any power to determine the said partnership in and by the said notice, but in order to avoid litigation it had been mutually agreed between the said parties that Evans should retire from the said firm, and that Davies and Caddick should purchase his share and interest in the partnership property and effects and all other his interests, if any, under the said partnership-deed (it being understood that the said valuers or umpire should incidentally decide the question if raised as to the effect of the said notice, or of a previous notice of the 19th Aug. 1869), upon the terms thereafter mentioned, the said Evans, Davies, and Caddick mutually agreed (among other things) that the partnership, so far as regarded Evans, should be dissolved, and that he should sell by valuation his share in the said partnership property and effects to Davies and Caddick; that the said valuation should be made by two valuers, David Peacock on the part of Evans, and Isaiah Hill on the part of Davies and Caddick, or in case of difference by their umpire to be appointed by the said valuers in writing before commencing the valuation, and the costs of the valuation and of the necessary documents should be borne by the parties in equal shares, unless the said valuers or umpire should otherwise order.

Shortly after the execution of the agreement, Peacock and Hill, appointed one Henry Johnson to be their umpire, but before any valuation or award had been made, Hill died. Upon his death Evans served a notice, expressed to be made in pursuance of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, upon Davies and Caddick, requiring them to appoint a new arbitrator or valuer, but they objected to do so on the following grounds: first, that they did not consider the agreement binding on them, and that even if it originally was so, it had now by the death of Hill, become impossible of performance; secondly, that the agreement was one for sale and purchase by valuation, and not for a reference to arbitration, and that consequently the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 did not apply. They, however, consented, subject to the above objections, to appoint a Mr. Bailey to act as valuer on their behalf.

Subsequently, Evans by a notice expressed to be made in pursuance of the provisions of the above Act, called upon Bailey to join with Peacock in appointing an umpire, and he having neglected to do so within seven days from the service of such notice, this summons was taken out by Evans.

Horsey, in support of the summons, submitted that the case came within the authority Collins v. Collins, 26 Beav. 306, as one for arbitration under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. The 12th section of that Act enacted that if, in any case of arbitration, the parties failed or refused to appoint an arbitrator or umpire, or if any arbitrator or umpire refused, or became incapable to act, or died, a judge of any of the Superior Courts might appoint an arbitrator or umpire. He also cited:

Vickers v. Vickers, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 529.

Everitt, in opposition to the summons, contended that the agreement was not one for reference to arbitration, but for sale and purchase by valuation. Moreover, as one of the persons authorised by the agreement to value the property had died the valuation was impossible, and the agreement inoperative. He cited:

Wilks v. Davis, 3 Mer. 507;

Boss v. Helsham, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 73; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 481;

Parkes v. Smith, 15 Q. B. 305;

Chocolate Company v. Crystal Palace Company, 3 Sm. & G. 119.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The Master of the Rolls has decided in Collins v. Collins (sup.), that in order to constitute what is considered an arbitration under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 there must be something in dispute between the parties. He says: "If two persons enter into an arrangement for the sale of any particular property, and try to settle the terms, but cannot agree, and after dispute and discussion respecting the price they say we will refer this question of price to A. B., he shall settle it, and thereupon they agree that the matter shall be referred to his arbitration, that would appear to be an arbitration in the proper sense of the term, and within the meaning of the Act, but if they agree to a price to be fixed by another, that does not appear to be an arbitration." The same view as that held by the Master of the Rolls, namely, that there must be a dispute, was taken by the Court of Exchequer in Boss v. Helsham (sup.). The question, therefore, in the present case is, was there any dispute between the parties? Now by the agreement it is expressly stated that the validity of the notice to dissolve the partnership was disputed, and I am therefore of opinion, upon the authorities I have referred to, that this is an arbitration within the Act. An umpire must therefore be appointed, in accordance with the provisions of the 12th section of the Act.

Re GENERAL PROVIDENT ASSURANCE COMPANY; BRIDGER'S CASE.

[V.C. M.]

V. C. MALINS' COURT.Reported by G. T. EDWARDS and G. I. F. COOKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 6 and Dec. 21, 1869.

Re GENERAL PROVIDENT ASSURANCE COMPANY,
BRIDGER'S CASE.*Contributory — Winding-up — Collateral agreement —
Agent of the company.*

B., a district agent for an insurance company, being requested by the manager to apply for shares in the company in order that other residents in the district might be thereby induced to place confidence in the stability of the company, and to become shareholders, offered to apply for shares on condition that he should not pay either the application or allotment money, or any call that might be made in respect of the shares, but that all moneys payable in respect of the shares should be deducted out of his commission. The manager replied that B. would be allowed the privilege of paying up the shares as convenient. B. thereupon sent in a formal application for 100 shares, which were duly allotted to him, and the allotment notified to him, and he was registered as the holder of the shares. He paid no money on the shares, though he signed a proxy paper for voting at a general meeting, and attended other meetings of the company. His commissions were not sufficient to pay for his shares:

Held, on the authority of Elkington's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 522, that B., having agreed to become a shareholder of the company, and there being a collateral agreement as to the effect of his becoming a shareholder, he was liable as a contributory in respect of his shares.

This was a summons adjourned into court upon the question whether the name of William Bridger should remain upon the list of contributories of the General Provident Assurance Company (Limited), in course of winding-up by the Court of Chancery. Mr. Bridger's name had been placed on the list of contributories by the official liquidator in respect of 100 shares, and the summons had been adjourned into court at the instance of Mr. Bridger, the chief clerk having decided against him. The principal facts connected with the application were as follows:

Bridger was the district agent for the company at Southampton, being paid partly by a fixed salary, and partly by a commission on shares disposed of by him. On the 8th Sept. 1866, Bridger signed and sent in an application in the ordinary form for 100 shares; on the 26th of the same month the shares were allotted to him; and on the 3rd Oct. the allotment was notified to him. In July 1867, a certificate of the shares was sent to him, for which he signed and sent to the company the following printed receipt: "I, the undersigned, hereby acknowledge that I have received one certificate, numbered 336, for 100 shares in the above company, numbered from 7805 to 7904 inclusive." Bridger's name was entered on the register as the holder of 100 shares.

According to the evidence of Bridger, and of Mr. Heywood, the manager of the company, Heywood had requested Bridger to apply for shares in the company, in order that other residents in Southampton might be thereby induced to place confidence in the stability of the company, and to become shareholders, and Bridger had on the 5th Sept. 1866, written a letter to Heywood (which was not produced), offering to apply for shares on condition that he should not pay either the application or allotment money, or any calls that might be made in respect of the shares, but that all moneys payable in respect of the shares should be deducted out of his commission. In answer to this letter, Heywood wrote as follows: "I shall be most happy to receive your application for shares, allowing you the privilege of paying them up as convenient." Bridger thereupon sent in his application for shares, and with it a letter, containing these words: "I inclose my own application for shares, which I propose to pay from my commission on shares as sold. My taking shares, I find, will strengthen my arguments in canvassing for business." Heywood, in a letter of the 10th Sept. replied as follows: "Yours of the 5th is to hand, containing your application for 100 shares. I hope your commission will soon amount up to enough to pay for them." There was no entry in the company's books of the agreement as to the payment of Bridger's shares, but Heywood stated that Bridger's proposal was agreed to by the directors; this, however, was denied by the secretary of the company.

Bridger did not pay any money on application or allotment, or any calls on the shares, and did not receive any dividend. In January 1867 he received from the company a circular, requesting payment of the arrears due in respect of his shares, and a letter from Heywood to the same effect; but upon his writing to Heywood a letter, reminding him of the above arrangement, Heywood wrote to inform him that the circular and letter were sent to him by an oversight.

In Feb. 1867 Bridger, at Heywood's request, signed and sent to Heywood a proxy paper for voting at a general meeting of the company; but he sent with it a letter stating that he would only sign it on condition that he did not thereby cancel the agreement, to allow him to pay calls from commission on shares sold. He also signed proxy papers in Sept. 1867 and Jan. 1868, and attended two meetings of the company, signing his name in the attendance book as the holder of 100 shares.

In July 1867 the company's solicitor wrote to Bridger demanding payments of arrears and threatening proceedings to recover them; but the secretary shortly afterwards wrote to say that the solicitors' letter was sent by an oversight. Bridger subsequently wrote several letters repudiating the shares, but his name remained on the register when the company was ordered to be wound-up. Bridger's commission was not nearly sufficient to pay for his shares.

Cotton, Q. C., and Higgins, for the official liquidator, contended that if there were any such agreement as alleged, it was not a condition precedent to Bridger's becoming a shareholder, but a collateral agreement as to the effect of his becoming a shareholder, and therefore came within the principle of the rule laid down by Lord Cairns in Elkington's case, re Richmond Hill Hotel Company (infra). They cited

Glasse, Q. C., and Alexander, for Bridger.—Before Bridger sent in his application there was a distinct understanding that the shares should be paid for out of commissions only, on his own part, and on the part of the directors. The letter which Bridger sent with his application must be taken as part of the application. If the directors had no power to allot the shares on the terms of the offer, the con-

Cotton, Q. C., in reply,

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is an application by the official liquidator to put the name of William Bridger on the list of contributories of this company for 100 shares. In order to bind a person as a shareholder or contributory of a company it is sufficient to show an application for shares, an allotment in consequence of such application, and a communication of the fact of allotment to the applicant. In the present case, Mr. Bridger, on the 8th Sept. 1866, signed an application for 100 shares in the ordinary form. In consequence of such application, 100 shares were allotted to him on the 26th of the same month, and the fact of the allotment was duly notified to him, and the usual certificate for the shares was forwarded to him, for which he signed and sent to the secretary of the company the following receipt: "I, the undersigned, hereby acknowledge that I have received one certificate, numbered 336, for 100 shares in the above company, numbered from 7805 to 7904 inclusive. These transactions are, in themselves complete for fixing Mr. Bridger as a contributory, and throw on him the burden of proving that they do not represent the real transaction between himself and the company. That burden he attempts to discharge thus; he says that he took the shares conditionally upon, or in consequence of, being appointed the agent of the company at Southampton, and that it was agreed that the shares were to be paid for by means of his commission upon the disposal of shares, and not otherwise: [The Vice-Chancellor then commented on the evidence.] Upon this evidence the same question arises which is stated by Lord Cairns in his judgment in Elkington's case (sup.) "Now it seemed to me, throughout the argument, that the real point for determination in this case might be said to be this: Did Messrs. Elkington intend and agree to become members and shareholders in presenti, with a collateral agreement as to what should be the effect of their so becoming shareholders? Or, on the other hand, did Messrs. Elkington agree that if and when a certain preliminary condition should be performed, and not otherwise, they would become members and shareholders? To these questions a sufficient and conclusive answer to my mind would be given by the facts which up to this time I have referred to. It appears to me that it would be impossible to do otherwise than answer the first of these questions in the affirmative, namely, that Messrs. Elkington, whatever may have been the collateral agreement as to the effect of their becoming shareholders, did agree to become members and shareholders in presenti. It appears to me it would be impossible to hold, by any construction of the collateral letters, that persons who distinctly apply for shares, pay their deposit upon the application, receive the letter of allotment, pay the further sums due upon the letter of allotment, receive the share certificates, possess and retain those share certificates, and are returned upon the register in the usual returns made in the joint-stock companies' register office, can say afterwards, whatever may have been the collateral agreement, that they were not, and did not intend to become, shareholders in presenti. They were perfectly domini of the shares; they might have sold them in the market; they might have received profit, if profit there were upon them, and no person could, I apprehend, have controlled their right to exercise in that way dominion over the shares." Here, the only ingredient wanting was the payment of the deposit and calls, and this has frequently been held to be unimportant where the other circumstances exist. I think Thompson's case (sup.) is nearly on all fours with the present case. There, Thompson, upon his appointment as agent to an assurance company, agreed to take shares upon the terms that the payment for them should be deducted from his commission as agent, and no deposit was ever paid by him upon them, but he was registered as the holder of the shares. The company very soon after his appointment dismissed him. On the winding-up of the company the question arose whether he was a contributory in respect of these shares. The Master of the Rolls thought that the agreement to employ him as agent was so mixed up with the agreement to take shares that he took his name off the list; but the Lords Justices took a different view, and held that there had been a binding agreement on Thompson's part to become a shareholder, and that the cancellation of the agreement to employ him as agent did not put an end to the agreement to take shares. Harrison's case (sup.) is much to the same effect. In Langer's case (sup.) it was held that the signature of a proxy, stating that the signatory was the owner of the shares, was decisive proof of his agreement to become a shareholder. Here also we have the signature of a proxy. These cases show that Mr. Bridger must, according to the rule laid down by Lord Cairns in Elkington's case, be considered as having intended and agreed to become a member or shareholder of this company in presenti, with a collateral agreement as to what should be the effect of his becoming so. I must add that the statement of Bridger himself as to the object for which he became, as he says, a nominal shareholder, disentitles him, in my opinion, to any relief. The deliberate representation to others that he was a shareholder, when, according to his own view, he was not really a shareholder, for the purpose of inducing them to take shares, was a false representation, according to his own statement of his case, which, as between him and the other shareholders, precludes him from the right to deny that he was what he represented himself to be. As to the authorities relied on by Mr. Bridger's counsel, Shackleford's case (sup.) was a clear case of conditional contract, so also were Roger's case (sup.), and Pellati's case (sup.), and Oriental Inland Steam Company v. Briggs (sup.), turned upon an absolute offer being accepted with conditions. Upon the whole case I think that Mr. Bridger's defence fails, and that he must consequently be put upon the list for 100 shares. I made a suggestion that his name should be taken off upon his withdrawing his claim against the company, and that he should neither pay nor receive costs. That suggestion was accepted by the liquidator, but was refused by Mr. Bridger. I should have been glad to spare him from paying costs, but upon principles of public policy, I think that people should be taught that they must not deceive the public, and on that ground I am disposed to make him pay costs. He has chosen to have the matter adjourned into court, and he must pay the costs of the adjournment into court.

V.C. J.] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE WEST HARTLEPOOL IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS. [V.C. J.]

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, April 21.ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE WEST HARTLEPOOL IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.West Hartlepool Improvement Act 1854—Application of rates to promoting Bill through Parliament—Injunction to restrain—Costs.Where commissioners were empowered to do "all acts, matters, and things for promoting the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants," and for that purpose applied the rates of the town to the promotion of a Bill through Parliament :Held, that the words of the Act did not authorise such expenditure, and that the defendants must pay the costs.

This was an information at the relation of William Saddler, William Metcalf Meredith, and John Wood, ratepayers of the Improvement Commissioners' district of West Hartlepool, whereby they sought to restrain the defendants from expending the rates and funds under their control, in payment of the costs and expenses incurred or to be incurred by them in the promotion of a Bill in Parliament, intituled "A Bill for extending the limits of the district under the authority of the West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners, and for making better provision for the improvement and government of the extended district, and for other purposes," and that the defendants should pay the costs of the suit, but not out of any rates levied or to be levied by them, for the public purposes of the district.

The commission under which the defendants acted was established and its district defined by "The West Hartlepool Improvement Act 1854," which, among other things, enacted that the number of the commissioners should be twelve, and then, after reciting the various powers conferred on them, proceed to state that "they (the commissioners) shall and may do all acts, matters, and things, for promoting the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of the said town and township within the limits of this Act as they may deem or consider necessary, and for that purpose may exercise all the powers vested in them by this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith."

Subsequently to May 1859 the commissioners adopted the Local Government Act 1858, and became a local board under that Act.

In December 1869 the defendants caused the Bill now complained of to be introduced into Parliament, by which they sought to acquire additional powers, and to extend "The Improvement Act 1854" so as to comprise a further portion of the township of Stranton, and a portion of the township of Seaton Carew, and that they (the commissioners) should be authorised to borrow further sums for the purposes of this Act.

The commissioners incurred large expenses in promoting this Bill in Parliament, and the relators who were ratepayers of the district under the jurisdiction of the commissioners ascertained for the first time on the 9th March 1870 that the defendants applied the rates levied by them under their statutory powers, in payment of the costs incurred by them in the promotion of the Bill, and the information charged that the commissioners intended to expend further sums of money in the promotion of the Bill, and in paying the costs and expenses of certain opponents of the Bill on the condition of their withdrawing their opposition to the measure. The relators stated that all the rates and funds under the control of the commissioners were applicable pursuant to the Act under which they were levied only to certain specific public purposes of which the promotion of this Bill was not one, that, therefore, the payment of these expenses out of the rates was unauthorised and illegal, and prejudicial to the interests of the ratepayers.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and W. H. Bagshawe, in support of the information, cited Attorney-General v. Andrews (the Northampton case), 2 M. & G. 225, where, although it was admitted that the Act of Parliament for which the commissioners were applying would be very beneficial to the inhabitants of Southampton, an injunction was granted against the commissioners expending the money raised under an old Act in promoting a new one :

Attorney-General v. Corporation of Norwich, 2 Myl. & Cr. 406; 21 L. J. 139;

Attorney-General v. Eastlake, 11 Hare 205;

Attorney-General v. Corporation of Wigan, 23 L. T. Rep. 43.

R. P. Amphlett, Q. C. and W. W. Karslake, for the defendants.—In the cases cited the rates were for specific objects, and did not extend to promoting a Bill through Parliament. In this case the new district is a nuisance to the old one. The Government inspectors reported that it would be better for both that there should be only one district, and it is not disputed that it would be for the benefit of the old town. The words of the Act are sufficient to authorise what has been done. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The Act does not authorise you to apply to Parliament for a Bill. The commissioners cannot apply the rates to the promotion of a Bill through Parliament.] If we are wrong, and do not get the Act passed, we shall have to pay back the moneys :

Attorney-General v. Corporation of Wigan, 23 L. T. Rep. 43;

Bright v. North, 2 Ph. 216.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, without hearing a reply, said : I am of opinion that this case is really governed by the cases of the Attorney-General v. Andrews and Attorney-General v. Eastlake. It is impossible to draw, for any effectual purpose, any distinction between those cases and the present one. Mr. Amphlett has pressed upon me the words of the Act of Parliament, "And shall and may do all acts, matters, and things for promoting the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants, and for that purpose may exercise all the powers vested in them by this Act." But it appears to me that, supposing this Act had been passed even years before those cases, it would be a very strained construction indeed upon those words, "the application of trust funds by trustees," to say that where trustees are to be surveyors of the highways, to do acts, matters, and things, for promoting the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants, and to exercise certain powers given in certain cases for that purpose, that that would imply that they were to do all acts, matters, and things, including, if necessary, the application to Parliament for an enlargement or alteration of the powers thereby assigned to them; I mean if this had taken place before those cases; but of course one must read this with the light of those cases at the time the Act was passed, and at the time this Act was passed the Legislature, I presume, knew, at least all parties must be supposed to have known, that those cases had decided that as a general rule these bodies were not authorised to apply to Parliament for new Acts of Parliament—to apply, that is, in the sense of using the trust funds entrusted to them for that purpose. If it had been meant to have given them that power with regard to those decisions, the proper course would have been to have followed the advice given by Wood, V. C., and to have had those words put into the Act of Parliament, as he said in the Attorney-General v. Eastlake, "including, if necessary, the power of applying to Parliament." That was the answer which he gave to an argument of mine, which I thought was a reductio ad absurdum of the old cases. I said if there was a slip in the Act of Parliament, they could not go and remedy that. He admitted that would be the result of the decisions; they could not have gone to Parliament to remove the slip. Then I am bound to say that, upon consideration of these things, I do not entertain any doubt that the decisions in the cases are very wholesome; because one cannot but feel that if there were an unlimited power for bodies of this kind to apply whenever they thought fit to Parliament at the expense of their constituents, one can easily see there would be a great deal of that kind of professional business got up which would be done at the expense of the ratepayers; and it is much better, as it seems to me, that persons who do seek to obtain Parliamentary powers should do it at the risk of satisfying Parliament it is right; and when they satisfy Parliament it is right Parliament always takes care to provide them with the funds for having done that which is right. Therefore I do not wish to be understood as throwing the slightest doubt upon the propriety of the decisions in these cases. Mr. Amphlett suggested that there are powers here of applying to the Court of Quarter Sessions, and I presume there would be the power of applying to have the rate quashed; I presume they could go to the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari, if necessary, to restrain an illegal act. But the insufficiency of those remedies seems to me to be abundantly demonstrated by what has taken place here, because, having no power to levy a rate except for certain purposes which are to be specified beforehand, and there having been no estimate and no specification of any expenditure to be incurred in applying to Parliament, some one or other of these persons has been able to make an expenditure of upwards of 600*l.* for the very purpose of this Act of Parliament. It seems to me that that shows the necessity of applying to this court, and of the court retaining jurisdiction, which I think it can quite as satisfactorily exercise as the Court of Quarter Sessions would be able to do. Therefore the injunction will be as prayed.

FIELDEN v. THE NORTHERN RAILWAY OF BUENOS AYRES.

Solicitor and client—Indemnity of plaintiff by his solicitor—Death of plaintiff—Petition to revive.

A suit was instituted by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other shareholders against the company. The solicitor of the plaintiff absconded. The plaintiff obtained the appointment of a new solicitor, who some time after gave the plaintiff a letter in which he undertook to hold him harmless from all costs.

The plaintiff died; and the defendants presented a petition that the plaintiff's executor might be ordered to revive the suit, or in default of obtaining the order, that the plaintiff's solicitor might be ordered to pay the petitioner's costs of the suit.

The court having regard to the circumstance that the plaintiff's present solicitor was not the instigator of the suit, and that it was evident that the letter was not written for the benefit of the solicitor, declined to make the order.

Semble. If the solicitor had been the instigator of the suit, the dictum of Sir John Leach in Cockle v. Whiting would have been followed.

This was a petition that Henry William Fielden as the legal personal representative of the plaintiff in this suit, John Taylor Fielden might be ordered within fourteen days to revive the above suit, or in default that the amended bill and supplemental bill should stand dismissed, and that Benjamin William Jones might be ordered to pay all the costs.

The above-named company was registered and incorporated in July 1862, under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Acts 1856 and 1857.

The original bill in this cause was filed on the 18th June 1866 by John Taylor Fielden on behalf of himself and all other the holders of deferred, preference, and ordinary shares in the above-named company against the company, Charles Seal Hayne, Sir John Campbell Lees, David Smith (deceased), George Nelson, and the secretary, Edmund Ayres, and prayed for an injunction to restrain the issue of certain certificates and the payment of dividends to the guaranteed preference shareholders save as therein provided. For an account of payments alleged to have been made to the guaranteed preference shareholders, and an account of the income and expenditure of the company. The bill was filed by Montague Richard Leverson as the plaintiff's solicitor.

The defendants filed their answer to the original bill on the 22nd Nov. 1866. In Dec. 1866 the plaintiff's solicitor, Leverson, absconded, and by an order of the 11th Jan. 1867 it was ordered that the plaintiff be at liberty to change his solicitor by appointing the respondent, Benjamin William Jones, as his solicitor.

The original bill was amended on the 20th Feb. 1867 by adding the name of George Nelson Strawbridge (who had been appointed a director) as a defendant. Interrogatories were filed and served upon the defendants, who obtained an extension of time for filing their answer. On the 30th May 1867, before such extended time had expired, Strawbridge and Ayres were arrested at the instance of the plaintiff and his solicitor Jones on the allegation that they were in contempt for not having put in their answer. On the 1st June 1867 the attachments were discharged with costs.

On the 7th June 1867, Strawbridge and Ayres commenced two several actions against the plaintiff and Jones for their wrongful arrest. On the motion of the plaintiff and Jones it was ordered that Strawbridge and Ayres be restrained from proceeding with the actions, and that there be an inquiry in chambers as to the amount of damage sustained by them. On the 23rd Sept. Jones gave to the plaintiff a written indemnity, in the following terms:—

London, 11, Old Jewry Chambers, 23rd Sept. 1867.

Dear Sir,—Yourselves v. The Northern Railway of Buenos Ayres Company (Limited).—You having given your consent to be plaintiff in this suit at the request of divers other shareholders, I undertake to hold you harmless from all costs on either side. You will hold this letter as private and confidential, unless any necessity should arise for its use.—

Yours truly,
To John Taylor Fielden, Esq.

BENJAMIN W. JONES.

On the 20th Nov. 1868, the question as to the damages to be awarded in respect of the arrest, having by consent been submitted to Vice-Chancellor Giffard (now Lord Justice), he awarded 25*l.* each to Strawbridge and Ayres, in addition to their costs. The plaintiff and Jones appealed upon separate motions against this order, but the appeals were dismissed with costs.

On the 25th May, 1868, the plaintiff instituted

V.C. J.]

ALLEN v. TAYLOR.

[V.C. J.]

another suit by supplemental bill, to which the defendant demurred, which demurrer was allowed.

The costs of Strawbridge and Ayres on the appeal motions were, upon taxation, found to be, as to the appeal by Jones, 34*l.* 1*s.*, and as to the appeal by the plaintiff, 35*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* Being unable to obtain payment of these costs, Strawbridge and Ayres issued subpoenas against Jones and the plaintiff, and ultimately Jones paid the sum of 34*l.* 1*s.*, but before the subpoena issued against the plaintiff was served, the defendants' solicitors received notice from Jones that the plaintiff was dead, and that therefore the suit had become abated.

The plaintiff died on the 13th March 1869, having by his will dated 10th April 1868, appointed his brother (the respondent) Henry William Fielden, his sole legatee and executor. In November 1869 H. W. Fielden informed Ayres that his brother (the plaintiff) acted in these suits as the mere tool of others, and that he held the written indemnity of Jones against the costs of these suits, which had become abated by the death of John Taylor Fielden, and he as executor of his brother intimated to the petitioners that he had no intention of reviving the suits.

The petitioners alleged that these suits were frivolous and vexatious, and that they were not instituted bona fide in the expectation of a favourable decree of the court, but that they were instituted for the purpose of annoyance to the defendants, or of exacting money from the company, and that after Leveson absconded the litigation was continued at the instigation of a certain Alfred Elborough, a former secretary of the company, who ever since the transfer of the suit to Jones had acted as his clerk in the conduct of the suit.

The petitioners, therefore, having regard to all the circumstances, especially to the letter of indemnity, submitted that Jones was liable and ought to be ordered personally to pay to them all their costs, and also ought to pay to Strawbridge and Ayres 35*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, the amount of the costs of the appeal motion unpaid.

For the respondent it was submitted that he was not the instigator of the suit, that he had only undertaken it at the request of the plaintiff. That as to the attachments they had been issued by mistake, and not out of malice or through any vexatious disposition towards the petitioners. With regard to the supplemental bill it was filed by the respondent acting under the advice of counsel, and was merely for the better protection of his client. It was alleged that in consequence of the arrest of Strawbridge and Ayres, which the respondent considered to have been a mistake of his own, he gave the letter of indemnity of the 23rd Sept. to the plaintiff to secure him against all costs and damages which might arise in respect of the inquiry as to the attachments, and that it was not applicable to any other costs.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Locock Webb, appeared for the petitioners, and cited

Dungey v. Angove, 2 Ves. Jun. 304; and Cockle v. Whiting, 1 Russ. & Myl. 43.

A. S. Eddis, Q. C. and E. Cooper Willis were for the respondent Jones.

A. Thomson was for H. W. Fielden.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he was of opinion that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, he would not make any order on the petition. No doubt the solicitor, in consequence of the letter of indemnity which he had given to the plaintiff, ran a great risk of having to pay all the costs; and if he had been the instigator of the original suit, he would not have hesitated to have followed the dictum rather than the decision of the Master of the Rolls (Sir John Leach) in Cockle v. Whiting. But in this case Mr. Jones was requested by the plaintiff to become his solicitor after his previous one (Mr. Leveson) had absconded. Shortly after becoming the plaintiff's solicitor, he had the misfortune to commit the very great blunder of wrongfully attaching Strawbridge and Ayres, two of the defendants in this suit. The plaintiff, becoming alarmed at the mistake which his solicitor had made, applied to him and obtained from him the letter of indemnity which upon the death of the plaintiff came to the knowledge of the defendants; and, considering the wording of that indemnity, it was not surprising that the defendants should have presented this petition; but as it was evident that the letter was given for the benefit of the client and not for that of the solicitor, he thought that the justice of the case would be met if there was no order on the petition, except that the respondent Jones should pay the costs.

Solicitor for respondent, B. W. Jones.

Practice—Affidavit—Informality.

Where an affidavit commenced with the words "I say," instead of "make oath and say:"

Held, that such omission rendered the affidavit inadmissible, and that it must be resworn.

It appeared that some of the affidavits in the above-named suit commenced with the words "I say," instead of the words "I make oath and say," which is the usual formal commencement of affidavits. In all other respects the affidavits were in the usual form. The record and writ clerks having refused to file the affidavits, as being informal,

C. R. Freeling now applied to the court for leave to file the affidavits, notwithstanding the omission of the words "make oath and." He submitted that as the jurat was in the ordinary form, the omission at the commencement could make no real difference; secondly, he accounted for the omission by the fact that although the proper form of beginning in an affidavit is "I make oath and say," the form of beginning in an answer under the new practice is "I say."

H. F. Bristowe, Q. C., and Field submitted that the affidavits must be resworn, as it had been already decided by the Lords Justices that the omission rendered an affidavit inadmissible.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that although he could not see how the omission could make any difference, yet, as he supposed it was thought it might make a difference in case of perjury, the affidavits must be resworn.

COCKLE v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

*Negligence, evidence of—Invitation to leave carriage—

A train arrived at a station on a dark night, but as it stopped rather short, the last carriages were opposite the end of the platform, which there diverged from the line of rails so as to leave a space between it and the railway carriage. There was no light at this end of the platform, but there was light on the rest of it. The name of the station was not called out, nor were any of the doors opened. No other opportunity, however, was given to passengers to alight at this station. The plaintiff, who was in one of the end carriages could see (by the light in the carriage, and on the other end of the platform) that she was opposite to a platform, and not seeing that the platform did not come up to the carriage, she got out and fell down and was injured.

Held, per Bovill, C. J., and Brett, J., dissentientibus Keating and Smith, JJ., that there was evidence to go to the jury that the accident arose from the negligence of the company, and that the evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was not so conclusive as to oblige the presiding judge to withdraw the question from the jury.

This was an action to recover compensation for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, through the negligence of the defendants, while travelling on the defendants' line.

Plea. Not guilty.

The case was tried in London before Bovill, C. J., when it appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger from London to Deptford by the defendants' line. She was in the last carriage. On arriving at Deptford, the train was not drawn up as far as it might have been, so that the carriage in which the plaintiff was sitting was opposite to the extreme end of the platform. The platform at this point diverged from the line, so that there was a broad space between the platform and the plaintiff's carriage. There was no light at the end of the platform, but there was light at the other end, and an ordinary light in the plaintiff's carriage. This was the last train that night. Up to the time that the plaintiff had got out, no one called out the name of the station, and no one opened the doors of the carriages. On the other hand, no one told the passengers to keep their seats, and the train did not move on so as to give the passengers any better opportunity of alighting. The plaintiff knowing that she was at Deptford, seeing by the dim light that there was a platform opposite to her, but not seeing the space that existed between the platform and her carriage, opened the door of her carriage herself and got out, thinking she was getting out on to an ordinary platform; she fell down and was injured. On these facts the jury found for the plaintiff with 150*l.* damages.

O'Malley, Q.C., for the defendants, obtained a rule pursuant to leave reserved to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendants on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the company causing the accident, but that, on the plaintiff's showing, the accident arose from her own negligence.

Gibbons and Moir showed cause.

O'Malley, Q.C., and M. White, in support of the rule.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument:

Siner v. The Great Western Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 117; 38 L. J. 67, Ex.;

Plant v. The Midland Railway Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 836;

Harrold v. The Great Western Railway Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440;

Foy v. The London, Brighton, &c., Railway Company, 18 C. B., N. S., 225; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 555.

The following cases which are unreported, some of which are still pending, were also alluded to in the course of the argument. Bridge v. The North London Railway Company, in which the plaintiff's carriage was still in a tunnel, when the rest of the train was at a station where the porters were calling out the name of the station. The plaintiff got out and was injured. At the trial before Blackburn, J. the plaintiff, on proof of these facts, was nonsuited, and the Court of Queen's Bench upheld the nonsuit. Whitaker v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company, in which the plaintiff stopped on a bridge, the porters called out the name of the station, and the plaintiff got out and was injured, Willes, J. declined to nonsuit, and left it to the jury to say whether the calling out the name of the station was meant as an invitation to passengers to get out. The jury found in the affirmative, but Davison, Q. C. obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Petty v. London and North-Western Railway Company. Here the train drew up short of the platform, and it was shown that the ground opposite to the plaintiff's carriage looked like a platform. After verdict for the plaintiff, the case was sent down again for trial to ascertain whether, in stepping out, the plaintiff thought he was stepping on to the platform. Prager v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company was similar to Whitaker v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company in its circumstances, unlike it in its event, for the plaintiff was nonsuited. The Court of Exchequer upheld the nonsuit, and the case is now pending in the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

BRETT, J.—I am of opinion that there was in this case evidence to go to the jury. The first step to take in any inquiry of this kind is to see what proposition the judge ought to lay down to the jury, and so to see what the plaintiff is bound to prove. The first proposition, then, would be, that the plaintiff must show the defendants to have been guilty of negligence, and that they alone have been guilty, for the plaintiff cannot succeed unless he establishes that. The second proposition would be, that the defendants have been guilty of negligence if they have done anything which, having regard to the reasonable safety of their passengers, they ought not to have done; and that the plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence if he has done what a reasonable regard for his own safety ought to have prevented him from doing. I feel strongly that a judge is not justified in intruding any further on the province of the jury, except that he may consider if the facts in evidence are such as would entitle a jury, acting on reasonable grounds, to find for one party or the other; and if he thinks that they are not such as to entitle the jury to find for the plaintiff, he ought to say that there is no case for the jury. The judge's power ought not to go beyond this, and he has no right, in my opinion, to say whether in his opinion the plaintiff has done what he ought or ought not to have done. Let us, then, take the facts primarily proved, and those which the jury had a right to infer from them. Assuming them to have been proved or inferred, is it contrary to reason to say that the defendants had done something which, out of a reasonable regard for the safety of their passengers, they ought not to have done, and had omitted to do something which they ought to have done? It does not seem so to me. I cannot take upon myself to say that such a finding would be contrary to reason; so far am I from doing so, that if I were at liberty to import my own ordinary knowledge of railway matters, I should say that the defendants were guilty of negligence. Next, I come to the conduct of the plaintiff. It is said that she ought to have waited until the servants of the company gave her an invitation to get out, either by calling out the name of the station or by opening the door. It is said, too, that she might have called a porter. All this would be matter of strong comment before a jury; but how am I bound to conclude that it is contrary to reason to say that the plaintiff acted with ordinary caution? It is a question for the jury to decide. Unless, then, the case is concluded by authority, I should strongly think that a judge who non-suited the plaintiff in a case like this would be wrongfully acting on his own view of the case, and would be usurping the province of the jury. In looking through the authorities I cannot find one by which the Lord Chief Justice was bound to say that there was no evidence for the jury. In Siner v. The Great Western Railway Company it was broad daylight, and the plaintiff got out, knowing that she was not at the platform. Bridge v. The North London Railway Company is much more like the present case, because the night was very dark at the time of the accident; but it is quite consistent with the judgment that the plaintiff knew the carriage was not at the station, and that the decision of the court was grounded on that knowledge. The court there, however, took upon itself to say that calling out the name of the station was not an invitation to alight; but from what I have already said, it will be seen that I could not have agreed to that, as that is, in my view, a question for the jury. In Whitaker v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company, where a train overshot the station, the name of the station was called out, and the plaintiff stepped out on to the parapet of a bridge and fell. Willes, J., declined to stop the case. In Petty v. The London and North Western Railway Company, some of the carriages drew up short of the platform on a dark night, and the name of the station was called out. Willes, J., who tried that case, refused to nonsuit, and left the case to the jury, with the question, amongst others, whether there was an invitation to alight. In this he was upheld by the Court of Exchequer, though the case was, for other reasons, sent down again for a new trial. I think, then, that this case is not concluded by authority, and that, for the reasons I have mentioned, this rule ought to be discharged.

COCKLE v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute. I am at a loss to see that there was any evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants; indeed it seems to me that the only evidence in the case was that the train drew up short. There is that simple fact. An invitation to get out may, it is true, be given in various ways; here it certainly was not given in the usual way of calling out the name and opening the doors. In Siner v. The Great Western Railway Company, Mellor, J. says:—"The mere fact of the carriage in which the plaintiffs were being beyond the end of the platform, proves no more than that there was less safety than otherwise there would have been; but it is notorious that the exigencies of traffic must sometimes require trains of such length as to go beyond the limits of an ordinary station platform." There is then no affirmative evidence of negligence, and there is no evidence that the platform was of improper construction, or the station of improper arrangement. As I understand the evidence, the plaintiff herself does not go the length of saying she was deceived. As regards the charge of negligence against the defendants the case stands thus:—The station and the platform were not of improper construction, and the train was not drawn up in such a way as to invite the plaintiff to alight, but, on the contrary, there was an absence of the usual intimation. I think, however, that there is another ground on which the plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited. If there had been evidence to show that the defendants negligently left a trap for their passengers that would have been a sufficient cause of action; but then, only in the event of the damages flowing from such negligence and not being produced by any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Here, I think, the plaintiff did by her own negligence contribute to this accident. I go further and say that it was caused by her own negligence alone and not by any act of the defendants. There was no sort of invitation given to alight, yet the plaintiff opened the door herself and got out into a dark place. The fact that the further end of the platform was lighted ought to have led any reasonable person to conclude that the station was where she saw the lights and not where she was. The injury, therefore, was the consequence of her doing an imprudent act, and that is shown by her own evidence. It is clearly the province of the judge to see that there is evidence proper to be left to the jury, before he leaves a question to their decision. No doubt different judges take different views of the amount of evidence necessary to compel them to refer the case to the jury. Still a judge must exercise his own judgment in the matter, subject to the control of the court. I must say that I do not think there was in this case sufficient evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the company, and if there was, I think that the damages clearly flowed from the contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

KEATING, J.—At the trial of this case, the Lord Chief Justice left it to the jury to decide whether the accident to the plaintiff was caused by any negligence on the part of the company, and also whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, reserving for the consideration of the court the question whether there was any evidence that he ought properly to have left to the jury. No doubt a series of decisions, of too long standing to be now questioned, have decided that the question whether there is evidence to go to the jury on which they could reasonably and properly find a verdict, is one for the judge, to be exercised by him under the control of the court. Having stated that proposition, I may add, that the necessary consequence of it has been, that a conflict of opinion has arisen as to the amount of evidence necessary to oblige the judge to leave the question to the jury. For the question whether or no there is such evidence, leaves to the court itself the duty of weighing and considering the facts. Had this been res integra, I should have thought that in the present case there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury; but I feel that the case is concluded by authority, and therefore think that this rule ought to be made absolute. The authorities on this question are numerous, and although they may differ in slight particulars, yet there is no substantial variance between them. The first question we have to ask, in considering whether there was evidence of negligence on the part of the company in this case is, whether there was anything in the nature of an invitation to the plaintiff to descend. I think, so far as I can abstract any rule from the decisions, that the rule is, that if there is no invitation given to alight, a person doing so does it at his own risk. That is the general rule. Was there then in this case anything equivalent to such an invitation? The train drew up, and the carriage in which the plaintiff was was on a slope at some distance from the platform. There was evidence that the light at this part was imperfect. There was no cry of the name of the station, and there was an absence of anything, that I can see, in the shape of an invitation beyond the mere fact of the train stopping. It has been held that even the stopping of the train, coupled with the cry of the name, is not an invitation to descend, and it therefore seems to me that the absence of the latter fact in this case conclusively negatives the idea of an invitation. No doubt, as is remarked by my Lord, there is a point worthy of consideration in this case, that there was an amount of imperfect light, which might have made the plaintiff suppose that she was opposite an ordinary platform, and not one which sloped away from the carriage. But the platform was not shown to be of improper construction, and I do not think that the mere fact of the peculiar construction of this platform or the effect which circumstances produced on the mind of the plaintiff, could be held to change that into an invitation which would not otherwise have been one. I come now to the question whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Here the plaintiff opened the door of the carriage herself as soon as the train came to a standstill, and stepped out short of the platform. Ought she to have kept her seat under such circumstances? The decisions say that she ought, and if she ought to have done so and did not, she was guilty of contributory negligence. I feel constrained by the decisions to arrive at these conclusions; though, if the matter were res integra I should feel disposed to say that there was evidence in this case to go to the jury.

COCKLE v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

BOVILL, C. J.—I very much regret that the court should be equally divided on this case. The difficulty, to my mind, arises from the judges having to draw inferences of fact. I cannot find any definite rule laid down to govern this case, and I think that the difference of opinion that exists shows very strongly that all these cases ought to depend on the view that the jury may take of the facts laid before them. For example, what is evidence in one case may not be sufficient in another, and a slight variation in the evidence given in two cases may enable and justify a jury in coming in one case to a conclusion different to that at which they arrive in the other. What, for instance, constitutes an invitation to alight? In some cases the name of the station is called out. That alone may or may not be an invitation to alight, according to circumstances—the position of the train or the nature of the station. If the name is called out, as the train approaches the station, no one would say that that was an invitation. If the train stops at a station, and the porters pass along crying out the name of the station, that might be equivalent to an invitation. In each case it is a matter for the jury to determine, and it would be usurping the province of the jury if the judge were to say that calling out the name of the station was or was not equivalent to an invitation. There may be circumstances constituting an invitation, when the train stops and the name is not cried out. For example, when a train stops at a place where it ordinarily does not stop, the stoppage cannot be construed into an invitation. If, on the other hand, a train arrives at its destination, and stays there for some seconds, then such mere fact of arriving and staying may be equivalent to an invitation to alight. Whether it is so or not, under the particular circumstances, is a question for the jury. So in the case of a station between the termini the nature of the traffic and other circumstances must determine whether the mere stoppage of the train constitutes an invitation or not. The question again is one for the jury; it is impossible to say, as matter of law, whether such stoppage is an invitation or not. Here, there was no calling out of the name of the station, and, in that sense, no invitation to alight; but the train drew up at the place where it usually stopped, and the name of the station was not called out. In point of fact, the train did not draw up at the proper place. The evidence of the inspector showed that the accident arose from the train not drawing up at the proper place. The station was large, and the platform long; for the greater part of its length the train was parallel with the platform, but at the end where the plaintiff was, the platform diverged from the line. With regard to the question whether there was evidence that the company was guilty of negligence, I think it clear that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the driver in not bringing up the train to the place to which he ought to have brought it. But it was also necessary to show that there was evidence of negligence which caused the accident. On the part of the plaintiff it may be said, that all that we need now determine is that there was evidence of such negligence to go to the jury. It is not necessary for us to decide that there was conclusive evidence. At the trial I thought there was evidence, and I accordingly left the question to the jury. Mr. White has argued the case as though the negligence which caused the accident was to be sought for in some one particular point of the defendants' conduct; but I think we ought to look at all the circumstances in determining the question. In the first place, it is not suggested that the platform was of improper construction, or that the rails were improperly laid. It is necessary, in all cases, that there should be different lines of rails for the traffic, and also that, in some cases, there should be a divergence of the platform from the ordinary line, just as there was here. But the driver, who brought up the train, must be taken to have been aware of the peculiar construction of this platform. He must have known that, if he brought up the train so that the whole length of it should be parallel with the platform, the passengers could alight with safety, and that if he did not bring it up far enough, persons at the end of the train might be deceived into the belief that their carriage was close to the platform, whereas a dangerous chasm would intervene between them and it. The circumstances were also peculiar as to the time of day, as it was late at night. When the driver came to this station, which, as we have seen, was peculiar in construction, he could see that one part was well lighted and the other not. He also knew that there was a light of a particular description in the carriages, and the accident seemed to me at the trial, and seems to me now, to have arisen from the circumstance of the train having drawn up at an improper place, where the dim light disclosed a platform, but did not show the space that intervened between it and the carriage, so that the plaintiff was led to believe that she was at an ordinary platform, and got out and fell down accordingly. All that it is now necessary for us to decide is, whether there was evidence that the accident occurred in that way, if so, whether that was negligence on the part of the company's servants; and those questions being answered in the affirmative, the further question arises, whether there was evidence from which an invitation might be inferred to get out at the place where the train stopped. I think there was evidence from which it might be inferred that the passengers were invited to alight at the place where the train stopped. The train did not afterwards draw up any further, and it is not suggested that this was a mere temporary stoppage, but it was undoubtedly a permanent stoppage to enable the passengers to alight. If, then, there was an invitation, it was an invitation to alight at a place of great danger, which the servants of the company knew of, and of which the plaintiff was ignorant. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that there was evidence from which the jury might properly conclude that there was negligence in bringing up the train at this place under the peculiar circumstances, and that there was an invitation to descend. I arrive at this conclusion from a consideration of all the circumstances—the time of night, the state and position of the lights, the construction of the platform, the way in which the train was brought up, and the general character of the stoppage. There is still another question, whether there was evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff so clear and conclusive that the jury were bound to say that the accident arose from the plaintiff's own negligence. This question seems to me to be much mixed up with the question of whether there was negligence on the part of the company. For, if the train were brought up for the purpose of passengers alighting, the plaintiff was justified in thinking that she might descend. As a matter of fact, it is clear she did think so, so that there is an element in this case, which was wanting in Petty v. The London and North-Western Railway, where the Exchequer Chamber sent the case down again for a new trial, in order to ascertain whether, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff thought she was stepping on to the platform. Still, the fact that, in this case, the plaintiff did think so is of course of no consequence unless there be evidence that she was led by the company to think so. I am of opinion that there was evidence in this case, both that the plaintiff thought she was stepping on to the platform, and that she was led to that belief by the defendants' negligence. Many cases have been cited relating both to negligence on the part of railway companies and contributory negligence on the part of passengers, but I think that they are all distinguishable from the present, and that there is no one of them which is exactly like it, or which ought to govern it. In Plant v. The Midland Railway Company (ubi sup.) the plaintiff knew he was descending where there was no platform. He knew that there was danger, and that caution was required, and consequently had only himself to blame for not taking proper care. In Bridge v. The North London Railway Company the train had stopped in a tunnel, and not at the platform. It was dark at the time, and there was nothing to induce the plaintiff to think that he was getting out on to the platform. There is that distinction between that case and this. In Harrold v. The Great Western Railway the plaintiff knew he had overshot the platform, and still got out. In Siner v. The Great Western Railway Company the same thing happened. The plaintiff knew there was no platform, but still got out, thinking to take her chance of doing so with safety, and trusting to the assistance of her husband. She probably thought there was no risk in the matter. All these cases, then, I think, are clearly distinguishable from the present, and I am at a loss to find any authority that lays down any principle which rendered it necessary to withdraw this case from the jury. My view at the trial was, that it was for the jury to decide this question, and that opinion remains now unshaken. As my brother Brett concurs in my judgment, this rule must be discharged.

CASTLE AND OTHERS v. PLAYFORD.

[Ex.]

White asked whether it was not usual, where the court was evenly divided, for the junior judge to withdraw his judgment. If that were done in the present case, the rule would be made absolute.

BOVILL, C. J.—That question incidentally becomes of importance as a question of costs and also as regards the right to appeal. We will consider the matter, taking care not to prejudice your right to appeal by our decision.

May 11th.—BOVILL, C. J.—There is a case cited in Day's C. L. P. Acts, p. 221, 2nd edit., in which this point was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench (Levi v. Green, 1 E. & E. 669; Day's C. L. P. Acts, last edit. p. 240.) Following that case, we shall treat this rule as discharged, so that if the case is carried further, the defendants will be the appellants.

Rule discharged.

Wednesday, May 4.

CASTLE AND OTHERS v. PLAYFORD.

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Vendors to ship cargo and forward bills of lading—On receipt of bill of lading purchaser to take all risks and dangers of the sea, &c.—Agreement to buy and receive cargo on arrival—Payment on delivery at so much per ton "weighed on board during delivery"—Loss of cargo—Liability of purchaser to pay—Insurable interest—Construction of contract—Conditions precedent.

The plaintiffs, in their declaration, set out an agreement in writing between them and the defendant in the following terms, "It is mutually agreed between the plaintiffs as vendors, and the defendant as purchaser, the said vendors agree to ship with every dispatch, and in the customary manner, a cargo of freshwater ice in square blocks (say 170 register tons) in good and clean condition, the vessel to be dispatched direct to any port captain likes best, for orders to unload at any safe place in the United Kingdom, the vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, and, upon receipt thereof, the purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the seas and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever; and the plaintiff agrees to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, and to pay for the same in cash, on delivery, at the rate of 20s. per ton weighed on board during delivery; paying half-price for small ice, pieces under 56lb. in weight to be considered small ice." They then averred due shipping and dispatch of the ice, and forwarding of a bill of lading to the defendant and receipt thereof by him, and the subsequent loss of the cargo "by risks and dangers of the sea within the meaning of the agreement," and assigned as the said breach, non-payment by the defendant of the value of the said cargo at the rate aforesaid; and as the second breach that the defendant did not take upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas, according to the said agreement, whereby the value and benefit of the cargo became wholly lost to the plaintiff, and there was a second count for goods bargained and sold.

The defendant pleaded to the first breach readiness, &c., to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, and to pay for the same on delivery, but the same did not before suit arrive, &c., nor were the plaintiffs ready or willing to, nor did they, deliver the said cargo according to the said agreement.

There were cross demurrers to the first count of the declaration and to the plea, and on the argument thereon, it was under the terms of it, the arrival of the cargo at ordered port, and the ascertainment of the weight on board during delivery, were conditions precedent to the liability of the defendant to pay the price or value of the ice, and consequently the defendant was entitled to judgment.

By Cleasby, B., contra.—The declaration is founded, not on an agreement to pay money, but rather on the loss of goods through the defendant's neglect to take on himself the risks and dangers of the sea, which he contracted to take. Upon receipt of the bill of lading, the property passed to the defendant as purchaser, and the cargo was at his risk, and insurable by him. The declaration discloses a sufficiently good cause of action.

This was an action for breach of contract, and the declaration charged that, by an agreement in writing, bearing date the 25th March 1869, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendant in the words and figures following, that is to say:—

It is this day mutually agreed between T. Castle and Co., of Grimsby, as vendors, and H. H. Playford as purchaser, the said vendors agree to ship, with every dispatch, during this month, and in the customary manner, a quantity of freshwater ice, in square blocks, say cargo per result, 170 register tons, more or less, at vendors' option, all in good and clear condition, and on the same being duly shipped the vessel to be dispatched, with all speed, direct to any port captain likes best, for orders to unload at one safe place in the United Kingdom; twenty-four hours allowed for waiting orders, lay days to count; the said vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, and, upon receipt thereof, the said purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever; and the said H. H. Playford agrees to buy and receive the said ice, on its arrival at ordered port, or so near thereto as the vessel may safely get. Purchaser taking the said ice from alongside the vessel, at his risk and expense, at the rate of twenty-five tons per running day (Sundays excepted), and to pay for the same in cash on delivery at and after the rate of 20s. sterling per ton of 20cwt. weighed on board during delivery (paying half price for small ice, pieces under 56lb. in weight to be considered as small ice). Should the said purchaser detain the vessel or vessels in discharging above the time above stated, we agree to pay demurrage at the rate of four pence per register ton per day to the vessel.

Averments:

That the plaintiffs are the persons, parties thereto, called "H. Castle and Company," and the vendors; and the defendant is the person, party thereto, called the purchaser. That the said ship with the said cargo of ice on board thereof, amounting to 234 tons of block ice, the same being duly shipped, was despatched with all speed on the said voyage, and that the plaintiffs did forward a bill of lading of the said cargo to the defendant, and that he duly received the same, and afterwards, whilst the said ship with the said cargo on board thereof was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risks and dangers, the said cargo was wholly lost by risks and dangers of the seas, within the meaning of the terms of the said agreement; and all conditions were fulfilled, &c., to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid by the defendant for the said cargo, and to sue the defendant in respect of the matter hereinafter stated. Yet the defendant has not paid the plaintiffs the value of the said cargo, at and after the rate aforesaid, nor any part thereof, and the same still remains wholly due to the plaintiffs.

Further breach:

That the defendant did not nor would take upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas and navigation, according to the said agreement, whereby the value and benefit of the said cargo became and was wholly lost to the plaintiffs, and they were deprived of the profits they would have derived had the defendant kept the said agreement on his part.

The second count was for goods bargained and sold, and for money due on accounts stated.

By his sixth plea, the defendant, as to the said first alleged breach of contract in the said first count, said that he was always ready and willing to buy and receive the said cargo of ice, on its arrival at the ordered port, or so near thereto as the said vessel could safely get, and to pay cash for the said cargo of ice on delivery thereof at the rate aforesaid, and in all things to perform the said agreement on his part; but that the said cargo of ice, so shipped as aforesaid, did not, before this suit, arrive at the said ordered port; nor were the plaintiffs, before this suit, ready or willing to, nor did they, deliver the same cargo there or elsewhere to the defendant according to the said agreement.

The defendant also demurred to the first count in the declaration, on the ground that the arrival and delivery of the cargo of ice at the ordered port were conditions precedent to the defendant's liability to pay for the cargo; and that a total loss of the cargo does not render the defendant liable to be sued as for a breach of the provision to take upon himself all the risks and dangers of the seas, &c.

By their replication, the plaintiffs joined in the said demurrer to their declaration; and they also demurred to the said sixth plea, on the ground that, by the terms of the contract, delivery by the plaintiffs to the defendant, and receipt by him of the bill of lading was equivalent to a receipt by the defendant of the cargo so as to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid by the defendant for the same.

The defendants joined in demurrer to the sixth plea.

The following were the points of argument for the plaintiffs:—First, that the delivery to and receipt by the defendants of the bill of lading, after the dispatch of the vessel with the cargo duly shipped, was the only condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to be paid for the cargo; secondly, that the receipt of the bill of lading by the defendant is equivalent to the receipt of the cargo, under the terms of the contract; thirdly, that the defendant's liability arose upon the receipt by him of the bill of lading, and that the facts averred in the plea do not avoid such liability; fourthly, That the arrival of the ship at the ordered port is not a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to have the defendant take upon himself all the risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever; fifthly, that the matters mentioned as excusing, or in denial of, the defendant's liability, are matters which, on the true construction of the contract, fall to the defendant alone, and do not affect the plaintiffs; sixthly, the plaintiff will also contend that the first count of the declaration is good in substance, on grounds similar to those on which they insist that the sixth plea is bad.

Points of argument for the defendant:—First, that the first count of the declaration is bad because it does not show that the cargo arrived at the place at which the defendant was to purchase and receive the same; secondly, that it shows that such cargo never did arrive at such place; thirdly, that such arrival was, by the terms of the contract between the parties, a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to sue the defendant for the matters alleged as breaches of his contract; fourthly, that the defendant, by the terms of the contract, was not liable to pay for the cargo until it arrived at the ordered port, or to take upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas and navigation, unless the said cargo so arrived; fifthly, that the said first count, so far as it relates to the said breach, is insensible, because the cargo, having been lost before the same reached the defendant or the ordered port, he cannot be liable to the plaintiffs, unless he took upon himself the said risks and dangers; sixthly, that the provision as to the defendant taking upon himself the risks and dangers of the sea was not intended to impose upon the defendant the doing or performing of any act for the not doing or performing of which he was to be liable to be sued by the plaintiffs, but as a mere condition or limitation of the plaintiffs' contract; seventhly, the defendant will also contend that the sixth plea is good also, on the ground that, under the circumstances stated in that plea, the defendant never became liable to pay the value of the cargo; eighthly, that the arrival of the said cargo at the said ordered port was a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to be paid the value of the same.

CASTLE AND OTHERS v. PLAYFORD.

[Ex.]

In the margin of the said contract declared on, there was the following memorandum: "The vessel bringing the cargo to be addressed to H. H. Playford, if to London; and to his agent if to an out-port."

Littler (with him was R. E. Webster), for the defendant, in support of the demurrer to the declaration, and also in support of the plea.—The defendant is not liable to pay. Taking the whole scope of the declaration the intention was, the cargo being a risky one and the voyage from Norway dangerous, that the defendant the vendee should have no right of action against the vendors the plaintiffs, except on delivery. The agreement was to buy the ice on arrival, &c., and as soon as the plaintiffs have done all they can by loading and despatching the cargo, then the defendant will take the risk of the voyage on himself, and will not sue in case of loss. He agrees to buy and take the cargo on its arrival at the ordered port, and to pay for it on delivery a certain price per ton, weighed on board, &c. The provision in the contract, that the weight is to be ascertained "on board during delivery," and "half price to be paid for small ice," shows that this must be so; for if it had turned out to be all "small ice," then only half price would have to be paid for the whole of it; or, if all the cargo had melted away during the voyage, could it be said that the defendant would have then had to pay anything all? The amount and price could not be ascertained until arrival and delivery, which are conditions precedent to payment. The defendant has done all that was intended by the contract for him to do, namely, to protect the vendors from any action in case of loss by sea. It is only by taking the whole agreement together that it can be made clear, consistent, and comprehensible. The defendant does not deny that the plaintiffs did all they could. His contract was not simply to buy, but to buy and receive, and the plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the goods. [CHANNELL, B.—Your argument does not render insensible the words in the contract relating to "risks," for the goods might have arrived deteriorated, and that would have been at the defendant's risk.] Just so. The case of Paynter and others v. James, in the Common Pleas (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 348), though not quite in point, has some bearing on the present case in the defendant's favour. [CLEASBY, B.—You say that saying the purchaser is to take upon himself all risks is the same as saying that the vendors are not to be responsible for any risks?] Quite so. The second breach involves the same question, for if "risks of the seas" here mentioned are and mean what the defendant contends they are and mean, then he, the defendant, did take them upon himself. [MARTIN, B.—These words are no part of the contract at all.] Here there are two concurrent acts contemplated, viz., delivery by the vendors and payment in cash by the purchaser, but the arrival and delivery of the cargo are contracts precedent to the liability to buy and pay for it.

Huddleston, Q.C. (A. M. Channell was with him), contra for the plaintiffs in support of the declaration, and of the demurrer to the plea.—Contracts such as this are well known and usual in the ice trade. The whole must be looked at together. What is it that is to be done? The vendors are to ship the cargo, and, on the same being shipped, they are to forward bills of lading, and, upon receipt thereof, the purchaser is to take upon himself—what? not that he will not sue, as has been said on the other side, but "all risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever." That can only mean that, when the purchaser receives the bills of lading, he may insure and so protect himself. Immediately on the receipt of the bills the property in the cargo vested in the consignee, and gave him an insurable interest, and he became liable to indemnify the plaintiffs against the specified risks:

Dutton v. Solomonson, 3 Bos. & Pul. 582;

Meredith v. Meigh and others, 22 L. J. 401, Q. B.; 2 E. & E. 364;

Brown v. Hare, 27 L. J. 372, Ex.; 3 H. & N. 484; (in error), 29 L. J. 6, Ex.; 4 H. & N. 822.

The effect of the latter clause of the contract is this: The purchaser will take whatever ice does come, and pay for it at a certain rate. The intention of the parties is apparent on the face of the instrument. Suppose the goods to be taken by some person wrongfully, who would bring trover? [CHANNELL, B.—There is no actual contract for sale and purchase until arrival.] The defendant is liable for the value under the contract to insure against risks, though not for the price. The vendors, of course, could not insure, then who is to do so? The contract provides for it. If the court hold with the defendant then there is a loss which the plaintiffs could not provide against. [CLEASBY, B.—It is said that these words relieve the vendors from liability, but suppose the words were not there would they be under any?] The pleader has carefully and properly in the declaration distinguished between value and price, the first breach assumed being that the defendant has not paid the value of the cargo at and after the agreed rate. The declaration, it is submitted, is good, and the plea bad. He referred also to Maude and Pollock on Law of Merchant Shipping, p. 234.

Littler, in reply.—The question is what is the responsibility on the vendee? [CLEASBY, B.—Were there not two events contemplated? You must not assume that the defendant had not an insurable interest.] The insurance office would say to him, "You have no interest." Suppose the cargo lost by running down, no one but the plaintiffs could sue. The contract is not divisible. It is no part of the agreement that the defendant is to pay for the goods if they are lost. A distinction cannot be drawn here between value and price. The contract is one of purchase and sale, and the vendors' interest continues until that of the purchaser begins, and that begins on arrival. [CLEASBY, B.—Does not the contract say, in the plainest possible terms, that, upon and after the receipt of the bills of lading, the goods are to be at the risk of the purchaser?] I submit that an action would lie even in the absence of these words, and if they be put in ex majori cautela, to protect him, why should that make the defendant liable?

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court. The case depends of course entirely on the meaning of the contract into which the parties have entered, and which is set out in the declaration. The words in the margin of the document, as to the address to which the vessel was to be directed, have no bearing on the subject. The contract was this: "It is this day agreed between J. Castle and Co., of [redacted], as vendors, and H. H. Playford, as purchaser." It then goes on to state what the vendors are to do, and it says that they are to "ship with every despatch, and in the customary manner, a cargo of freshwater ice, in square blocks, say per result 170 register tons, all in good and clean condition, and on the same being duly shipped the vessel is to be despatched with all speed direct to any port captain likes best, for orders to unload at one safe place in the United Kingdom, twenty-four hours allowed for waiting orders, lay days to count." Up to this point all is clear. It then proceeds thus: "The said vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, and upon receipt thereof the said purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever." The real question in this case is, what is the true meaning of these words? In my opinion, the plaintiffs did not undertake to deliver the goods at the port of discharge, but to forward bills of lading, and that the defendant on receipt of them would have an insurable interest. I believe the true meaning to be that, on their doing that, any liability which they might be under with regard to the cargo should cease; but not that the purchaser (the defendant) was to take all these risks and pay for the cargo, at all events, whether lost or not—that is not said. And here ends the part of the vendors in the matter, and then begins the part of the purchaser. Now, what does the contract proceed to say as to that? Why this—"and the said H. H. Playford agrees to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, or as near thereunto, &c., the purchaser taking the said ice from alongside the vessel at his risk and expense, &c., and to pay for the same on delivery at and after the rate of 20s. sterling per ton of 20cwt. weighed on board during delivery (paying half price for small ice, pieces under 56lb. in weight to be considered as small ice)." When, and what then, is the defendant to pay for the ice? Why, on delivery, at the specified rate per ton weighed on board during delivery. In my opinion, the property in that ice would not pass to the defendant until it was so weighed on board. The arrival of the ice at the ordered port, and its being weighed on board during delivery, are conditions precedent to the liability of the defendant to be sued for the price or value of the ice. If it was meant that the defendant was to pay for the ice, even though it should be lost by perils of the sea, that is not expressed in the contract.

PIERCE v. THE JERSEY WATERWORKS COMPANY (LIMITED.)

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question is entirely what is the proper construction of this agreement, which is a contract of purchase, and not of insurance. I agree in thinking that this is not a contract for insurance, but of purchase. The defendant here is sued for nonpayment of the price, and the question is whether or not he has broken his contract with regard to the payment of the price. [His Lordship here read the contract from the commencement down to and inclusive of the clause relating to the risks and dangers of the seas, &c., and then proceeded as follows.] The question is whether these latter words, as to the purchaser's taking these risks upon himself, introduce the construction contended for by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs. They cannot, I think, be struck out of the agreement, looking at the place where they are introduced; but down to them I see no contract binding on the defendant. There is a contract on the part of Castle and Co. to ship a cargo of ice, and to forward bills of lading. Then the defendant agrees to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, &c. Now from that time he (the defendant) stands in the place of the proposed purchaser. The clause as to the risk of the seas removes from the defendant any right to sue the plaintiffs for non-arrival of the ice by perils of the sea. Attention has very properly been called by Mr. Huddleston to the distinction between price and value; and though I was at first somewhat inclined to think that, though the goods never arrived, and therefore the plaintiffs would not be entitled to sue for the price of them, yet they might nevertheless be entitled to sue for their value, yet on reconsideration I think that substantially they mean the same thing, and that the distinction between them, if any, does not alter the terms of the agreement between the parties as to the time of payment, which is fixed by such agreement to be on the arrival of the cargo at the ordered port. I agree therefore with my brother Martin in thinking that our judgment in this case must be for the defendant.

CLEASBY, B.—I am always exceedingly sorry to differ in opinion from the rest of the court, and especially in a case like the present, involving questions of mercantile law, in which my learned brothers have had so much experience. In my judgment, however, the declaration in this case is founded, not on an agreement to pay money, but rather on the loss of goods, and in effect it charges that the defendant by his conduct has not taken upon himself the risk of loss by dangers of the sea, &c., which he had contracted to take. Now this agreement contemplated two events. It contemplated first of all the event of the cargo being lost by the perils and dangers of the sea, and secondly the event of the vessel arriving at the ordered port. But we cannot apply one part of the agreement having especial reference to one alternative, to another part of it which relates to another and entirely different alternative; but we must look strictly at that part of the agreement which has reference to that event which has occurred, namely, the loss of the goods at sea. Now, what are the words of the contract with reference to that event? They are these—"the said vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, and upon receipt thereof, the said purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever." I believe that the object and intention of this was to show whose duty it was to insure the goods, and that it was the intention of the parties that, as soon as the property in the goods was so transferred by the transmission and receipt of the bills of lading, from the vendors to the purchaser, the purchaser was to insure the goods, and to undertake all future risks of loss by perils of the sea. If he did insure, and got their value, then, as between himself and the plaintiffs, he was not to make a profit. The object was that neither party should be a loser. What has the clause reference to? Not to the vessel, but to the cargo. The vendors have done all that they could do. I can only read the clause thus: as soon as ever you, the purchaser, receive this bill of lading, from that moment the goods are in you and at your risk. I think the declaration discloses a sufficiently good cause of action, and that judgment should therefore be for the plaintiffs.

PIERCE v. THE JERSEY WATERWORKS COMPANY (LIMITED.)

Joint-stock company—Articles of association—Allotment of a certain number of shares—Condition precedent to existence of the company—Contract—Work and labour—Companies Act 1862.

A joint-stock company was registered under the Companies Act 1862, with articles of association. The articles provided that, when and so soon as 3000 shares in the company should have been subscribed for and allotted, the members of the company for the time being should be and continue associated for the objects of the company, and the regulations for the management thereof should be in force and binding on such members in like manner as if the whole of the shares into which the capital was divided had been subscribed for and allotted. The plaintiff was employed by the directors at a time when only 350 shares in the company were subscribed for and allotted, and brought this action to recover salary due in respect of such employment :

Held, that the effect of the articles was that, until the allotment of 3000 shares, the defendant company did not become associated for the purposes thereof, nor had the persons named as directors by the articles any authority to bind the company, and that therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Declaration for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiff for work done, journeys performed, attendances bestowed, and materials provided by the plaintiff as an engineer and otherwise, for the defendants at their request, and for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendants at their request, and for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendants, and for interest upon money due from the defendants to the plaintiff, and forborne at interest by the plaintiff to the defendants at their request, and for money found to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff on accounts stated between them.

Pleas :

1. Never indebted. 2. That the defendants were an incorporated company with liability limited by shares formed and registered under the Companies Act 1862, and that certain articles of association were duly made and registered with their memorandum of association, which were the articles of association and regulations of the company and of the members thereof, according to the provisions of the Companies' Act 1862, at the time the plaintiff's claim is alleged to have accrued; and by the said articles of association it was, amongst other things, prescribed and agreed as follows:—1. None of the regulations of table A. to the Companies Act 1862 annexed, shall apply, except such as are embodied in these articles. 2. When and so soon as 3000 shares in the company shall have been subscribed for and allotted, the members of the company for the time being shall be and continue associated for the objects of the company, and the regulations for the management thereof shall be in force and binding on such members, in like manner as if the whole of the shares into which the nominal capital is divided had been subscribed for and allotted; and after the directors shall have allotted any number less than the whole of the shares, they shall have power to allot the remainder thereof, or any part of the same, from time to time as they shall think fit, and on such terms and conditions as the members shall, by a resolution passed at a general meeting either ordinary or extraordinary direct, and if no such direction shall be in existence, then upon such terms and conditions as the directors shall determine. All premiums which may be realised in the issuing of such shares shall be the property of the company. And the defendants further say that at the time at which the claim in the declaration and every part thereof is alleged to have accrued to the plaintiff the said articles were in full force, and binding on the company and its members, and 3000 shares in the defendants' said company had not been subscribed for and allotted, and the said claim and every part thereof was incurred in respect of other matters than those which the defendants were then by reason of the premises empowered to transact, and in respect of business which the company and the directors thereof were not, by reason of the premises, then empowered to carry on, of which the plaintiff then had notice, and is a claim which the said company could not then, by reason of the premises, contract to be liable for, and were not liable to pay.

Replications:—1. Joinder of issue; 2. To the second plea—

That certain of the said articles of association in the said plea mentioned, and which it is in the said plea alleged bound the company at the time the plaintiff's claim is alleged to have accrued are in the words and figures following:—“56. No person shall be appointed a director unless he shall hold not less than fifty shares in the company. 60. The directors may, by resolution, and without any writing under the seal of the company, hire, appoint, and employ, such person or persons to be secretary, solicitor, clerk, manager, or servants of the company, either in this country or in Jersey, to assist in carrying out the purposes of their undertaking, or any of them, and that at such salary or other remuneration as they shall think fit. They shall also have power to remove any such officer or servant by resolution of a majority of their number, and to appoint any other person or persons in his place or stead, and so from time to time when and so often as they shall deem necessary, or proper, or convenient. The said directors shall also have power to delegate to their secretary, or to any other officer of the company, authority to enter into, on behalf of the company, all contracts in Jersey which they shall deem necessary or convenient for the purposes of the company. The directors shall also have power to pay or appropriate to any secretary, manager, clerk or other officer or servant of the company, or give him power over any sum or sums of money which they shall deem necessary or convenient for payment of wages or other small outgoings on behalf of the company. 61. The directors shall have full power to apply to the Legislature or to any other authority or authorities in the Island of Jersey, competent to grant the same, for all and every or any such act or acts of the state, licence or licences, powers or authorities, as the directors shall at any time or times, or from time to time, think necessary or proper or convenient for the purposes of the company, and also to pledge the company to the performance of all such acts, matters or things as shall be prescribed as conditional on the grant of any such act or acts, licence or licences, powers or authorities, and for all or any one or more of the purposes aforesaid, the directors shall have full power to authorise any one or more of their number, or to direct any one or more of their officers (except the solicitor) to procure any such licence or licences, power, or authorities to be obtained in his or their names. The directors shall, out of the funds of the company, indemnify any director or directors, manager, or other officers against all losses and liabilities which he or they shall incur in the performance of his or their respective duties, or in carrying into effect the order of the directors, or of any general meeting. 62. In all other respects the business of the company shall be managed by the directors, who shall, when and so soon as 3000 of the shares shall have been subscribed for, pay to the said Messrs. Easton, Amos, and Sons, the sum of 2000*l.* as before mentioned, and the directors may also exercise all such powers of the company as are not, by the Companies' Act 1862, or by these articles, required to be exercised by the company in general meeting, subject nevertheless to any regulation of these articles, to the provisions of the foregoing Act, and to such regulations (being not inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions) as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting, but no regulation made by the company in general meeting shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such regulations had not then been made. 63. Subject to the restrictions herein expressly contained the directors shall have power to do all acts and things which they may consider proper or advantageous for the carrying on of the business of the company, and for this purpose they may from time to time and on such terms and conditions as they may think advisable, enter into and accept and perfect such purchases, sales, mortgages, contracts, leases, licences, and agreements, as they may think fit, and may from time to time carry out, vary, modify, abandon, or surrender, any such contracts, loans, licences, and agreements, and enter into and perfect any other or others in substitution or place thereof. 64. The directors may, for the business of the company, borrow money on bonds of the company, or on mortgage or other security of the company's property, at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, but so, nevertheless, that the liabilities to be contracted by all such means shall not at any time exceed in the whole an equal fourth part of the total subscribed capital for the time being of the company, and it shall be competent for any of the directors to make advances to the company on such bonds, mortgages, or other securities.” And the plaintiff says that the said claim alleged in the declaration accrued to him, and was incurred in respect of matters and businesses which the plaintiff had been hired, appointed, and employed by the directors of the said company, by resolution of the said directors, to transact and perform in this country and in Jersey to assist in carrying out the purposes of their undertaking, and which matters and businesses were preliminary and necessary to enable the defendants to commence and carry on the general business of the said company, and for moneys paid and liabilities incurred by him on behalf of the defendants for a like purpose in performance of his duties in carrying into effect the orders of the said directors, and that the said matters and businesses were transacted and performed, and the said moneys were paid and liabilities incurred by the plaintiff as aforesaid for the purposes aforesaid, and for the sole use and benefit of the defendants, and that the said defendants have had and enjoyed, and still have and are enjoying, the sole use and benefit accruing from the same respectively. 8. Repeating the allegation in the second replication, and alleging that neither at the time at which was so hired, appointed, and employed as aforesaid, nor at the time when the said claim in his said declaration mentioned accrued, had the plaintiff notice that 3000 shares in the defendants' said company had not been subscribed for and allotted.

PIERCE v. THE JERSEY WATERWORKS COMPANY (LIMITED.)

[Ex.]

Issues thereon.

The trial took place before Bramwell, B. at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, when the facts appeared to be as follows:—

The defendants were registered as a company, with memorandum and articles of association, on the 19th June 1863. The memorandum stated that the name of the company was the Jersey Waterworks Company (Limited); that the registered office of the company would be situate in England; and that the objects for which it was established were the procuring in the Island of Jersey of a supply of water for the use of St. Heliers, and the other towns or places in such island, and for that purpose the doing of all such acts as the directors are authorised to do by the accompanying articles of association of the company.

The articles of association recited that certain persons had interested themselves in the promotion of the company, and had expended moneys and incurred liabilities for that purpose; that it would become necessary that before the company was fully carried out further moneys should be expended and liabilities incurred for the purpose of procuring from the Legislature of Jersey an Act to enable the company to carry out the objects of their undertaking; and that it was deemed reasonable and just by those who had agreed to join in the promotion of the company that the sum of 2000*l.* should be paid to Messrs. Easton, Amos, and Sons, who had undertaken to receive the same on behalf of the aforesaid promoters as the full and unqualified remuneration for the moneys which had been and would be expended, and the liabilities which had been or would be incurred, and the time and labour which had been or would be employed by or on behalf of the said promoters, as before mentioned, in full discharge of their said claims, down to and including the expenses of the registration and incorporation of the said company, and of obtaining the said Act of State, and other powers as aforesaid, and the procuring to be subscribed an amount of capital in the said company to the extent of 3000 shares therein at the least, and also the remuneration of the directors, until such time as there should be a profit arising from the undertaking. After these recitals were contained inter alia the provisions set out in the pleadings. The plaintiff was an engineer, and had been employed as the company's engineer by a resolution of the directors in the year 1868. At the time of his employment only 350 shares were allotted. It was found by the jury that he had no notice that this was so. The present action was brought for salary and expenses alleged to be due to him.

It was objected by defendants' counsel that the 3000 shares never having been allotted, the company never came into existence, and therefore no liability could have been incurred by them to the plaintiff. The learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants reserving leave to plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 500*l.*, the amount found to be due to him by the jury.

A rule nisi was obtained to enter a verdict pursuant to the leave reserved, and also for a new trial on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury in directing them to find for the defendants on the issue on the second replication, but inasmuch as it clearly appeared that there was substantially no evidence for the jury that the plaintiff's claim was in respect of necessary preliminary expenses, so much of the facts and arguments as related to the misdirection, are omitted as immaterial to the report.

Powell, Q. C., and Shaw, now showed cause.—It is admitted that the 3000 shares were never subscribed, but it is also found that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the fact. His ignorance of it is immaterial, for, by the articles, it is a condition precedent to the coming into existence of the company at all that the 3000 shares should have been subscribed for and allotted. The terms of the clause altogether preclude the supposition that any company was to exist until that condition was fulfilled. Till then it was plainly intended, as may be seen by reference to the preamble or recitals to the articles, that the company should be in a state of promotion merely. In the North Staffordshire Steel, &c., Company v. Ward, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 172; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445, where a clause in the articles of association provided that in case the whole of the shares into which the nominal capital of the company was divided should not be subscribed for or allotted, the registered members of the company for the time being should, if the directors should, by resolution so declare, be and continue associated for the objects thereof, it was held that until the whole of the capital was subscribed for or allotted, or the directors had passed a formal resolution for carrying on the company, the directors had no power to make a call. The only difference between that case and the present is that there the question arose between the company and a shareholder, here it is between the company and third persons. That can make no difference in the result. It is clear that the plaintiff was bound to take notice of the provisions of the articles of association. In Ernest v. Nicholls, 6 H. of L. 401, Lord Wensleydale says, "All persons must take notice of the deed and the provisions of the Act. If they do not choose to acquaint themselves with the powers of the directors it is their own fault; and if they give credit to any unauthorised persons, they must be content to look to them only, and not the company at large. The stipulations of the deed which restrict and regulate their authority are obligatory on those who deal with the company; and the directors can make no contract so as to bind the whole company of shareholders for whose protection the rules are made, unless they are strictly complied with." The class of cases which may be relied on, on the other side, are of an altogether different character. They are cases where the directors, having general powers of management, and intending to act in the exercise of such powers have omitted to comply with some formal preliminary required by the articles of association. The failure to comply with these merely preliminary and directory provisions, inasmuch as it could not reasonably be expected that the party dealing with the company could have any knowledge of it, has been held not to invalidate the contract. See:

Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 5 E. & B. 248, 6 E. & B. 327;

Agar v. Athenæum Assurance Society, 3 C. B., N. S., 725;

Prince of Wales Assurance Society v. Harding, 1 E. B. & E. 183.

In the case of a joint-stock company, the general clauses of the Companies' Act 1862 and the memorandum and articles of association all taken together are equivalent to the special Act of a company, like a railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament. The effect is that this clause of the articles is not a merely directory provision, but it is like a clause in a special Act enacting that no company should come into existence until the requisite number of shares had been subscribed, and therefore the subscription for and allotment of these shares was an essential requisite to the very existence of this company. Mayor of Norwich v. The Norfolk Railway Company, 4 E. & B. 445.

Clarke, Q. C. (with him J. Edward Wilkins), supported the rule.—It is submitted that this provision is merely effectual as between the directors and the shareholders. It is inserted in accordance with a suggestion thrown out by Wilde, B. in the Ornamental Pyrographic Woodwork Company v. Brown, for the protection of the shareholders against any attempt on the part of the directors to carry on the company, though the requisite capital may not have been subscribed for. No doubt the directors might, under such circumstances, be restrained by injunction; but the case is altogether different as regards third parties, and so the North Stafford Steel, &c., Company v. Ward is not in point; third persons cannot possibly have any notice whether the condition has been complied with. They are bound, no doubt, to take notice of the deed or articles of association, and if it appears from the terms of that instrument that the contract is ultra vires, they cannot enforce it; but they are not affected by the existence or non-existence of preliminaries, of which they can have no knowledge; they are entitled to presume their existence. See the Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 E. & B. 327. Here the plaintiff could not be expected to know whether the requisite number of shares had been allotted; he had no right to inspect the register, and his possibility of knowledge could only depend on the company's making the prescribed return half yearly to the registrar of joint-stock companies. The reasonable inference to be drawn from the opinion expressed by the court in the case of Ex parte Ward, re The North Stafford Steel Company (sup.), is that a company, even where there is a clause such as this in the articles of association, does not fail to exist for all purposes. In that case the court refused to strike the applicant's name off the register on the ground that there might be preliminary expenses, for prospectuses, rent, and clerks, which the company might well incur, even though ultimately the requisite capital would not be subscribed for, and the company fail to become established. The result is, that such a clause is not a condition precedent to the coming into existence of the company, but only to its being ultimately permanently carried on. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff was justified in assuming that it was properly and fully established, and is entitled to recover. The question of ultra vires is quite a different one as between shareholders and the company and strangers and the company. The confusion in the use of the term is regretted by Blackburn, J. in his judgment in Taylor v. The Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company (sup.) [BRAMWELL, B.—“Ultra vires” supposes some “vires,” here there seem never to have been any.] They cannot deny their existence as a company. They are registered under the Companies Act upon which incorporation is complete, and their existence is admitted in the pleadings. If the provisions of their articles are contrary to the statute, the articles must yield; they cannot deny their existence in the face of the registration. They also cited

Orr v. The Glasgow Railway Company, 2
L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 3 McQueen, 799.

MARTIN, B.—I think this rule must be discharged. In my opinion, according to the terms of the articles of association, this company did not come into existence or become associated for the purposes of the memorandum of association until 3000 shares were subscribed for and allotted. That, in my judgment, is the true construction of the second article. Till that condition was fulfilled there was no company which could enter into such a contract as this as a corporation, although the directors might as individuals. If, as Mr. Wilkins says, there were anything in the Companies Act contrary to this provision of the articles of association the case would be different. But I can see nothing of the sort. The Act expressly provides that the articles of association to be registered with the memorandum shall govern the constitution of the company. Under these circumstances there was no company able to make the contract at the time the contract with the plaintiff was made, though it may be that there existed a body of directors capable of contracting. I should be very much surprised if any contract could be binding on a company which was made before it came into existence for the purposes of its incorporation. In the cases of special Acts it has been often provided that preliminary expenses incurred by the promoters should be borne by the company, but then the liability does not truly arise upon contract, but upon the express provision of the statute.

CLEASBY, B.—I have come to the same conclusion. By sect. 14 the memorandum of association, when registered, may, in the case of a company limited by shares, be accompanied by articles of association, signed by the subscribers to the memorandum of association, and prescribing such regulations for the company as the subscribers to the memorandum shall deem expedient. These articles form the very constitution of the company. The judgment of Wilde, B., in the Ornamental, &c. Woodwork Company v. Brown, shows this, for he says: “The Act of Parliament substantially provides for this: seven men may, if they like, form a sort of partnership, and they may do it by signing a memorandum of association, and they may, if they like (and the Act of Parliament invites them to do it), add to the memorandum of association a set of regulations, and amongst these regulations they may, if they like, add a condition that the business shall not be commenced till a definite amount is subscribed.” What would be the good of such a condition if the company could afterwards be made responsible, as the plaintiff now seeks to make them?

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. It appears to me very right that the law should be so. The person who prepared these articles no doubt intended to make the shareholders absolutely safe against the directors, and that no liability should be incurred until the whole number of shares had been taken up. It is most desirable that the law should give validity to such an arrangement if possible. When we look at the recitals, it seems clear that the company was not to become associated for the purpose of commencing business until this condition was complied with. The preliminary expenses are all provided for, and then it is provided that so soon as the 3000 shares are taken up, the members shall be associated for the purposes of the company. Are they then to be associated before for those purposes? Certainly not. The only difficulty has been referred to by my brother Cleasby, namely, that by the 6th section of the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 81), on registration a corporation is formed. But what are the words of the Act? “Any seven or more persons associated for any lawful purpose, may by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of this Act in respect of registration, form an incorporated company with or without limited liability." They may do so, and if they had chosen to do so here, they might have become immediately a company fully established and associated for the purposes of the company. But I think, on the other hand, it was quite competent for the defendants to enter into an arrangement of the sort they have entered into, and that there is nothing in the Act to prevent them. If somehow or other an incorporated company existed immediately upon the registration, still the persons who engaged the plaintiff were not directors of the defendants' company, or entitled to bind the defendants, for previously to the taking up of the three thousand shares, quoad the defendants' company, they stood merely in the position of promoters, and not directors at all, inasmuch as till then there was no association for the purposes of the company, and therefore no authority to anyone to act quod director.

REG. v. SVEN SEBERG.

Offences on high seas.—British ship—Proof—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 106.

The prisoner maliciously wounded B. on board a ship on the high seas. Oral evidence was given that the ship was a British ship of the port of Shields, sailing under the British flag, but no proof of the ship's register or ownership was given;

Held, that the courts of this country had jurisdiction to try the offender.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Hannen, J. :—

At the spring assizes for Cornwall, upon an indictment which charged the prisoner with maliciously wounding one W. — Bedlington, with intent to do him grievous bodily harm,

It was proved at the trial that the prisoner was a sailor on board the barque Statesman, and that while on the high seas on a voyage from Alexandria to Falmouth he inflicted on W. — Bedlington, the mate of the vessel, a dangerous wound with a knife.

The master, the boatswain, and one of the crew of the Statesman all stated that the vessel was a British ship of Shields, and that she was sailing under the British flag, but no proof of the register of the vessel or of the ownership was given.

It was objected on behalf of the prisoner that this evidence was not sufficient to establish that the ship was a British ship, and that without proof of the ship having been registered as a British ship, the prisoner could not be convicted.

I reserved the point for the consideration of this court.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and he was sentenced by me.

JAMES HANNEN.

BOVILL, C. J.—We think the conviction in this case was correct. The evidence was, in our opinion, sufficient to prove that the vessel was a British ship, without proof of her having been registered; and, even if it had appeared that she had not been registered, we think the prisoner ought still to have been convicted, first, because there is nothing in the Merchant Shipping Act to take away the criminal jurisdiction of the court; and next by reason of the provision at the end of the 106th section of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), (a) which provides that as regards the punishment of offences committed on board such a ship, she shall be dealt with in the same manner as if she was a recognised British ship. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

THE WEST LONDON EXTENSION RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE FULHAM UNION AND THE OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF FULHAM (resps.)

Order of reference—12 & 13 Vict. c. 45—Award—Costs.

By sect. 13 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, it is enacted that "it shall be lawful for any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace before which any appeal . . . shall be brought, to order, with the consent of the parties, . . . that the matter or matters of such appeal be referred to arbitration to such person or persons, and in such manner and on such terms, as the said court shall think reasonable and proper."

An appeal having been entered at sessions against an assessment for the relief of the poor, the sessions ordered that the "matter in dispute" should be referred to arbitration. The order of reference was silent as to costs. The arbitrator made his award, and ordered "that the said appeal be dismissed, and that the appellants do pay to the respondents their costs of the said appeal."

Held, that although it was in the power of the justices at quarter sessions to have conferred upon the arbitrator an authority to award costs, yet they had not given him such authority by ordering only that the "matter in dispute" should be referred. The arbitrator had therefore exceeded his power, and the award must be sent back to him to be amended.

Rule calling on the respondents to show cause why an award should not be set aside or be referred back to the arbitrator on the ground that he had no power to award costs.

The West London Extension Railway Company having appealed to quarter sessions against a rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor of the parish of Fulham, the sessions, by consent, referred the consideration of the matter in dispute to an arbitrator, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 (Baines' Act), s. 13. The material part of the order of reference was as follows :—"It is further ordered, by and with the consent of counsel on both sides, that the matter in dispute between the appellants and respondents herein shall be referred to John Gray, Esq. . . . to inquire into and arbitrate thereon, the said

Whenever it is declared by this Act that a ship to any person or body corporate, qualified according to this Act to be owners of British ships, shall not be recognised as a British ship, such ship shall not be entitled to any benefits, privileges, advantages, or protection usually enjoyed by British ships, and shall not be entitled to use the British flag or assume the British national character; but so far as regards the payment of dues, the liability to pains and penalties, and the punishment of offences committed on board such ship or by any persons belonging to her, such ship shall be dealt with in the same manner in all respects as if she were a recognised British ship.

Q. B.] WEST LONDON EXTENSION RAIL. CO. v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF FULHAM UNION, &C. [Q. B.]

several parties agreeing and consenting to abide the report of such his arbitration; and that an order in concurrence therewith should be drawn up accordingly. And it is further ordered that notice in the meantime be given unto the assessment committee of the Fulham Union, and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, that they and all persons concerned do attend the court at the said Guildhall at Westminster on Friday, the 30th April next . . . to hear and abide by the judgment and determination of the said court touching the said appeal."

In the order of reference no mention of costs was made. The arbitrator heard the case, and made his award, which concluded in these terms, viz.:—

Now I do make my award of and according to the premises as follows:—I do award and order that the said appeal be dismissed, and that the appellants do pay to the respondents their costs of the said appeal, to be taxed by a proper officer of the court of quarter sessions in the usual manner.

Huddleston, Q. C., and Murphy showed cause. It is contended by the other side that as the order of reference is silent as to costs, the umpire had no power to award them. The question here is whether this is a reference under the 13th section of Baines' Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), or whether it is merely a reference by the court under the power which it always had, not to delegate its authority, but to order a previous adjustment by consent of the parties to be determined finally by the court. If the reference was under Baines' Act there would be no necessity to adjourn the appeal, for sect. 13, after giving a power of referring matters of appeal to arbitration, enacts that "the award of the arbitrator . . . may on motion by either party at the sessions next or next but one after such award . . . shall have been finally made and published, or after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on any motion for setting aside the same, be entered as the judgment of the court of general or quarter sessions in the appeal, and shall be as binding and effectual to all intents as if given by the said court." They make the order of reference with the consent of the parties, and the award is entered as the judgment of the court—a mere ministerial act. The court say they adjourn the hearing and determining the matter of the appeal, but refer the matter in dispute. The words "matter in dispute" mean something more than the hearing of the appeal, they mean the hearing of the appeal and the question of costs. They adjourn the question of appeal, but refer the whole question over which they have jurisdiction, viz., the appeal and the costs, to the determination of the arbitrator. This is analogous to the ordinary case of a reference. In the text books it is laid down that where in an order of reference nothing is said about costs, the arbitrator has implied authority to deal with that subject, although no power to deal with the costs of the award:

Watson on Awards, p. 123;

Russell on Awards, 5th edit., p. 359.

So here, when the quarter sessions adjourns the hearing of the appeal, but refers to an arbitrator the matter in dispute, they include not only the hearing of the appeal, but the costs which are a matter in dispute: (Firth v. Robinson, 1 B. & C. 277.) [COCKBURN, C. J.—In that case the cause and all matters in difference were referred, but here, the cause and the "matter in dispute" only.] In Roe d. Wood v. Doe, 2 Term Rep. 644 it was held that an arbitrator may award costs without any express authority for that purpose. [COCKBURN, C. J. referred to Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 880, 580; 6 B. & S. 531.] When the court delegates the "matter in dispute," it delegates all its power. [MELLOR, J.—That is just my difficulty. Do not the terms of the order mean that the sessions keep to themselves the final judgment as to the costs of the appeal? BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose a cause referred simpliciter without anything said about costs; do not the costs follow the verdict, whether the arbitrator says anything about them or not? Under the 13th section of Baines' Act, the sessions might well have said the costs should be determined by the arbitrator, but they abstain from saying that in their order of reference: (Leggo v. Young, 16 C. B. 626.) MELLOR, J., cited Reg. v. The Justices of Staffordshire, 7 E. & B. 935.] There is a distinction between the state of things at the time of the appeal to quarter sessions and afterwards. At the time the quarter sessions came to make the order, costs had been incurred to a considerable amount, and there was a substantial question of law. In addition to that, further costs have to be incurred, and thereupon the quarter sessions direct "that the matter in dispute between the appellants and respondents herein shall be referred." Does the analogy to a case referred at Nisi Prius hold or not? The grounds of appeal to quarter sessions are like pleadings. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is not the difference this, that in the case of a cause referred, if one party obtains a verdict, he is victor, and gets costs; but does not the Act here make this distinction, that it does not make costs depend on success, but leaves them in the discretion of the court? BLACKBURN, J., referred to Bell v. Postelthwaite, 5 E. & B. 695, deciding that "an arbitrator appointed under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 3, has no power over the costs either of the cause, reference, or award, unless the rule or order appointing the arbitrator gives it to him; and where the rule is silent, the successful party under such a reference can have no costs. But in a case where it appeared that the parties had drawn up the rule in a general form under the mistaken belief that, nothing being said, the costs would abide the event, the court, after the award had been published, amended the rule of reference, so as to make it express the intention of the court." Is not that a strong case against you?] It certainly is, but in that case the other decisions were not referred to. [MELLOR, J.—As Lord Campbell suggests, the next Court of Quarter Sessions may be differently constituted. COCKBURN, C. J.—And yet have to decide the question of costs on the merits, whereas the justices at the next quarter sessions, being different, are not in the same position as those at the former court to determine the costs.]

Field, Q. C. and Carter, for the appellant, were not called upon to support the rule.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The rule must, I think, be made absolute on the ground that all that is referred by the justices at quarter sessions to the arbitrator, is a power of deciding the matter in dispute between the parties to the appeal. Now if the decision of the matter in dispute had necessarily come again before the quarter sessions to which the appeal was, I should have been disposed to think that, in referring the matter in dispute to the arbitrator, they referred inferentially the power to award costs; but it appears that the right to costs was not the necessary consequence of success in the appeal, for by the Act of Parliament the power to grant costs by the court of quarter sessions is discretionary. Therefore it does not follow that because the matter in dispute is decided one way or another the costs are to abide the event; and I take it that, where the power to award costs is discretionary, in order to give an arbitrator to whom the matter in dispute is referred authority to give costs there must be a power to exercise a discretionary authority. Here the order of quarter sessions is silent as to costs. The cases of Bell v. Postelthwaite, as well as Reg.

Q. B.]

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

v. Justices of West Riding of Yorkshire, contain a point which is much like the present one, although not exactly the same. I ground my decision on this, viz., that it is discretionary in the quarter sessions to give costs or not to give them, notwithstanding they decided the appeal either way, and that power was not in the terms of the order for reference given to the arbitrator.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The quarter sessions, when sitting on appeal in an ordinary matter, can give costs at their discretion, and they have to decide whether costs are to be allowed or not. Then by Baines' Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45) s. 13, it is enacted that "it shall be lawful for any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace before which any appeal . . . shall be brought to order with the consent of the parties . . . that the matter or matters of such appeal be referred to arbitration to such person or persons, and in such manner and on such terms, as the said court shall think reasonable and proper." Under that section I have no doubt in my mind, and there is none, that the quarter sessions might make an order awarding in terms either that the costs of the appeal should abide the award, or that the costs of the appeal should be in the discretion of the arbitrator; either the one or the other they might do. Then comes the question, have they referred it in these terms: "it is further ordered by and with the consent of counsel on both sides that the matter in dispute between the appellants and respondents herein shall be referred to John Gray, Esq., . . . to inquire into and arbitrate thereon, the said several parties agreeing and consenting to abide the report of such his arbitration?" On that, can it be said the quarter sessions referred it to the arbitrator to give these costs, where it was in the power of the quarter sessions to say "he should decide it." They have used these words, out of which I cannot gather, even in a case where the costs would follow the event, an authority to the arbitrator to award them. Very similar words are made use of in Bell v. Postelthwaite (sup.). There the arbitrator was appointed under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 3, in which the word "costs" is expressly named, whereas in Baines' Act the words are merely general. In the above mentioned case a rule had been drawn up by mistake and was entirely silent as to costs, the parties supposing the costs would abide the event, and this court amended the rule by adding that the costs should abide the event. I think this is a stronger case, and we cannot say that the quarter sessions gave power to the arbitrator to give costs. That being so, he has added something to his award which he ought not to have done. I think, therefore, the award should be sent back to him.

MELLOR, J.—I entirely agree in the conclusion at which the court has arrived. It is clear it must be conceded that the quarter sessions have power to refer the question of costs. In many sessions it is even the rule not to give costs and let parties go without. There are matters in which references are without costs, and I am by no means sure that in this case it was not the intention of the parties that the reference should be without costs. If a power over them was to be given to the arbitrator, it should have been so stated. The parties may consent to his determining the question of costs, or may not consent, and it appears to me that, so far as can be ascertained from the order of reference, they have not done so.

Rule absolute.

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

Landlord and tenant—Demise of land, with option of taking more—Distress—Fixtures—Railway sleepers and rails.

Where there is a demise of land, with an option given to the lessee to take additional land from the lessor upon certain conditions; on the exercise by the lessee of that option the additional land is to be considered as taken under the original demise, and not as constituting the subject-matter of a new demise.

A lease of lands empowered the lessee to construct upon a certain portion of the lands, which was specified in the lease, such railways and other works as should be proper for the working of certain mines on the lands, and also to build upon any other part not exceeding fifty acres, which should be approved in writing by the lessor, such buildings, &c., as might be required for the working of the mines then or thereafter to be opened. A railway having afterwards been constructed on a part of the lands, other than the portion originally specified in the lease, which was approved of by the lessor, but not in writing:

Held, that the subsequent assent of the lessor to the construction of buildings, &c., on this portion of the land did not amount to a new demise, so as to make a joint distress on both portions of the land illegal; and that the stipulation as to the lessor's assent being in writing, being one intended for his benefit, might be waived by him, and was waived by his verbal assent to the construction of the railway on the new portion of land.

Rails and sleepers forming a railway used for the purpose of working a colliery, which are laid upon a level surface, the rails being nailed to the sleepers, and the sleepers kept dry and in position by quantities of hard and dry material, called ballast, placed under and about them, which prevents the sleepers being removed without its previous displacement, and without holes being formed by its falling in, are not distrainable for rent, even though they are in practice shifted about from time to time to meet the requirements of the colliery.

1. This was an action brought to recover damages for the breaking and entering a mine of the plaintiff situate under certain land called Tyr-y-Crenin, and the seizing, severing, and carrying away the plant, machinery, and other fixtures, tools, goods, and chattels of the plaintiff therein and thereon, and the selling and disposing of the same by the defendant to his own use, whereby the plaintiff lost the same and the security of the said plant, machinery, fixtures, tools, and chattels, which he had under a bill of sale from John William Jeffery O'Donoghue for securing 2000*l.*, and interest then owing to him the plaintiff, and for breaking and entering a close called Clement's Field, and the seizing and carrying away goods and chattels of plaintiff therein, and for seizing, taking, carrying away, and disposing of (among other things) several fixtures, buildings, rails, sleepers, railways, tramways, waggons, weighing machines, implements of manufacture, tools, machinery, timber, and materials, and for converting to defendant's own use goods and chattels of the like description as those last mentioned, and wrongfully depriving plaintiff thereof. To this declaration the defendant pleaded not guilty (by stat. 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, sect. 21), on which plea issue was joined.

2. At the last spring assizes for the county of Glamorgan a verdict was found by consent for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, subject to a case to be stated for the opinion of this court; and the arbitrator was by the order of reference empowered to find what damages, if any, the plaintiff was entitled to, and to assess damages upon each separate head if he should consider them divisible. The following case was stated by him.

3. Nathaniel Cameron, father of the defendant, by indenture dated 15th Sept. 1859, demised to Thomas and John Burge, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of eighty-five years, all the veins, mines, and seams of coal and other minerals upon or under the lands within the hamlet of Tyr-y-Crenin, containing 1300 acres (which lands were mapped on the back of a skin of the indenture) with the usual powers to work the mines, and take and carry away the coal and minerals, and to put up machinery necessary or convenient for working the mines, and to appropriate such part of the said lands as were coloured pink on the map, either under ground or on the surface, which might reasonably be required for depositing and keeping the coal and the minerals, and the earth dug up in raising them, and to set up, take down, remove, and rebuild, on such parts of the land as might reasonably and conveniently be appointed for such purpose, any house, sheds, engines, or other works, machinery, material, or buildings, and to do all other things necessary for the more effectually making and getting the coal and minerals, and all shafts, pits, houses, and buildings in, under, or upon the said lands coloured pink, and to use or construct upon any part of the lands coloured pink, all such railways and other roads and cottages for workmen, engines, or other buildings necessary or proper for any purposes connected with the said mines and the sale and delivery of the materials, and to build upon any part to be approved of in writing by Nathaniel Cameron or his assigns of the said lands not exceeding in the whole 50 acres, such dwelling-houses, smelting or other houses, cottages, hovels, lodges, hedges, sheds, and other buildings, as should be necessary and proper as well for effectually or conveniently working the mines then opened as others which should thereafter be opened, or otherwise in and about the exercise of the powers aforesaid, but not for any other purpose; and with such other usual necessary and proper powers, not requiring in the whole more than 50 acres of surface land, which might be necessary or convenient for any of the purposes aforesaid; doing as little damage as possible to the said Nathaniel Cameron and his assigns, and fencing, and inclosing all parts of the lands taken and occupied for any of the said purposes; reserving also to the lessor and his assigns power to make or carry on any tramroad or other road, canal, trench, or channel, made or to be made by the lessees or the survivor, their or his assigns, yielding and paying certain royalties per ton of coals or other minerals; and also paying at the rate of 30s. per statute acre for all such parts of the said lands, which should by the said lessees and their assigns be taken, used, and occupied in the exercise of any of the powers and privileges aforesaid. The lessees also thereby covenanted at the end or sooner determination of the term to yield up to the lessor or his assigns all the buildings and other premises thereby demised, and all removable machinery, works, articles, and things which the lessor or his assigns might elect to purchase at a price to be determined as therein mentioned.

4. In April 1860, Nathaniel Cameron died, and the reversion of and in the premises demised thereupon became vested in Nathaniel Pryce Cameron, the defendant.

5. By divers mesne assignments, and ultimately by an indenture dated 30th Dec. 1861, the premises, powers, and privileges granted by the said lease became vested in the Coalbrook and Broad Oak Company (Limited), for the residue of the said term of eighty-five years, subject to the payment of the rents and royalties, and the performance of the covenants, conditions, and agreements reserved and contained in the said indenture of lease.

6. By an indenture of the 9th May 1865, made between the said Nathaniel Pryce Cameron of the one part, and the Coalbrook and Broad Oak Company (Limited) of the other part, certain alterations in the mode of paying the royalties reserved by the said lease were adopted, and power was granted by the company to the said Nathaniel Pryce Cameron so often as the rents and royalties should be in arrear for thirty days to enter upon the premises demised by the said indenture of lease, and to distrain for the rents and royalties and costs incurred by the non-payment thereof, and dispose of the distresses in due course of law, as landlords may do in respect of distresses for rent reserved on leases.

7. By an indenture dated the 25th April 1866, the Coalbrook and Broad Oak Company, in consideration of the sum of 1200*l.* paid to them by John William Jeffery O'Donoghue, assigned to O'Donoghue, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the plant, shares, tools, implements, and things comprised in the schedule to that indenture, and demised to O'Donoghue, his executors, administrators, and assigns for the term of fourteen years from the 25th March 1866, all the mines, veins, and seams of coal, culm, and other minerals and ores, in, upon, or under the lands and hereditaments within the hamlet of Tyr-y-Crenin, lying to the east of the Big Coalbrook Fault (shown by a blue dotted line on the plan endorsed on the last skin of the said indenture), which lands were known as the Coalbrook Slant, with power for the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to work the mines, and to take and carry away all the coal, culm, and other minerals to be found in, upon, or under the said land, and to dig, sink, drive, and use pits, shafts, levels, gutters, and sumps, and make such gates, headings, stables, soughs, levels, and drains, and to erect so many fire engines, machine, and other works as might be necessary or convenient for making, raising, and working the mines, or any new mines which might be opened, and for drawing off and discharging the water, and to appropriate such part of the land coloured pink on the map endorsed on the lease of 1859, as hereinbefore mentioned, either under ground or on the surface, which might reasonably be required for depositing the coal, culm, and minerals, and keeping the earth dug up, and to erect, take down, and rebuild, on such parts of the land as reasonably and conveniently might be appointed for such purposes, any houses, sheds, engines, machinery, or buildings, and to do all things necessary for more effectually working the coal and minerals, and to use all shafts pits, houses, and buildings, under or upon any part of the said land coloured pink, and also to use or construct upon any part of the said land coloured pink, all such railways, roads, cottages for workmen, engines, and other buildings, as should be necessary for any purposes connected with the enjoyment of the mines, and the sale and delivery of the minerals, and liberty of ingress, egress, and regress into and from the appropriated parts of the land, with horses, waggons, or otherwise as should be necessary, for carrying away and selling the coal and minerals by such roads and railways, and to erect on any part, to be approved in writing by the company or their assigns, of the said lands not exceeding in the whole five acres, all such dwelling-houses, and other houses, stables, buildings, and engines as should be necessary and proper for making the mines, or otherwise in the exercise of the power thereby given, and such other usual necessary and proper privileges, not requiring more than five acres of surface land, which should be necessary or convenient for any of the purposes therein mentioned, yielding and paying certain royalties per ton of coal and other minerals to be raised, and also the rent or sum of 30s. per acre for all parts of the surface of the lands in upon or under which the minerals expressed to be thereby demised were situate, as might be taken by the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, in the exercise of any of the powers therein contained; and it was thereby declared that, whenever the rent and royalties thereby reserved should be in arrear, the said company or their assigns might enter and distrain and sell, in the same manner as landlords may for rent in arrear the coal, culm, minerals, engines, machinery, railway plant, cattle, implements, utensils, gear, and chattels belonging to the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns upon any part of the premises thereinbefore expressed to be thereby demised. And the lessee thereby covenanted (among other things) that he would erect and keep in repair a proper weighing machine, and that he would within six months from the 25th March 1866 lay down and finish fit for traffic, and afterwards keep in repair, a railway upon the surface of the land comprised in the said indenture, in manner and between the points therein mentioned, and would allow the said company to use the said railway in a manner therein expressed, and would at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term deliver up to the said company or their assigns in good repair all buildings, pits, shafts, and other premises thereby demised, together with all removable machinery, articles, and things which the company or their assigns might elect to purchase. The said company thereby covenanted that they or their assigns would permit the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, within six months after the expiration of the said term of fourteen years, to take up and carry away all the rails, sleepers, iron, wood, and materials which should be laid and fixed by him or them in the lands comprised in the said indenture, unless the company should purchase the same, which they were thereby empowered to do.

8. The lands, mine, and premises comprised in the last stated indenture of lease were part of the lands, mine, and premises demised to the Burges by the lease first hereinbefore stated.

9. By an indenture dated 15th May 1866 the said John William Jeffery O'Donoghue, in consideration of the sum of 2000*l.* paid to him by the said Richard Turnor the plaintiff, demised unto the said Richard Turnor the veins, mines, and seams of coal, and all other the premises comprised in and demised by the said indenture of the 25th April 1866 for the residue of the term of fourteen years thereby granted, except the last three days thereof, subject to a proviso for redemption on repayment of the sum of 2000*l.*; and he also assigned to Turnor (among other things) the plant, chattels, and things comprised in the schedule thereto, and all fixtures, buildings, railways, weighing machines, engines, steam engines, gins, works, implements of manufacture, tools, machinery, timber, goods, and chattels which then were and should at any time during the said continuance of the said security thereby created be erected, constructed, or brought upon the premises thereinbefore expressed to be thereby demised, including the plant and material of which the said railway did or should consist, which the said William John Jeffery O'Donoghue had by the covenant thereinbefore mentioned, agreed to construct upon the premises by the said indenture now in recital demised, together with all necessary powers, by distress or otherwise, for recovering payment of the same rent by the said Richard Turnor, but subject to the provisos and covenants contained in the said indenture of lease of the 25th

April 1866, and to the proviso for redemption hereinbefore mentioned. And it was thereby provided and agreed that if the said sum of 2000*l.* should not be paid conformably to the proviso for redemption therein contained, and the said Richard Turnor should give to the said John William Jeffery O'Donoghue notice in writing under the hand of the said Richard Turnor, demanding payment at the expiration of six calendar months after giving such notice as aforesaid; and if the said principal money and interest should not be paid at the expiration of six months, or if the said sum of 2000*l.* should not be paid conformably to the aforesaid proviso or covenant for payment of the same, and one quarter of a year's interest for the same, or so much thereof as should remain due, should at any time afterwards be in arrear for more than three calendar months, it should be lawful for the said Richard Turnor absolutely to sell and dispose of the said premises, thereby demised and assigned respectively, or such of them or such part or parts thereof as he should think necessary, in manner therein expressed.

10. The last recited indenture was duly registered under the Bills of Sales Acts. At the date thereof all the things hereinafter mentioned as having been distrained were on the demised premises, except the rails of the new railway hereinafter mentioned.

11. The several indentures partly hereinbefore stated, are to form part of this case.

12. Default having been made by O'Donoghue in payment of the said sum of 2000*l.*, the plaintiff gave him notice that unless he should be paid that sum with interest and costs at the expiration of six months, he should exercise the power of sale and all other powers reserved to him by the said indenture of mortgage.

13. On the 16th Oct. 1867, the plaintiff accordingly sent Joseph Smith Fairly to take possession on his account, and Fairly took possession of all the plant, goods, and chattels, in and about the mine, moving a greater part of the movable things partly to the house of one Isaac John, and partly to a field, which he took for the purpose of depositing them, called Clement's Field.

14. The plaintiff placed men in possession to watch these things as well as those at the mine, and gave notice both to the said company and to the defendant that he had seized the plant, machinery, and removable fixtures in and upon the household premises demised to O'Donoghue by the said lease of 25th April 1866.

15. Up to the time of this removal the colliery was in good working order and was in full work, but the working was thereupon stopped.

16. The plaintiff at the time of his seizure also took possession of the engine and railway, and raised and sent away by their means the coal already worked, but no additional coal was worked after that time.

17. In the ordinary course of working, the water in the pit is raised by the engine and carried off so as to leave the coal capable of being worked. On a stoppage of the working the water increases rapidly in the pit. A few days after the seizure the plaintiff resumed the working so far as relates to raising and conveying off the water, and continued to keep the pit clear of water until the 6th Nov. then following. During that time the regular working could have been resumed on a few hours' notice.

18. On the said 6th Nov. the defendant distrained for the half year's rent, which had become due to him from the said company on the 29th Sept. preceding, amounting to 600*l.*, and took possession of and subsequently sold under such distress the goods, chattels, and things following (being the whole of the goods, chattels, and things therein and about the mine and grounds adjoining occupied therewith), that is to say: A. Water trams within the mine. B. Smith's tools, carpenter's tools, wire rope, iron, timber, train grease, utensils, and stores within the yard or enclosure hereinafter mentioned. C. A railway within the mine. D. A railway within the yard. E. A weighing machine in a building within the yard, and also a winch frame and certain tipping stages and coal screens within the yard. F. A railway extending from the end of the yard through its length, and thence along a common, part of the waste of a manor of the defendant, to a junction with the Llanelly Railway, at a place called the Rhydymardy or Gorseinon Junction.

19. The several railways, and the weighing machines, winch frame, tipping stages, and coal screens were sold by the defendant, on the terms that they should be taken up and removed by the purchasers, which was shortly afterwards done, except as to part of the underground railway which was inaccessible by reason of the accumulation of water within the mine; and such part is still in the mine.

20. The defendant also entered the close called Clement's Field, claimed possession of the things deposited there, and included them within his notice of distress, but did not remove or interfere except as aforesaid with any of such things.

21. The action was brought for taking and selling the things beforementioned as sold, and the entry into Clement's Field.

22. The plaintiff contends that the distress was wholly illegal, and that he, the plaintiff, was entitled under the bill of sale to the things sold, and to sue for the taking and selling them; first, because all the things sold were tools of trade, and therefore privileged from distress; secondly, as to things above referred to as C, D, E, and F, that they were fixtures annexed to the soil, and not liable to distress; thirdly, as to all the things sold except A and C, that they were on land not part of the demised premises.

23. The defendant contends, first, that the bill of sale does not contain sufficient power to seize and take possession of after acquired property, and, therefore, was inoperative as to the new railway, which was not on the premises when it was given; but that, if it does, no sufficient possession to vest the property in the plaintiff was in fact taken. Secondly, that the things taken were not tools of trade, but if they were so that they were not privileged, unless there was enough property without them to satisfy the distress, which was not the case. Thirdly, that all the articles distrained were, under the circumstances of the case, distrainable chattels. Fourthly, that except the goods in Clement's Field, which were abandoned shortly after being nominally taken possession of, and except as to a small portion of the railway mapped hereinafter mentioned, the things taken were all on the demised premises, "the yard" having been originally taken for the purposes of the colliery, and that all the ground occupied by the railways (except as above mentioned) having been taken under the powers contained in the original lease of 1859, and so having become parcel of the demised land, though no consent of the lessor in writing was proved, yet such consent must, if necessary, be presumed; or else that as such approval was a condition introduced for his benefit, it was one which might be waived by him, and that the land having been taken possession of with his permission, a tenancy was created entitling him to distrain.

24. The water trams within the mines were of the value of 9*l*.

25. The movables within the yard were, to the value of 55*l*. 5*s*., things necessary for the carrying on the business of a coal mine, but were not in actual use when distrained. These things were partly in a shed, stable, and other buildings within the inclosure, and partly on the ground within the same; the remainder of such moveables taken were coal, old iron, and manure.

26. The inclosure or "yard" had been fenced in by the first lessees of the colliery, from the surrounding common, which was part of the waste of a manor of the lessor, and had been continuously used for the purposes of the colliery from that time, but no approval in writing by the lessor of such inclosure was proved, nor the payment of any additional rent for such inclosures beyond that paid for the mine. The original lessees of the colliery had built on another part of the same waste several houses for labourers, and they and the successive lessees of the colliery received rents from the tenants of these houses for the occupation thereof, but no express devise or written assent by defendant or his predecessors in title to said occupation of the land was proved.

27. The railway throughout the mine was in width 3*ft*. 4*in*., made of small rails fixed by iron nails to transverse sleepers, which were slabs of oak or pine laid at intervals of about a yard apart; these slabs resting on the ground, and the whole structure being kept in position by its own weight, so as not to shift when trucks passed over it. The part of this railway sold and removed was of the value as removed of 230*l*.; to replace it with similar materials to those removed would cost 280*l*.

28. The railway in the yard was of similar construction and materials. As removed it was of the value of 45*l*. To reinstate it would cost 60*l*. The rails of this portion had in fact been from time to time shifted about to different parts of the yard according to the requirements of the colliery.

29. The weighing machine was inclosed within a stone-built building in the yard, and was fixed on cast iron brackets built into the opposite walls, and could not be taken out without removing parts of the walls of the building, which, in fact, was done on its removal. The coal screens and tipping stages were fixed by O'Donoghue in the yard, for the purpose of tipping the coal into the trucks of the railway made by him, as hereinafter mentioned, the screens and stages being fastened to timbers let into the walls of a siding made by him for the same purpose; and the upright timbers of the structure were let into the ground, and were removed with the screens and stages. The winch frame was also fixed into the ground within the yard. The weighing machine detached was of the value of 5*l*. 10*s*. To replace it would cost 14*l*. The coal screens, tipping stages, and timbers detached were worth 3*l*. To reinstate them would cost 7*l*. The winch frame detached was worth 1*l*. To replace it would cost 2*l*.

The railway, called the new railway, was that made by O'Donoghue pursuant to his agreement contained in the lease hereinbefore recited. It began at the end of the yard hereinbefore mentioned, and ran in a deep cutting through the yard for about 80 yards, and thence over the waste or common hereinbefore mentioned for about 900 yards, to a point where it entered (as to one of the lines of rail thereof) on land of one William Rees, from which point it ran in the same manner for a space of 40 yards (as to one rail) on the land of the said William Rees, the other line of rail continuing on the said waste, and the said space of 40 yards terminated on the ground of the Llanelly Railway, adjoining the Gorseinon Station aforesaid.

A rent was paid by O'Donoghue to William Rees for the strip of his land which the new railway ran over in manner aforesaid.

The last mentioned railway was made on the waste with the verbal assent of the defendant; but

Q. B.]

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

it was not proved that he gave any written assent thereto.

The whole quantity of land taken for the railway was less than five acres in extent.

30. The new railway was 4ft. 8in. wide, and of heavier material than those of the other railways hereinbefore mentioned, but in other respects similarly constructed. The sleepers rested on ballast, which was necessarily disturbed by removing them, but the original underlying soil was not thereby interfered with.

31. All the said above mentioned railways were convenient and necessary for the carrying away the coals and minerals from the mine.

32. Railways of all the above classes are in practice slewed and shifted about from time to time to meet the convenience of working collieries, but the mode of their construction does not differ from that of the main trunk lines, which are capable of being shifted in like manner, that is by "breaking a joint"—i.e., cutting through one rail and sleepers with that object.

33. The railway in the yard was worked by weight of trucks, being on an incline; the new railway by horse power.

34. The value of the whole of the new railway, with the sleepers and materials as detached, is to be taken as 320*l.*, but as replaced it would cost 385*l.*, materials of equal value with those taken being supplied in all replacements hereinbefore referred to.

If the value of the sleepers on the said land on 15th May is to be found separately it is to be taken at 32*l.* as detached and 35*l.* as reinstated.

35. The part of the railway on Rees's ground is to be taken as of the value of 13*l.* detached or 17*l.* replaced.

36. The cessation of working has caused an accumulation of water in the mine which it would cost 500*l.* to remove and repair the effects of, but which damage I do not conceive to be in issue in this action.

37. As to the entry into Clement's Field, and alleged taking therein, I find that the plaintiff is entitled to 1*s.* damages in respect thereof, and no more.

38. The questions for the opinion of the court are (1), whether the plaintiff is entitled to sue the defendant for the other trespasses above mentioned, or any and which of them; and (2) whether the said several things distrained by the defendant, or any and which of them, were legally distrainable. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is so entitled to sue, then the verdict in his favour is to stand for the value of such things so distrained by the defendant as aforesaid, as the court shall be of opinion were wrongfully taken under the circumstances aforesaid, in addition to the said sum of 1*s.*, or is to be otherwise varied as to the court shall seem fit.

Giffard, Q.C. (with him J. W. Mellor), for the plaintiff.—There has been no demise of the land referred to in the case as coloured pink, and the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist. There is nothing from which such a relation can be inferred, and the distress was therefore bad. Again, the distress was bad as being a joint distress for two separate demises. [LUSH, J.—Is it not one demise where the agreement is that the tenant may enlarge the extent of the demised premises but on payment of an increased rent?] In Rogers v. Birkmire Cas. Temp. Lord Hardwicke, p. 245, a joint distress for two distinct messuages at two distinct rents was held bad under similar circumstances. Lord Hardwicke said, "Defendant justifies for a joint distress for two separate rents; for though he made but one lease to the plaintiff, yet in that lease there are two different terms and two different reservations, one upon the stable and the other upon the messuage; the term in the messuage and the rent thereof are to commence immediately; whereas the term in the stable was not to commence till Lock's surrender, and a different rent is reserved; so that although this be all by one deed, yet they are two as distinct demises as if they had been by two deeds, and likewise for two distinct terms; the consequence whereof is that there must be distinct reversions, and if so then they are distinct rents, and then the question is whether in trespass a joint distress out of several premises without distinguishing how much in one and how much in the other can be justified;" and the court held that the distress could not be justified; a decision which appears to govern the present case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—In that case there were two distinct terms. In the present case there is only one demise, the time for exercising the option of taking additional land only being deferred; but the power and the right to take it, the instrument under which it is to be taken, is one and the same.] That the instrument is one makes no difference according to Lord Hardwicke, who says, "Though this be all by one deed, yet they are two as distinct demises as if they had been by two deeds." [HANNEN, J., referred to Daniel v. Gracie 6 Q.B. 145, where the proprietor of a house and of a marl pit and brick mine demised the house by unwritten agreement to a tenant from a day named; and it was at the same time agreed between them that the tenant should take the marl pit and brick mine, and should pay quarterly a certain sum per solid yard for all the marl that he got, and per thousand for all the bricks that he made; and the tenant having taken the marl and made bricks and paid the stipulated amount for a certain time, fell into arrear; the court held that the agreement for the marl pit and brick mine was a demise of the land from year to year at a rent capable of being ascertained with certainty, and for which, therefore, the lessor might distrain.] The rent here has a different beginning in each case, and the case, it is submitted, falls within the decision in Rogers v. Birkmire, where there was an absolute demise. The proviso for re-entry contained in the lease of 1859 was confined to the land then demised, and cannot affect that afterwards taken. In the next place, the things distrained by the defendant are not subject to distress: they are trade fixtures attached to the soil which the landlord cannot remove. Whether machines fixed to the freehold become parcel of it is, according to the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Exch. 312, "a question of fact depending on the circumstances of each case, and principally on two considerations: (1) the mode of annexation to the soil or fabric of the house, and the extent to which it is united to them, and whether it can easily be removed, intégrè, salvè et commodè, or not without injury to itself or the fabric of the building; (2) on the object and purpose of the annexation, whether it was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the dwelling, in the language of the civil law, perpetui usus causâ, or in that of the Year Book, pour un profit del inheritance, or merely for a temporary purpose, or the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel." On this principle the railways, trams, and other things distrained in the present case must be held part of the freehold, and therefore not liable to distress. If these are part of the freehold, and would go to the heir, then the machinery which is used by them would follow the same rule. In Fisher v. Dixon, 12 Cl. & Fin. 312, it was held that where the absolute owner of land, for the purpose of better using that land, erected upon and affixed to the freehold certain machinery, in the absence of any disposition by him of this machinery, it would go to his heir.

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

as part of the real estate; and that if the corpus of such machinery belonged to the heir, all that belonged to that machinery, though more or less capable of being detached from it, and more or less capable of being used in such detached state, must also be considered as belonging to the heir. The decision of Comyns C.B., holding a cider mill fixed in the ground to be personal property, can hardly be considered an authority at the present day. Lord Brougham thus speaks of it in Fisher v. Dixon (ubi sup.): "It is a remarkable circumstance that of that case we have only a very indistinct and unsatisfactory report. We have really nothing that can be called a record of that case. It was cited in the case before Lord Hardwicke, and I must also say that if the cider mill case is to be taken as it is represented to us, as regards the substance of the case, and in its result, my mind goes not at all with that decision. It is contrary undeniably to the general principles of our law upon the subject; and if the same question were to arise to-morrow, with the circumstances which are represented to have attended that case, it would not, in my opinion, lead to the same result." The railway distrained in the present case was really a road. [HANNEN J.—But it is found in the case that it was usual to remove it from place to place] That is for the convenience of the tenant, and the same thing is true of many fixtures which are nevertheless held to form part of the freehold. [MELLOR J.—Mr Amos (On Fixtures, p. 2) says: "It is necessary, in order to constitute a fixture, that the article in question should be let into or united to the land or to some substance previously connected with the land. It is not enough that it has been laid upon the land and brought into contact with it. The definition requires something more than mere juxtaposition; as that the soil shall have been displaced for the purpose of receiving the article, or that the chattel should be cemented or otherwise fastened to some fabric previously attached to the ground."] It is found as a fact in the present case that the railway cannot be removed without disturbing the ballast, which is as much part of the soil as the earth itself. In Climie v. Wood, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 257; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609, it was held that trade fixtures which have been annexed to the freehold for the more convenient using of them, and not to improve the inheritance, and which are capable of being removed without any appreciable damage to the freehold, pass under a mortgage of the freehold to the mortgagee. An authority to the same effect was Cullwick v. Swindell, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 249, and Boyd v. Shorrock L. Rep. 5 Eq. 72; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197, seems inconsistent with Hellawall v. Eastwood (ubi sup.). As to the weighing machine described in paragraph 29 of the special case, it must, on the authorities, be regarded as parcel of the freehold. It was inclosed within a stone building, and fixed on cast iron brackets built into the opposite walls, and could not be taken out without removing parts of the walls of the building, which in fact was done on its removal. Then as to the damages. The arbitrator has found that the mine has become unworkable, and, owing to the accumulation of water, that 500*l.* would be required to remove the water and repair the effects of the damage, though he thinks that damage is not in issue in the present action. But it is submitted that that damage is in issue; that it is not special damage, and therefore did not require to be alleged in the declaration. If a pump is used for emptying a mine of water, and it is taken in distress, the accumulation of water in the mine is the immediate consequence of the removal of the pump, and the damage is directly proximate. The present case is similar, as the trams, by which alone the water is drawn out of the mine, have been taken under the distress.

Grove, Q.C. (with him Hughes) for the defendant. —It will not be contended on the part of the defendant that he is not liable for the entry into Clement's field and the alleged taking therein, as to which the arbitrator has found that the plaintiff is entitled to 1*s.* damage. Neither will it be contended that the defendant is not liable for the further damage which the arbitrator has assessed at 14*l.* But as to the distrainability of the rails and sleepers, it has never been decided that a thing which rests on the land merely by its own weight, becomes part of the freehold. A fixture is not a thing which is merely laid upon the soil. The finding of the arbitrator, as stated in paragraph 27 of the case, amounts to a finding that the railway was not a fixture. It is found to have been made of small rails fixed by iron nails to transverse sleepers which were slabs of oak or pine, laid at intervals of about a yard apart, these slabs resting on the ground, and the whole structure being kept in position by its own weight, so as not to shift when trucks pass over it. The whole thing might be taken up easily and placed on any other portion of the land, and paragraph 32 of the case finds that railways of the kind are in practice slewed and shifted about from time to time to meet the convenience of working collieries. Further, in the lease of 25th April 1866, the railways are treated as removable and distrainable, the proviso for re-entry being that whenever the rents and royalties reserved should be in arrear, the Coalbrook Company or their assigns might enter and distrain and sell in the same manner as landlords may for rent in arrear the engines, machinery, railways, &c. [HANNEN, J. — This is a contract between the lessee and a sub-lessee. Can that alter the character of the thing as between the lessee and the original lessor?] The original lease, too, treats the railways as removable plant, though it does not expressly give a power of distress. [COCKBURN, C.J. — There is nothing in the original lease to extend the power of distress beyond the ordinary things. The parties may treat certain things as removable for particular purposes, but it does not therefore follow that they are to be so taken for all purposes.] In The Duke of Beaufort v. Bates, 31 L. J. 480, Ch.; 5 L. T. Rep. N.S. 546, where a lease of coal mines and iron works contained a covenant by the lessee to yield up to the lessor at the expiration or other sooner determination of the term all "ways and roads" in or under the demised hereditaments in such good order, repair, and condition as that the said coal and iron works might be continued and carried on by the lessor, one of the vice chancellors considered that tramways fastened to iron or wooden sleepers, which were not let into the ground, but rested thereon, were protected by the covenant, and granted an injunction restraining the taking up, sale, or removal of such tram plates by a judgment creditor of the lessee; but on appeal the Lords Justices held that the movable chattels were not included in the terms "works," or "ways," or "roads," and that the injunction must be dissolved. "The evidence," said Knight Bruce L. J., "convinces me that the sleepers and tramways in question are not fixed to the freehold, but are to all intents and purposes, subject to any question that the terms of the lease may raise, the goods and chattels in our legal phrase, of the tenant, the defendant at law, and therefore liable to be seized by the sheriff under the execution against him. As for the stone sleepers and the tram plates lying on them, they may be placed out of the case, for, as I understand it, the defendant here, the plaintiff at law, is willing to undertake that he will not, and that the sheriff

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

under his execution shall not interfere with any of the stone sleepers, or with the tram plates lying on them. Neither under the word "works," nor under the word "ways," nor under the word "roads," nor under all three together, are, in my opinion, movable chattels of this kind comprised, nor were they, as I consider, the instrument intended to be comprised. It may be the duty of the tenant at the end of the term to leave the roadway in good order, and condition. That is not the question. Is it his duty according to this lease, leaving the road in good repair and condition, to leave upon it the sleepers and tram plates, movable as they are, without which I agree it cannot be conveniently used, or cannot be at all used as a tramroad or railway? That in my opinion is not the meaning of the covenant." Turner, L. J., said, "If they were not affixed to the freehold they were trade personal chattels of the lessee, belonging to him, brought by him upon the demised premises, continuing to belong to him, and would be removable by him during the term according to the general law. And if, therefore, they were trade personal chattels it would be incumbent upon the landlord to prove a custom to prevent the tenant from removing them, and certainly there is no evidence of any such custom, if such custom there could be." [LUSH, J.—Lord Coke lays it down generally that things which cannot be restored in the same plight and condition cannot be distrained for rent. See Co. Litt. 47.] Lord Justice Turner thought it clear upon the evidence in the case before him that the trams and sleepers were not affixed to the freehold. "The evidence," he says, "upon the subject seems to me to be all one way; for though we have two witnesses on the part of the plaintiff who speak of them as affixed to the freehold, it is perfectly plain when the evidence of those witnesses is examined, that what they mean by affixed to the freehold is that they are sunk in the soil by the pressure of the waggons passing over the trams. There is no affixing to the freehold in any other sense." That case goes even further than the present, for the sleepers were there laid on stones which were fixed in the soil; in the present case the sleepers are not even laid upon the soil, but upon ballast placed over the soil. Hellawell v. Eastwood (ubi sup.) is an authority in favour of the defendant, for their mules used for spinning cotton, which were fixed by means of screws, some into the wooden floors of a cotton mill and some by being sunk into the stone flooring and secured by molten lead, were held distrainable for rent. The machine in the present case is clearly within the decision in that case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—You contend further that the railway, though it must be taken to pieces in order to remove it, is also distrainable.] It would suffer no injury by removal, and that it would be necessary to take it to pieces, is no objection. Parke, B. says of the machines in Hellawell v. Eastwood: "They are not of a perishable nature, and would not suffer by a careful removal. If it were necessary to take some to pieces in order to remove them, that circumstance would make no difference; for that might occur with chattels with respect to which there is no question, as for instance, post beds; they could not be carried to the pound without being first taken to pieces, and the distrainee would have no reason to complain that they were restored to him in the disjointed state at the pound where he must attend to receive them. Nor does it make any difference that the distrainee would be obliged to incur the expense of refixing the machinery. Precisely the same objection might be made to the distress of any article which required expense to carry back from the pound, and to restore to its former position. The distrainee at common law must be at the trouble and expense of taking back his goods from the pound. This practical inconvenience is now obviated by the power of impounding on the premises." As to the question of damages, the plaintiff himself stopped the working of the colliery, see paragraphs 14, 15, and 16 of the case. Finally, as to the new railway, whether it is to be considered as part of the original demise. [COCKBURN, C. J.—We all think it is part of the demised premises].

Giffard, Q. C., in reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I do not think we are in a position to give our ultimate judgment upon this case; but I think there are one or two things which are clear, and as to which we might disembarass our minds and the minds of those who are interested in the decision of this case at once without taking further time for consideration. And the first question is, whether there has been any such demise of that part of the railway as to which Mr. Grove, for the defendant, maintained the right of distress, upon the ground which is not coloured pink upon the plan. Mr. Giffard, as I understand, maintains that there has been no such demise; at all events, that there has been no such demise under the present lease, which is necessary in order to make this distress good. Now the reason, he says, that there has been no such demise, and that, if the relation of landlord and tenant has been created with regard to that land it arises from a subsequent demise, is this: By the terms of the original lease from Mr. Cameron, the father of the present defendant, and the original lessor, the lessee was to have the right of laying down and constructing a railway upon the land coloured pink on the plan annexed to the lease; but the lease contained a further power to the tenant to erect buildings and machinery, and other things essential to the working of the mine, over an extent of fifty acres, to be fixed by the consent of the landlord in writing; and there was a further power over a similar extent of fifty acres, which for the present purpose I will take to mean the identically same fifty acres, to use over that area such privileges as should be necessary and convenient for the working of the mine. Now, a part of this railway—that part as to which this question arises—is not upon the land represented by the pink colour upon the plan. It appears that as to the part in question, the landlord's consent, as required by the terms of that clause in the lease to which I have referred, was obtained, but not in writing. It was a verbal consent to the appropriation of the land in question for the formation of the railway; and Mr. Giffard therefore says that, assuming there was a demise of the landlord to the tenant of the land upon which this railway has been constructed (that part of the railway not upon the pink), it was a distinct and separate demise. I think it was not. It is true that the consent of the landlord was required, and was required to be in writing. That provision is intended for the protection of the landlord, and I think that if the landlord, instead of insisting on his consent being as required by the lease in writing, chose to give a verbal consent, and allowed the construction of the railway to take place with his acquiescence, he has waived the stipulation which was intended in his favour and for his protection, and what has taken place is quite equivalent to the consent in writing which was required by the lease. Then comes the question whether, such consent having been given and the land subsequently taken, it forms part of that which was comprehended in the original demise. I think it was so comprehended, that where you have a demise of so much land with an option to the lessee to take more upon certain conditions, an option in the matter

Q. B.]

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

being given to both lessor and lessee that by common consent other land shall be added to that which was the subject matter of the primary and original demise, if that option is exercised, the land which is to be taken must be considered as taken under the original demise and not as constituting the subject matter of a new demise. I think, therefore, that that difficulty is got over; that the relation of landlord and tenant did exist in regard to this part of the land so taken, and that consequently it was subject to distress. But then comes the question whether the railway which was taken under this distress was properly subject to that proceeding on the part of the landlord. Now, the first question which presents itself here is one upon which I do not think we have the materials for forming a definitive judgment. It is, on the one hand, said that the sleepers and the rails which rest upon the sleepers are not at all fixed in the soil, or attached to the soil, but that they simply rest upon the surface of the ground by the effect of their own weight. If that were all that was found in the case, I should think that no difficulty presented itself. A thing which is removable by the hand, or by any substitute for manual power, and which is capable of being removed without injury to itself, or without injury to or displacement of the soil, is a movable chattel and as such is subject to be distrained. But then, although it is said that these rails rest upon the ground by the effect of their own weight, there is a difficulty created by the introduction of the statement that ballast is used for the purpose of forming this railway; because if the ballast is added to the natural ground and becomes part of the soil, and then either the sleepers and the rails are imbedded in the ballast, or the ballast is piled up round them, so as to prevent the sleepers and the rails from being removed without tearing open the soil by which they have been surrounded, then if that from which they have thus been detached by this sort of disruption is a part of the original soil, these sleepers and the rails are attached to the original soil, have become part of the freehold, and cannot be removed for the purpose of distress. I think, therefore, the case, as far as regards that part of it, must go back to the arbitrator for a clear and definite finding and statement as to how far these sleepers and rails which have been removed by this distress were or were not attached to the soil, so as to have become part of the freehold. Another question presents itself—viz., whether, inasmuch as, with a view to their removal for the purpose of distress, it was necessary that these rails should be taken to pieces, they would under those circumstances be the proper subject-matter of distress. I think that is altogether disposed of by the very luminous judgment of Lord Wensleydale in Hellawell v. Eastwood, in which he points out that this is merely—as the matter stood at common law—that things which were not distrainable at common law cannot now be distrained; that instead of taking a thing as a pawn or pledge you can now take it in liquidation of the rent, which you could not do at common law, but still that you must look at the thing as it would have been before the statute on that subject was passed, and that it by no means followed, but the contrary, that because a thing, in order to be taken to the pound, as it must have been in ancient times, from its position or from its nature required to be taken to pieces, in order to enable the distrainer so to deal with it, he was therefore deprived of the remedy to which he was entitled in the shape of distress in the removal of the chattel which he took away in pledge; and that although it might so be that when the tenant came to redeem the pledge or pawn by paying the rent, as a security for which it was taken, he found it from the very nature of things separated into different parts, and the consequence might be that an expense would be entailed upon him to restore it to its former condition; yet that was neither more nor less than a consequence of his own default in the payment of the rent, which occasioned and justified the distress on the part of the distrainer. The distrainee, therefore, although he might suffer that injury, would have only himself to blame for the consequence of his own default in not paying the rent. Applying, then, that argument here, suppose the sleepers and rails of the railway—part of the railway—are liable to be distrained, it does not follow that because they must be taken to pieces, or because in order to put them together again if they should be removed, on payment of the rent, it would be necessary for the tenant to go to an expense in restoring them to their former position,—it by no means follows, on the authority of that case, that this would be any reason why such articles should not be taken for the purpose of distress. I should, therefore, be disposed to hold that this distress was right as to those parts of the case in which Mr. Grove admits there must be a verdict for the plaintiff in respect of them; and also as to the distraining this railway, I should be disposed to hold that the defendant was right, and the distress could be made, with the exception of the one point to which I have referred, upon which, I think, the court should have more information before we decide it. It will not therefore be necessary, as far as it appears to me, to come back hereafter to those points we have disposed of now; but we reserve it to ourselves to deliver our final judgment on the one point, viz., how far the railway was attached to the soil of the freehold, so as to make it form part of it, and therefore not distrainable.

MELLOR, J.—I would only just say with reference to the ballast, that what I am a little perplexed about is this: I understand the arbitrator finds that the attachment could not be dissolved or got rid of without displacing the ballast. I do not quite know what he means by that. If he means that the ballast is something which itself would be distrainable and different from the earth on which it is placed, I am not prepared to agree with him. At present I am inclined to think that when ballast is placed there, it is placed only for the purpose of substituting one earth for another earth, viz., something that is porous and likely to be dry and easily drained for the soil that would not probably be so easily drained, and, therefore, it forms part of the very earth itself, and could not be removed for the purpose of distress, nor would an action of trespass lie for it. I think when it is once spread over the embankment it becomes as it were part of the embankment or part of the cutting just as much, it appears to me, as the soil on which the ballast is placed. Now, when the arbitrator says that this railway could not be removed without displacement of the ballast, does he mean to say he confines the displacement in this way to some minute or small effect produced by the removal or lifting off the rails from the ballast? If it is nothing more than that, I think the doctrine of Hellawell v. Eastwood would apply, and that it would be distrainable; but my mind would certainly be very much affected by any opinion of the arbitrator as to the extent and character of the displacement to which he refers.

Grove, Q.C.—The word the arbitrator uses is “disturbance.” He says the ballast would be no way disturbed by removing them.

MELLOR, J.—That would make a difference; but it is very minute. The arbitrator seems to me sometimes to speak of the ballast as if it were something different from the earth. That is what I want to know.

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

LUSH and HANNEN, JJ., concurred.

Judgment accordingly.

The case having been referred back to the arbitrator for further information on the question whether the sleepers and rails removed under the distress were or were not attached to the soil, fresh evidence was taken, and the following additional facts were submitted to the court.

1. Generally as to all the railways distrained—the mode of their construction was as follows: The ground was brought to a dry and uniform surface by spreading thereon such hard and dry materials as the soil afforded; some further material of the same nature, such as broken stone and cinders, being brought from elsewhere wherever the natural soil was moist, or its surface depressed so as to require such aid to make it dry and level.

2. On the surface thus levelled the sleepers were laid, for the most part transversely, at equal distances.

3. The rails were then laid along the sleepers and fastened to the surface of them by dog nails, which are long and strong nails, either driven through holes in the rails prepared for that purpose, or made with a flat head projecting over the foot of the rail and grasping it closely when hammered down, the sharp end of the nail being in either case driven into the sleeper as deeply as the wood will admit, and thus firmly fixing the rail thereto.

4. After these steps had been taken, large quantities of the above-mentioned dry and hard material called ballast, was brought along the line and packed under and about the sleepers, with the twofold object—first, of keeping them dry, and thus preserving them from decay; and, secondly, of keeping them by its support beneath and at the sides, in the position in which they had been placed.

5. The rails were clear of the ballast.

6. After the railways had been used for traffic, the ballast packed under and about the sleepers became more solid than when first deposited; the sleepers also became more deeply embedded in the ballast.

7. The rails and sleepers were thus removed: the dog nails were commonly wrenched out of the sleepers with a bar or pick, but in many cases the flattened head of the nails before mentioned was merely knocked aside when it did not pass through a hole in the rail, the rail being thereby released. Many of the nails were left sticking in the sleepers when the latter were removed. It was impossible to ascertain the relative numbers of the rails detached from the sleepers in these different modes.

8. The rails being thus set free were carried off. Then the ballast about the sleepers was partly removed or loosened by a pick where they had become firmly embedded, and next a lever or bar was driven under the sleeper through the remaining or loosened ballast (as the case might be), and by means of such lever or bar the sleeper was raised above and detached from the remaining ballast, so as to be easily carried away.

9. As to the railway in the mine, referred to at paragraph 27 of the case, the sleepers of this railway were all embedded in the soil to the depth of 2 in., and continued so at the time of the distress, with the exception of about 200 yards in length of the railway in the slant, where the sleepers (which were here laid longitudinally) had recently been washed bare of ballast by the action of water running down the slant, and merely rested on the ground, being kept in position by stays, that is pieces of wood driven between the wall or side of the pit and the sleepers. When this portion of sleepers and rails were removed there was no disturbance of the soil, except a slight displacement of earth from the side of the pit, arising from the removal of the wedges.

10. The value of the rails and sleepers of this denuded part, in case it ought to be ascertained separately, is to be taken at 18% as removed, and 22% as replaced, being part of the respective amounts of 230% and 280% referred to at paragraph 27.

11. The railways in the yard had the sleepers completely embedded in the ballast, such sleepers being from an inch and a-half to two inches deep.

12. The new railway mentioned in the case had sleepers of larger dimensions than the others above mentioned. These sleepers were of the depth of four and a-half inches, and were laid transversely. In the centre, between the rails of this line, which was worked with horse power, ballast was packed to a level with the tops of the sleepers in order to make a level surface for the horses to work on. The ballasting continued to the line of the rails packed about the sides of the sleepers, but with a decreasing depth of ballast towards the outside. The extreme ends of the sleepers were for the most part visible, but the sleepers were covered with ballast to their whole length in some places, and especially at the curves of the line. Some of these sleepers were round at the lower end, and some of them square.

13. As to all the railways. The hollow places left by the removal of the sleepers were distinctly visible, and in all of them, except in the denuded part of the slant above mentioned, some displacement of the ballast under and about the sides of them necessarily took place when they were removed, first from the use of the pick and bar as before stated, and next from the falling in of the ballast into the holes caused by the removal of the sleepers. Where the sleepers were round, such falling in was considerable; where they were square it was to a less extent. The sleepers were in general round bottomed, but no account was kept of the relative numbers of these respective shapes.

14. At the hearing of the additional evidence called to enable me to find the above facts it was contended that the rails might be considered liable to distress, though the sleepers might not be subject thereto. It case it should become necessary to ascertain the value of rails and sleepers separately, I find that the value of all the sleepers distrained was as follows: In the underground railway the sleepers removed, exclusive of the denuded part, were worth as removed 3%—inclusive of that part, 3% 10s.; but to replace them with like materials would cost 9% and 12% respectively, such sums of 3% or 3% 10s. being included in the sum of 230% mentioned in paragraph 27; and the sums of 9% or 12% being included in the sum of 280% there mentioned.

15. The sleepers in the yard were of the value of 1% ; but it would cost 3% to replace them, such sums of 1% and 3% being part of the sums of 45% and 60% respectively, mentioned in paragraph 28 of the case.

16. The value of the sleepers of the new line was 63% as detached; but to replace them with like materials would cost 70%, such sums being respectively included in the sums of 320% and 385%, mentioned in paragraph 34 of the case.

Jan. 18, 1870.—Giffard, Q.C. (J. W. Mellor with him) for the plaintiff, contended that the additional facts found by the arbitrator showed that the rails and sleepers became part of the realty, and were therefore not distrainable for rent; and they referred to the cases already cited in the previous argument.

Grove Q.C. (with him Hughes), for the defendant, contended that the placing of the sleepers and rails on a foreign substance called ballast, and allowing them to rest on it by their own weight, could not

Q. B.]

TURNOR v. CAMERON.

[Q. B.]

deprive them of their character of distrainable chattels. They also referred again to the cases previously cited.

J. W. Mellor in reply.

Our adv. vult.

Feb. 21, 1870.—The judgment of the court was now delivered as follows by MELLOR, J.—This case was argued before the Lord Chief Justice, my brother Lush, my brother Hannen, and myself. The only question not determined on the first argument in this special case was the liability of the railways therein described to be distrained for rent. The facts then stated by the arbitrator were not sufficient in our opinion for the satisfactory decision of that question, and we sent the case back for a further finding and statement of the exact mode in which the railways had been constructed, and how far and in what manner they were attached to the freehold. Upon the further statement of the arbitrator we are satisfied that such railways are not liable to be distrained for rent. It now appears that the ground on which they were laid was brought to a dry and uniform surface by spreading thereon, wherever the natural soil was moist or its surface depressed, such hard and dry materials as the soil afforded, with some further material of the same nature, such as broken stone and cinders brought from elsewhere so as to make it deep and level. On this surface so prepared the sleepers were laid and the rails were fastened to the sleepers by long and strong nails either driven through holes in the rails or made with a flat head projecting over the foot of the rail, and grasping it closely when hammered down, the nails being driven into the sleepers as deeply as the wood would admit, and thus firmly fixing the rails thereto. Large quantities of such hard and dry material called ballast were then packed under and above the sleepers with the double object of keeping them dry and preventing their decay, and secondly of keeping them by its support beneath and at the sides in the position in which they had been placed. On being used for the purposes of the colliery, the ballast under and above the sleepers became solid, and the sleepers became more deeply imbedded in the ballast. In order to remove the rails from the sleepers, the usual mode was to wrench the nails out of the sleepers by bars or picks, and many of the nails were left sticking in the sleepers. To remove the sleepers the ballast was first loosened by picks, and then levers or bars of iron were driven under the sleepers. The railway called the new railway was fixed with sleepers of larger dimensions, and laid deeper in ballast, which was packed to a level with the tops of the sleepers, in order to make a level surface for the horses to work on. In all the railways the removal of the sleepers caused hollow places and holes to be formed by the falling in of the ballast, and wherever round sleepers were used, such falling in was considerable. The facts so found by the arbitrator appear to us satisfactorily to show that the railways in question were not distrainable for rent, and that our judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff. The question to be determined is whether the rails and sleepers forming the railways under consideration continued to be personal chattels, or whether by reason of their annexation to the freehold as above described, they became fixtures. The following is the definition of a fixture given in the treatise of Messrs. Amos and Ferrand, part 1, c. 1, p. 2, "It is necessary in order to constitute a fixture, that the article in question should be let into or united to the land, or to some substance previously connected with the land. It is not enough that it has been laid upon the land and brought into contact with it. The definition requires something more than mere juxtaposition, as that the soil should have been displaced for the purpose of receiving the article, or that the chattel should be connected or otherwise fastened to some fabric previously attached to the ground." In the present case we have not to consider the law which is applicable to fixtures as between the different descriptions of representatives of the same owner of the inheritance; neither have we to consider under what circumstances fixtures may be removed, either under express contract or in favour of trade, or what fixtures may be taken in execution under a writ of fiери facias; but the simple question, did these railways, notwithstanding such annexation as is described in the case, retain the character of personal chattels; for, if they did not, they were not liable to be distrained for rent. It is a general rule that things adhering to the freehold cannot be taken under a distress for rent, the reason being as stated by Gilbert, C. B. (Gilbert on Distress, pp. 34, 48), "that a distress was anciently no more than a pledge in the hands of the lord, to compel the tenant to pay the service or perform the duty for which it was taken. It results from the nature of a pawn or pledge that upon payment of the money for security whereof it was given, it ought to be restored to the owner in the same plight and condition in which it was delivered, and whatsoever is part of the freehold cannot be distrained, for what is part of the freehold cannot be severed from it without detriment to the thing itself in the removal." Consequently, that cannot be a pledge which cannot be restored in statu quo to the owner. In determining whether the thing distrained is a personal chattel or a fixture, it is important to consider the mode and degree of annexation to the soil or fabric; that is, whether it can easily be removed integre salve et commode, without injury to itself or to the fabric of the building, and in the next place whether it was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the freehold or merely for a temporary purpose, or the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel (per Park, B. in Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Ex. 312.) We think that it must be taken as a fact that the railways in question were constructed for the better enjoyment of the colliery, and were so far permanent that they were intended to remain on the premises as auxiliary to the working of the mines, at least until the expiration of the term, and were so constructed and fixed, not for the purpose of steadying them for their better use as chattels, but as a substitute for the natural surface of the ground along which it would have been impracticable to have worked the trains. It is expressly found by the arbitrator that they were so fixed and attached to the freehold as not to be capable of being removed without considerable violence and wrenching by means of picks and iron bars, so that in their removal considerable holes were left in the surface by the falling in of the ballast material. The rails were wrenched from the sleepers by the use of similar instruments, leaving large nails sticking in the sleepers, and in the new railway the ballast was so placed and packed as to form a roadway for the horses drawing the trucks over the railway. Now this is a great deal more than attaching the railways slightly so as to be capable of removal without the least injury to the surface or to themselves: (Per Parke, B., in Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Exch. 312.) The argument in favour of the defendant mainly rested upon the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Hellawell v. Eastwood, 6 Exch. 295, and upon the judgment of the Lords Justices in The Duke of Beaufort v. Bates, 31 L. J. 481, Ch. The case of Hellawell v. Eastwood has been frequently cited in support of propositions to which it was not applicable; but it has been recognised in this court in Waterfall v.

Penistone, 6 E. & Bl. 876, and was referred to and distinguished in the judgment of this court in Longbottom v. Berry and another, 22 L. T. N. S. 385, and contains, as it appears to us, a true exposition of the law as applicable to the particular facts upon which it proceeded. In that case the things distrained were mules used for spinning of cotton, fixed to the floor of a mill by screws, or let into stone and secured by molten lead, and Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court said, "they were attached slightly, so as to be capable of removal without the least injury to the fabric of the building or to themselves, and the object and purpose of the annexation was not to improve the inheritance, but merely to render the machines steadier and more capable of convenient use as chattels." Can this be said to describe the condition of the railways in the present case? On the contrary, the works in that case were more like the trams and trucks used on the railway in the present than the railways themselves, which appear to us to have been more analogous to the floors of the mill. Mr. Grove's argument assumed that, inasmuch as some of the ballasting material was brought from a distance to fill up the depressed places, and to pack the sleepers, it did not become part of the soil or ground upon which it was placed. It does not appear to us to make any difference that the natural soil alone was used where the earth was dry and porous, and afforded hard material, but additional material was combined with it, where the conditions were different, and the natural earth was moist. The case of the Duke of Beaufort v. Butes (ubi sup.), which was referred to for some expressions of the Lords Justices, has no application to the present. It turned upon the construction of covenants in a mining lease, and whether some trams and sleepers, merely laid upon the ground which had become indented by their mere user, were liable to be seized in execution as personal trade chattels. The execution-creditor in that case having undertaken not to seize other trams fastened to stone sleepers, the injunction which was granted by a Vice-Chancellor was dissolved by the Lords Justices. The other cases which were cited on the argument did not relate directly to the question in this case, but affected it incidentally only. It is not necessary, therefore, to advert to them. The result will be that judgment will be entered for the plaintiff for the sums assessed by the arbitrator with reference to all the railways in question, as replaced in statu quo.

JONES (app.) v. WHITAKER (resp.)

Billiard licence—Supplying beer to players—Beer not an exciseable liquor—Beerhouse keeper, having also a billiard licence.

Beer is not an exciseable liquor. Where, therefore, A. was licensed under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 10, to keep billiard tables, which licence forbids the party licensed to "allow the consumption of exciseable liquors," and A. notwithstanding, permitted beer to be drunk by those frequenting his billiard tables, whereupon he was convicted of an offence against the tenor of his licence:

Held, that the conviction was wrong.

Semble, that a person who is licensed under the 3 & 4

Vict. c. 61 to sell beer upon certain premises, and who is also licensed to keep billiard tables upon the same premises, is not prohibited from selling beer to those who frequent the house to play billiards.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the stipendiary magistrate for Manchester, upon a conviction of the appellant, who had a licence to keep a billiard table, for an offence against the tenor of his licence, for allowing exciseable liquors to be consumed on his premises. It appeared that the appellant, at the time of the alleged offence, had a licence under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, to sell beer to be consumed upon the premises in question. He had also obtained a licence under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 10, to keep billiard tables upon the same premises. The foregoing section enacts that the justices in every division shall, at their annual meetings for the licensing of alehouses, have authority "to grant billiard licences to such persons as the said justices shall in their discretion deem fit and proper to keep public billiard tables, bagatelle boards, or instruments used in any game of the like kind . . . and every such billiard licence shall be in the form given in the third schedule annexed to this Act," &c.

The form of the licence, as given in the said third schedule, contains several restrictions, as follows, "and do not wilfully or knowingly permit drunkenness or other disorderly conduct in the said house, and do not knowingly allow the consumption of exciseable liquors therein by the persons resorting thereto, and do not knowingly suffer any unlawful games therein," &c.

It appeared that the appellant, on the day when the alleged offence was committed, supplied persons who were playing billiards in the billiard-room with certain quantities of beer for consumption there, which was the offence charged.

Ambrose appeared for the appellant. The appellant was wrongly convicted—First, because his licence as a beerhouse keeper, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, enabled him to sell beer to anyone in the house, and is not controlled by the restriction contained in the billiard licence, which only applies to cases where there is a licence for billiards only. The prohibition in the licence, moreover, did not intend to prohibit the sale of all liquors, otherwise it would not in terms have forbidden drunkenness. Secondly, Beer is not an exciseable liquor. There is now no excise upon beer, although it is still necessary to take out an excise licence to sell it. That, however, does not constitute beer an exciseable liquor. By the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 51, s. 1, "all the rates, duties, allowances, drawbacks, and bounties now payable on beer or ale brewed or made in Great Britain (except the said hereditary duties of excise on cider, beer, and ale, granted to his said Majesty King Charles the Second, and hereinafter more particularly specified), shall be repealed, cease, and determine, and be no longer levied or collected, paid or payable." And by the 2nd section it is enacted that the said hereditary duties shall not be collected during the King's reign, which provision has been continued in the present reign. The 64th chapter of the same reign regulates the sale of beer, and provides for a licence being taken out. In Reg. v. Lancashire, 7 Ell. & Bla. 839, it appeared that by the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 18, a penalty is imposed on any person who shall, without a licence, sell any exciseable liquor by retail, to be drunk on the premises; and by sect. 37 "exciseable liquor" is to include sweets or wines which now are or hereafter may be charged with duty, either by customs or excise. By stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77, s. 9, the excise duty on sweets or made wines is repealed; but by sect. 10 the duty on licences to be taken out by retailers thereof is continued, and all such licences shall still be taken out. It was held that a person who, since the stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77, sold sweets or made wines by retail, &c., without a licence, could not be convicted under sect. 18 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, sweets and made wines being no longer exciseable liquors within the meaning of that Act. Lord Campbell, C. J. said, in giving judgment, "The only question submitted to the court is, whether sweets or made wines are exciseable liquors within the meaning of sect. 18 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. If they are, the conviction is to stand; if they are not, it is to be quashed. In my opinion they are not exciseable liquors within the meaning of that statute. They are not exciseable liquors unless they are liable as liquor to pay an excise duty. They were formerly liable as liquor to such duty; but now they are not. That duty is repealed by stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77. Sweet and made wines are now no more exciseable liquors than is water." Coleridge, J., also says, "But for the fact that my brother Erle differs from the rest of the court I should have said there was no difficulty in the case. The clause to be interpreted is a penal one, and to be construed according to the ordinary applicable rule. The question is, whether sweets or made wines are now exciseable liquors within the meaning of the clause. It is not disputed that they were so when stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, was passed, but the question is, whether they are now so since the passing of stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77. By the interpretation clause in stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, the phrase 'exciseable liquor' is made expansive according to the circumstances which may arise in the future. In stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77, there is a distinction carefully made in sects. 9 and 10 between a duty in the liquors and on the licences to sell them. By sect. 9, those which were before exciseable liquors are made not to be so; but by sect. 10 it is declared that though the liquors are no longer exciseable liquors, no person shall sell them by retail without taking out the same licence as before. That seems to me to show distinctly that the liquors in question are no longer exciseable liquors; and if so, I am clearly of opinion that sect. 18 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, is not applicable." Crompton, J. says, "I cannot see that that part of the conviction is made out in fact which alleges that the said wine is 'an exciseable liquor in respect of which a duty of excise was then and there by law charged.' Throughout the Acts there are two different duties imposed, one on certain liquors, and another on the licences to sell them. In the first Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 37) a duty of excise was imposed on the liquors which thereby became exciseable liquors. In the same year, by 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, another duty was imposed on another thing though relating to the same liquors, which duty was a duty upon the licences to sell the liquors, which licences were to be granted by the Excise. By 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, another licence was to be taken out, namely, a licence to be granted by justices to any person keeping or about to keep inns, &c., to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises. By 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 77, the duty on the liquors in question is repealed, but the necessity of taking out the excise licence is preserved and so is the duty on such licence. The licence to be granted by justices is not mentioned, and I should suppose designedly so; because such licence is no longer necessary or applicable, the liquors in question being no longer exciseable liquors. If sects. 10 and 11 be confined to excise licences, the whole Act is sensible. If I had agreed with my brother Erle as to his view of the present state of the law, I should have thought this conviction wrong in form, that a new form was necessary, or that there should have been an indictment. I am of opinion that the conviction cannot be supported."

JONES (app.) v. WHITAKER (resp.)

Erle, J. differed from the rest of the court, but for reasons which hardly touch the present case. This case is conclusive upon the point, and as therefore beer was not exciseable liquor, it was not against the tenor of his licence for the appellant to sell it on his premises.

Hopwood for the respondent.—Beer has always popularly been considered and treated as an exciseable liquor. By the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, it is enacted by sect. 37, that the words "exciseable liquor" shall be deemed to include any ale, beer, or other fermented malt liquor, sweets, cider, perry, wine, or other spirituous liquor which now is or may hereafter be, charged with duty either by customs or excise. [MELLOR, J.—At that time beer was an exciseable liquor.] In the recent statute the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, beer is recognised as an exciseable liquor. Sect. 16 imposes a penalty upon any licensed person if he "is convicted of keeping his house open for the sale of or of selling beer, cider, wine, spirits, or any other exciseable liquor." [MELLOR, J.—The words "or any other exciseable liquor," must be taken to apply to the word immediately preceding, namely, "spirits."] There would be a great inconsistency in holding that a person who by his billiard licence is prohibited from selling beer, should nevertheless be enabled to do so under his beer licence. [MELLOR, J.—If the magistrates thought it objectionable, they could have refused the billiard licence.] The Legislature has itself stepped in, and said, that beer shall not be drunk upon premises licensed for billiards. It has itself given a form of licence in which this prohibition is found. The case of Reg. v. Lancashire stands by itself, and was decided upon its own peculiar facts. Sweets were not considered exciseable, whilst beer always has been.

MELLOR, J.—Upon the authority of the case in 7 Ell. & Bl., we ought to hold that beer does not fall within the description of an exciseable liquor. It has been argued that the 16th section of the late Act recognises beer as an exciseable liquor, inasmuch as it uses the words "beer, cider, wine, spirits, or any other exciseable liquor;" but I think the argument fails, because the rule of construction is, that general words of this kind apply to the last antecedent. If, indeed, the words had been "wine, spirits, beer, or any other exciseable liquor," it might have been different, and would have indicated that the Legislature considered beer to be an exciseable liquor. Now, I really cannot see any difference between the present case and Reg. v. Lancashire. It appears that in that case the excise duty upon sweet wines had been repealed, and the majority of the court were, therefore, of opinion that such wines no longer remained exciseable liquors. The only fact which at all distinguishes this case from that, is that of the excise being nominally continued as a portion of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, though in effect they are abolished. But I think it would be strange to say that where no duty is imposed yet, because the duty is not absolutely abolished, that this remains an exciseable liquor; and I certainly cannot hold, that because it requires an excise licence to sell beer, that therefore it is an exciseable liquor. The court held, in Reg. v. Lancashire, that the taking out a licence to sell an article does not constitute it an exciseable article. Under these circumstances, we are certainly warranted in holding that the beer which the appellant was convicted for selling was not an exciseable liquor, and the conviction, therefore, should be quashed.

PICOTT, B.—I quite agree with my brother Mellor. We have to say whether or not this selling has been unlawful. I think that the case of Reg. v. Lancashire, in which it was held that a liquid is not an exciseable liquor unless it is liable to the excise, is exactly in point; and that the beer sold in this case was not an exciseable liquor. If any mischief is likely to arise from beer being sold in this way in a house licensed for billiards, the magistrates have the remedy of not licensing.

Conviction quashed.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE COUNTY LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY;

THE BRITON ASSURANCE SOCIETY'S CASE.

Assurance company—Persons assuming to be directors—Contract with—Issue of policy by—Observance of all formalities—Laches of de jure directors—Company held bound.

In contracting with an insurance company, incorporated under the Companies Act 1862, a stranger must be taken to have read that statute and the articles of association of the company, but nothing more; and if he knows nothing to the contrary, he has a right to assume, as against the company, that all matters of internal arrangement have been duly complied with.

Where, therefore, a policy was granted at the duly registered office of an incorporated assurance company, and was executed by the required number of persons styling themselves directors and qualified as such, and counter-signed by a person styling himself secretary, and with the common seal of the company affixed thereto, in such manner as the articles of association required, the sum assured by the policy was admitted as a debt due to the policy holder, notwithstanding that the directors legitimately appointed had refused to act and repudiated all connection with the company, had made no appointment of new directors or a secretary, and had allotted no shares, and that the persons professing to be directors were self-constituted, and had from that time exclusively conducted business ostensibly on behalf of the company.

Beyond all doubt, the real directors might at any moment have got an injunction, and put an end to the company; and as they did not do so, it was assumed against them that they knew that the company had some office and was carrying on some business.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of the above-mentioned company, which is now being wound-up in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls, against an order whereby his Lordship allowed a claim in respect of a policy of assurance for 250*l.*, which had been carried in by the Briton Medical and General Life Association, under the following circumstances:—

The company was incorporated on the 9th Jan. 1863, on which day memorandum and articles of association were registered. The former was signed by nine persons, among whom were five persons named Smith, Keating, Bolton, Munro, and Ambler, and their signatures were attested by Mr. William Howell Preston, who was the promoter of the company. Each of these five gentlemen subscribed for 100 shares, and in all 825 were subscribed for by the nine.

By the articles it was provided that the registered office of the company should be in London, or elsewhere in England, as the directors should from time to time determine; that all shares should be allotted exclusively by the directors; that until the holding of the first general meeting the number of directors should be such as the directors for the time being should deem expedient, but not less than four nor more than twenty; and that until such meeting the directors for the time being should have full power to nominate and appoint duly qualified persons to be directors, but that each director should hold not less than 100 shares; that the first directors should be Messrs. Ambler, Bolton, Keating, and Munro, and a Mr. Prowett; that one-third of the whole number of directors, if that number was divisible by three, should constitute a quorum, but if not then that such number, not being below three, as should amount to one-third, should constitute a quorum; that the directors should cause a seal to be engraved, to be used as the common seal of the company, with the name of the company engraved thereon, and it was to be under the charge of the manager or secretary; that the said William Howell Preston should be the first manager, managing director, and actuary, and should be appointed for life; that the directors, or a committee of them, or such persons as they might appoint, should have the right to accept or refuse proposals for assurance; that every policy, &c., should be signed by three at least of the directors, and counter-signed by the managing director, secretary, or manager, and should be sealed with the common seal.

Mr. Prowett never took any shares in the company, and he refused to become a director, and from this refusal and other causes the remaining persons nominated by the articles became dissatisfied, and a meeting of the subscribers of the memorandum of association was held in June 1863, when three of the directors, Ambler, Munro, and Bolton, resolved that the objects of the company could not be successfully carried out, that no shares should be allotted, and no further steps taken towards establishing the company. Notice of this resolution was sent to all the subscribers who had not attended the meeting, and also to Mr. W. H. Preston, and no objection was made to it by any person.

Mr. Preston resolved, however, to proceed, and on the 11th Dec. 1863, he gave notice in writing to the four directors that the company was about to commence business, and requested them to inform him if they would act as directors. They all refused and repudiated all further connection with the company.

On the 7th March 1864, a Mr. William Badock, signing himself secretary, wrote from 36, Cannon-street, which was then the registered office of the company, to all the subscribers, announcing that the company had commenced operations, and requesting payment of the sums payable on allotment of shares.

Mr. Smith and Mr. Preston then elected other directors, and allotted shares to several persons; the names of such alleged shareholders were by them returned to the registrar of joint stock companies, as were the various addresses at which from time to time the company's chief office was situated; a common seal was also made and used. In Jan. 1864, Mr. Rymer was elected a director by Smith and Preston, and in June 1864, a meeting was held at which three persons were elected directors, and these afterwards elected others, and appointed a secretary; business was thus carried on ostensibly by the company until Jan. 1866, by which time it had issued no less than 350 policies. It was then amalgamated with the National Standard Life Insurance Company, and it ceased to have a separate existence.

Among the policies which the company had issued was the one above referred to, on the life of Sir Doughty Tichborne; it was issued to the respondents' company, at the then registered place of business, and it was signed by three persons styling themselves directors (one of whom was Mr. Preston), countersigned by Mr. Charles Rutherford, styling himself secretary, and sealed with the pretended common seal of the company.

Three of the original directors, Messrs. Ambler, Keating, and Munro, presented a petition to have the company wound-up by the court, and an order was accordingly made on the ground that it had not commenced its business within a year of its incorporation: (Companies Act 1862, sect. 79, cl. 2.) In the winding-up the respondents carried in their claim, inasmuch as Sir Doughty Tichborne had died before the amalgamation, and the Standard had therefore not undertaken the liability upon that policy.

His Lordship, the Master of the Rolls, in delivering judgment, said: "If a company and the shareholders of a company are desirous to carry on the company, the fact that all the first registered directors think fit to say, 'We will have nothing to do with it, we will not attend,' will not prevent the company being carried on. The managing director is then compelled to resort to such measures as he can for the purpose of carrying it on. If they do not think fit to have recourse to legal measures to stop him, can they afterwards come forward at their own pleasure and say, 'It is no company at all; you are a mere set of forgers, and have used a name and a seal to which you have no title?' I confess I am astonished at the case being brought before me; I do not believe that these gentlemen really intended to do anything wrong, but I am satisfied that I should be doing what would be very wrong, if I were to allow a thing of this kind to take place, and to say that where strangers have been dealing with a company, and have been allowed to deal with it, and have found a deed, articles, and the memorandum of association duly registered and executed, they are not to be at liberty to proceed because certain persons have retired from it altogether." His Lordship allowed the proof with costs to the claimant out of the assets of the company, and the official liquidator now appealed.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Jessel, Q. C., and Ince, supported the appeal, and contended that the company could not be liable; for the persons signing the policy were only pretended directors, and the seal was a pretended seal.

Southgate, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C., and Francis Webb, for the respondents, contended that the company had actually gone on with the full knowledge of the de jure directors, who had done nothing to stop it.

Ince having been heard in reply,

Jan. 28.—Lord Justice GIFFARD said: It certainly is marvellous that a company such as this should have been able to carry on business to the extent of having 350 policies and upwards effected with it. However, the evidence on both sides appears to admit that this is the fact, and what I really have to decide is whether or not a person who holds, or rather a company who holds, one of those policies has a right to prove against this company—the company, and no one else, being, on this occasion, the appellants.

As far as the material facts go, they lie in a very small compass. [His Lordship here stated the facts.] Before I go further I may say beyond doubt that the directors of this company might at any moment they chose have got an injunction; might at any moment they chose have put an end to this company. They did not choose to do so, and it is not too much to assume against them, at all events, that they knew that the company had at least some place of business or other, and that Mr. Preston had told them he intended to commence operations.

In that state of things the company, who make this claim, effected a policy, duly and properly in the usual course of business. They knew nothing about the internal arrangements of the company, they were not aware that anything irregular had taken place, they were not aware that the directors refused to act, or of any one of those circumstances which are detailed in this evidence. If we look at the policy (and that is material to observe), the policy on the face of it is effected in accordance with the articles; no one looking at the articles, and reading this policy, could know or suspect or believe otherwise than that the policy was as duly effected as any policy you might have from the Equitable, or any of the other large companies in London. I take the law to be perfectly plain, and it is well that there should be no mistake about it, because if it was not perfectly plain, and was such as it would necessarily be held to be if I disagreed with the decision of the Master of the Rolls, it would follow, I think, that the operations of these companies could not by possibility go on; because if it were not so, every person who went to deal with these companies would be bound to inquire and ascertain whether directors were duly appointed, whether resolutions were duly passed, and to inquire into all these matters of internal arrangement, the truth of which it would be morally impossible for him to ascertain.

I take the law to be plainly this, and to be deducible from the authorities on the subject: First of all, no doubt, a stranger must be taken to have read the Acts of Parliament, that is the Companies' Acts, and also to have read the articles of association, but he need not be taken to have read anything more. Of course if the policy-holder had a knowledge of all these facts, the case would have stood on an entirely different footing; but if he knows nothing to the contrary, he has a right to assume as against the company, that all measures of internal arrangement have been duly complied with. If you take the argument which has been addressed to me, it really amounts to this, that measures of internal arrangement have not been complied with. The whole argument is that the directors have not been duly appointed, and that the shares have not been duly allotted. I am not dealing at all with a case where strangers have assumed to take up a company's name. It must always be remembered that on the face of these very articles Mr. Preston was the managing director, and upon the face of this memorandum of association Mr. Smith was a shareholder for 100 shares.

Then there is this next step, which to my mind is quite conclusive upon this subject, namely, that the company is bound by what takes place in the usual course of business with a third party, provided that it takes place in conformity with what I have said, that the third party deals fairly and bona fide in the usual course of business, deals with persons who may be termed de facto directors (as the directors in this case certainly might be), that is to say, persons who might very possibly have been de jure directors. And really all that the third party does is to go to the office. First of all the ordinary correspondence takes place; the whole transaction is done in the usual way; he goes to the office, and he gets from the office that thing which appears on the face of it to be a document executed according to the terms of the articles, and which has to it a seal purporting to be the seal of the company, that seal being put by three persons who represent themselves to be directors, and who de facto (I do not say de jure at all, but de facto) were directors, and that document is countersigned by the person who was de facto secretary. I do not hesitate to say that the business of companies of this description could not possibly go on if that was not held to be the law.

COULTWAS v. SWAN.

[V.C. S.]

That being so, I must dismiss this application with costs.

Some discussion then took place as to the costs, and it appearing that the notice of motion was given on behalf of the company and the liquidator,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—Then you will get the order against both. I am always very much surprised to see the liquidator's name in anything of this kind; it need not be there, and I should have thought it would have been prudent to have kept it out.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April 25 and 26.

COULTWAS v. SWAN.

Conveyance to delay creditors—Subsequent payment of debts—Alleged gift—Resulting trust.

A testator, with a view of placing certain property out of the control of liquidators, conveyed it to his step-daughter absolutely, and, as she alleged, by way of gift. The conveyance purported to be for valuable consideration, but was in fact voluntary. Subsequently the claims of the liquidators were satisfied out of other property belonging to the testator:

Held, that there was a resulting trust in favour of the testator, and that the property must be reconveyed for the benefit of his estate.

This bill was filed for the purpose (inter alia) of recovering, as assets of the testator James Pitcher, certain property which he had conveyed to the defendant Caroline Tooley, under these circumstances:

The testator was formerly a boatman and fisherman, but about thirty years before his death he became a partner with the defendant, William Diver Swan, in a fishery business, and in this way acquired a considerable fortune. In 1860, being then about sixty years of age, he married the defendant Elizabeth Tooley, the mother of the defendant Caroline Tooley.

Upon his marriage he made his will, whereby he devised to the defendants, William Diver Swan and William Dent Tooley, all his messuages and other hereditaments upon certain trusts, under which the plaintiffs were beneficially interested; and subsequently, by a codicil dated the 25th March 1862, he devised the property in question, namely, a house situate in Apsley-road, Denes, Great Yarmouth, to his wife for life, and after her death upon the trusts of his will.

The testator was a holder of forty-five shares in the East of England Banking Company, which stopped payment on the 20th July 1864, and on the 27th of the same month the testator conveyed the house in question to Caroline Tooley, in consideration of 500*l.*, purporting to be paid by her.

Subsequently the company was wound-up, and the testator was called upon to pay 2850*l.*, being the total amount of his loss for calls and costs. He died in Dec. 1866.

The plaintiffs alleged that at the time of the stoppage of the bank the testator, who was then worth about 14,000*l.*, became apprehensive that he would lose the whole of his property, and that his wife, taking advantage of his condition, induced him to make the above conveyance to her daughter. They further alleged that the testator was at the time ill and incapable of managing his affairs; that the 500*l.* was his own money, and that the pretended payment was merely made with a view of concealing the true nature of the transaction, in the event of the liquidators of the bank attempting to impeach the conveyance.

In support of this latter statement, the plaintiff adduced evidence to the effect that on the occasion of the execution of the deed, the testator handed the 500*l.* to his wife, who handed it just before the transaction to Caroline Tooley, who handed it to the testator's solicitor, who handed it back again to the testator.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs charged that the testator never intended to make any gift of the 500*l.* to Caroline Tooley, and that he only placed it in her hands because he was told that it was necessary that money should appear to pass on the execution of the conveyance; that the pretended sale and conveyance were wholly void in equity, and that the defendant, Caroline Tooley, was a trustee of the house for the benefit of the testator's estate, and that she ought, subject to the life interest of her mother, to be decreed to reconvey the same upon the trusts of the will and codicil, and they prayed for relief accordingly.

The defendant, Caroline Tooley, by her answer, gave the following version of the transaction: "She stated that at about the time mentioned by the plaintiffs the testator, who was perfectly able to manage his own affairs, told her that he would make her a present of the house in question, on the condition that she promised to allow him and his wife to live in it during their lives without paying rent. To this she agreed, and on the following day she went with the testator to the office of his solicitor, where he executed the conveyance, which, together with the other deeds relating to the property, was afterwards handed to her and kept by her in her possession. She admitted that there was no real sale, and that the payment of the 500*l.* was merely made with the view of preventing the liquidators of the bank from impeaching the conveyance, but she insisted that the property was given freely to her by the testator, and she produced evidence to the effect that the testator, after the execution of the conveyance, had spoken, in the hearing of several witnesses, of having made her a gift of it.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Chitty, for the plaintiffs, submitted that there was a resulting trust in favour of the testator, and that the property, therefore, passed under his will to the plaintiffs, subject to the widow's life interest. They were stopped by the court.

Karslake, Q. C. and Lindley, for the defendant Caroline Tooley, contended that the property was intended by the testator as a provision for the defendant. They admitted that the 500*l.* was merely paid with a view of concealing the nature of the transaction from the testator's creditors in the event of his becoming embarrassed; but they urged that the question must be decided as if the settlor himself were living; and if the conveyance was made for the purpose of putting the property out of the reach of his creditors, the purpose was an improper one, and the court would allow no resulting trust for the benefit of his estate. They cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The real question raised in this suit is whether the property which is conveyed by the deed in dispute, is to be considered as having passed to the defendant Miss Tooley, as a trustee, or according to the claim put forth by her as property to which she is entitled by gift from the testator. Her title to that which she says she got as a gift is expressed to be a title by contract. I do not say that there might not have been a valid gift, but in order to make it so there must be the clearest evidence of an intention to give by way of a voluntary gift, and that must be perfected by a conveyance or delivery of the subject-matter of the gift. It was evidently intended that the deed should appear to be a conveyance for valuable consideration; and, in order to give it that character, the money was made to pass from the purchaser to the vendor and a receipt was taken. It is certain, however, that no money passed, and that the payment by Miss Tooley was a mere juggle. The question is whether that gift which is said to have been made, was in reality made by the testator. There is no evidence entitled to any weight as to the conveyance being intended as a deed of gift; but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the deed was executed for the purpose of placing the property out of the reach of the liquidators of the bank in which the testator was a shareholder. No doubt it is possible that a case might have been made out of a subsidiary purpose, and the testator might have intended to give the beneficial interest in this property to Miss Tooley, but it is impossible to contend that it was intended by the deed to give an interest in any other character than as a purchaser. There is certainly evidence that Miss Tooley was a probable object of bounty, but neither a declaration by a donor that he has made a gift, nor the evidence of the circumstances showing an intention to make one, is a proof of a gift. It is said, however, that if this property was conveyed for the purpose of putting it out of the reach of the liquidators, that was an improper purpose, and that the court therefore cannot allow any resulting trust to take effect. I do not know of any authority to support such a proposition. It is stated by Mr. Lewin in his work on trusts that no resulting trust can come upon a conveyance made mala fide, but that statement must be taken as subject to some qualification. Lord Cottonham was of opinion, in Skarf v. Souby, 1 M. & G. 364, that the mere fact of a man's being indebted at the date of a settlement is not sufficient to invalidate it. This court never presumes fraud, and where it finds a man prefers to pay his creditors out of one part of his property, and withdraw other parts from their reach, it will not impeach the transaction. It seems to me impossible to say that this conveyance was made for the purpose of passing any beneficial interest to Miss Tooley. The circumstances under which she has endeavoured to take possession of the property are very different from those which were contemplated when the deed was executed, the ordinary purpose of which was to make it appear that Miss Tooley was a purchaser, which she was not. If there was no gift of the property there must clearly be a resulting trust, and as there is no evidence to support a gift, I am of opinion that this property is part of the assets of the testator, and that Miss Tooley has no right to it. There must, therefore, be a reconveyance of the property for the benefit of the testator's estate.

Practice—Infants—Proceedings since birth of—Supplemental order—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

Where proceedings had been taken in a suit after it had become defective by the birth of children:

Held (following Auster v. Haines, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 445; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152), that the court would not make a supplemental order under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52, to bring the infants before the court, and to direct that they should be bound by the proceedings.

Walker v. Walker, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201, overruled.

This was an administration suit in which a decree had been made directing the usual accounts and inquiries to be taken and made.

On the 10th March a supplemental order was obtained to allow two infants who had been born since the decree, and who were members of the class interested in remainder, to be added as parties to the suit. While the proceedings were defective in consequence of the birth of these infants, two orders had been made in the suit. The above supplemental order was made on the authority of Grunwell v. Gardner, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 355; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 693, and Walker v. Walker, L. Rep. 8, Eq. 663; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201.

Renshaw now mentioned to the court that difficulties had occurred in obtaining the order, owing to the decisions in Auster v. Haines, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 445; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152; and Capps v. Capps, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 1, in the former of which cases the Lord Chancellor held that when a suit had become defective by the birth of children, the court had no jurisdiction to make a supplemental order under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86 s. 52, to bring the infants before the court and direct that they should be bound by the proceedings.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he must stop the supplemental order which had been obtained on the authority of Grunwell v. Gardner, as he was bound by the decision of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Auster v. Haines, to which his attention had not previously been called.

KETTLEWELL v. BARSTOW.

Practice—Motion to discharge order for amendment of bill—Previous application to dismiss bill for want of prosecution—Waiver.

After defendants had obtained the usual conditional order that the bill be dismissed as against them for want of prosecution, and the plaintiff, within the time limited by such order, had filed a replication, it was Held that, under the circumstances, the defendants were estopped from afterwards moving to have a previous order to amend the bill discharged, on the ground of irregularity.

This was a motion on behalf of the defendants, Thomas and William Fawcett, that an order dated the 5th March 1869, obtained by the plaintiff for the amendment of his bill should be discharged.

The bill was filed on the 25th Nov. 1858, against Benson Barstow, John Michael Barstow, William Fawcett (since deceased), Thomas Fawcett, and others.

On the 3rd Feb. 1869, a plea to the relief and discovery was filed and notice thereof duly given.

On the 18th Feb. an order of course to amend the bill was served upon the defendants' solicitors.

On the 5th March another order to amend was obtained by the plaintiff, but was not served upon the defendants or their solicitors. The bill as amended in pursuance of the last order, was served on the late defendant, William Fawcett, who duly appeared thereto on the 10th March. William Fawcett died in June 1868.

The next step taken by the plaintiff in this cause was the obtaining of an order to revive dated 11th Jan. 1870, a copy of which was served upon the defendants' solicitors. The order to revive was obtained in consequence of an application by the two Barstows that the bill be dismissed for want of prosecution.

The defendants, Thomas and William Fawcett, appeared in the revived suit on the 4th Feb. 1870. On the 12th May 1870, a motion was made on behalf of Thomas and William Fawcett, that the bill as against them be dismissed for want of prosecution. The usual order was thereupon made that the plaintiffs should within fourteen days file replication or that the bill should stand dismissed as against Thomas and William Fawcett. Replication was accordingly filed on the 13th May. The defendants now moved to discharge the order to amend of the 5th March 1869, on the ground that the same was irregular by reason of the plaintiff not having served the defendants therewith, and not having undertaken to reply to the plea within three weeks of its having been filed, under the Consolidated Orders 14, rule 17, Morgan 449.

Russell Roberts appeared in support of the motion, and cited

Taylor v. Shaw, 2 Sim. & Stewart 12.

Cottrell appeared for the plaintiff, and submitted that the defendants, upon their motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, had acquiesced in the former order to amend. Upon that motion the Vice-Chancellor had intimated it was a step which might prejudice the defendants' position.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the motion would not do. Before the motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution the defendants ought to have considered whether or not to take the bill off the file. Now that they had obtained an order on that motion, with costs, against the plaintiff, they were not in a position to make this motion, which must be refused with costs.

STYRING v. WATERS.

Assents to a letter of licence—Deed under Bankruptcy Act 1861.

A deed contained a licence for three years to a debtor to attend to his affairs without hindrance by his creditors, and an assignment of part of his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors; and it was declared to be a deed within the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. Some of the creditors necessary to make up the statutory majority had assented to a letter of licence granting the debtor the period of three years for payment of 20s. in the pound to his creditors:

Held, that this was a substantial difference between the deed and the assents, and that the deed was therefore no answer to an action by a non-assenting creditor.

The declaration was upon a promissory note for 46l. 14s., and money counts for the consideration.

The only plea to the action set out an indenture made the 1st Feb. 1867 between the defendant, therein called the debtor, of the one part, and the several other persons mentioned and described in the schedule thereto, being respectively creditors, either in their own right or in co-partnership, or attorneys or agents of creditors of the defendant, and all other the persons who would have been entitled to prove in bankruptcy against the estate of the defendant if he had been adjudicated bankrupt on the day of the date thereof, and all and every the creditors of the defendant, whether executing the said deed or not, all which said creditors and persons are thereafter referred to as "the said creditors," of the other part. After reciting that the said debtor was then justly and truly indebted to the said several creditors in divers sums of money, which he was unable to pay and satisfy without respite and time to be given him for payment thereof. And reciting an indenture bearing date the 18th Oct. 1866, and made between the same parties as those of the deed of the 1st Feb. 1867, whereby, in consideration of the said debtor agreeing to pay to his said creditors the sum of 20s. in the pound at the expiration of three years from the day of the date thereof, in full discharge of their respective debts, the said creditors agreed to accept the said proposition, and covenanted not to sue or molest the said debtor during the said period for or concerning any of their respective debts then owing to them by the said debtor. And reciting that the said indenture had been duly stamped and registered; and that certain questions had arisen as to the validity of certain portions of the said deed of the 18th Oct. 1866, and the said deed itself had been destroyed by fire, which wholly consumed the offices and papers of the said debtor's solicitor, who attested the execution of the said deed by the said debtor, and had the custody thereof; and that a majority of the creditors in number, and representing more than three-fourths in value of the debts owing by the said debtor, had assented to the proposition of the said debtor that a new deed should be executed by him, whereby it should be agreed that he, the said debtor, should pay to all and every his said creditors, whether executing the said deed or not, within the period of three years from the 18th Oct. 1866, the sum of 20s. in the pound, in full satisfaction of their respective debts, and also that by way of partly securing such payment, he, the said debtor, should forthwith convey to a trustee his respective equities of redemption in certain freehold and copyhold hereditaments at Isleworth, in Middlesex, and also in certain freehold and leasehold hereditaments at Crickmoor, in Dorsetshire, for the equal benefit of all and every the said creditors. And reciting that in pursuance of such agreement the said debtor had by indenture dated the 31st Jan. 1867, and made between himself of the one part, and a certain L. D. Lewis of the other part, duly conveyed to the said L. D. Lewis, all and singular his equities of redemption in the said hereditaments at Isleworth and Crickmoor respectively: Upon trust to make sale of the same with all convenient speed, and after payment of mortgage moneys respectively secured thereon, and of the costs and expenses incident to such sale, to distribute the surplus money equally and rateably amongst all the creditors of the said debtor. And reciting that the property, credits, estate and effects comprised in and to be collected and distributed under the present deed were the same as those comprised in and to be collected and distributed under the deed of the 18th Oct. 1866. It was witnessed by the deed set out in the plea that in pursuance of the said agreement, and for the considerations aforesaid, they, the said several creditors, and each and every of them, at the request of the said debtor, had given and granted, and by their present letters did give and grant unto the said debtor full free liberty and licence to follow and attend to any affairs, business matters, or things whatsoever, in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or elsewhere, without any let, suit, trouble, arrest, attachment, or any other impediment whatsoever, by them or any of them, or by their, or any or either of their heirs, executors, administrators, partners, and assigns, or any of them, or by their, or any, or either of their means or procurement, for and during three years next and immediately ensuing the 18th Oct. 1866. And further the said creditors, and each of them, did covenant and grant, for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators respectively, and not jointly, or one for another, or for their heirs, executors, or administrators of each other, to and with the said debtor, that they, or any of them, their heirs, executors, and administrators, should not nor would, during the time aforesaid, sue, arrest, attach, seize, molest, impede, or trouble the said debtor, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or his or their bodies, goods, or estates, for or concerning any debt, or sum or sums of money which he then owed, or was indebted to the said creditors, by himself, solely, or jointly, with or for any other person or persons, by bond, bill, covenant, or otherwise howsoever, or for any other matter, cause, or thing whatsoever, wherewith he or they now was, were, should, or might be charged or chargeable within the aforesaid term of three years next ensuing the 18th Oct. 1866, by them or any of them, the said creditors, or by any other person or persons, by or through the procurement or consent of them, or any of them, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said presents. And that in the event of any creditors during the term of three years commencing any action, suit, or other proceeding, for the recovery of any of the said debts then due to the said creditors, it should be lawful for the said debtor to plead these presents in bar and as an answer to such action, suit, or other proceeding, and the same should operate and be a bar and answer to such proceeding. And it was thereby declared that these presents were intended to operate as a composition-deed executed by a creditor, within the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and questions relating to the same, or any of the premises, should be decided according to the provisions of that Act with respect to composition-deeds executed by the said debtor in conformity with that section; and so far as the same provisions would allow, these presents should accrue for the benefit of, and be effectual for, and binding in all respects upon, all creditors of the debtor. And if there was anything therein contained not authorised by the said provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 to be introduced into a composition-deed executed by a debtor in conformity with the 192nd section thereof, such unauthorised thing should be obligatory upon those persons only who should have in writing assented to or approved of these presents. The plea went on to aver the fulfilment of all conditions required by the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and that the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant for the debt sued upon, or when the said deed was made, and as such creditor the plaintiff did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed, and was and is bound by the said deed as if he had duly executed the same. And the defendant said that the said term of three years next ensuing the 18th Oct. 1866 had not expired before the commencement of the action, and the defendant was therefore entitled to plead the said deed in bar of this action.

At the trial before Keating, J. at Middlesex the defendant failed to produce any assent by the plaintiff, but assents were proved sufficient to render the deed of the 1st Feb. 1867, valid under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 provided that certain assents made before the date of the first deed, the 18th Oct. 1866, in the following form, could properly be included in the number:

I hereby assent to a letter of licence granting to R. E. Chester Waters, Esq., the period of three years from the 18th Oct. 1866, for the payment of 20s. in the pound to his creditors, on the distinct understanding that the securities I hold are not prejudiced.

A rule nisi had been obtained calling upon the defendant to show cause why the verdict found for him on the trial should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict be entered for the plaintiff for 54*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*, pursuant to leave reserved, on the grounds amongst others that the plea was not proved, the assent of the requisite majority of creditors not having been given to the deed set up by the plea, or on the ground that the deed set up by the plea was not such as to be, within sect. 192 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, binding on non-assenting creditors, and that there was no evidence of the plaintiff's assent; or why judgment should not be entered for the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict on the last-mentioned grounds.

Harington showed cause.—This deed is not like that in Latham v. Lafone, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 115; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627, which was held to be not within the Bankruptcy Act 1861. That deed was a bare letter of licence without any schedule of creditors or debts; it provided no composition and made no assignment of the debtor's property. Here there is a schedule, and an assignment for the benefit of creditors; and it is expressly declared that the deed is intended to be within the Act. Certainly it was held in Rutty v. Benthall, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 488; 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 287, 297, that a deed should substantially correspond with the terms of a previously given assent, but no objection can be raised here to the difference between the two because the further provision in the deed, viz., the assignment of property, was entirely in favour of the creditors,

C. P.]

BURNETT v. PROOIS; Re AN ATTORNEY.

[C. P.]

and not at all to the advantage of the debtor. In Waddington v. Roberts, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 579; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855, a deed containing a release was held valid, although some of the assets related to a composition only. With regard to the reservation of securities in the assets, it was held in Johnson v. Barratt, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 65; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 597, that where it does not appear that debts are secured there need be no reservation: the words at the end of the assents are superfluous.

Herschell supported the rule. — The assents are to a letter of licence, and if the deed carries out the arrangement which the creditors contemplated, it cannot bind the plaintiff who was a non-assenting creditor. But there is a substantial difference between the assents and the deed; even if the assignment were for the benefit of creditors they never assented to its being made to a trustee, who was chosen without any authority from them. It was held lately by the Court of Exchequer that certain assents were invalid because they did not state how or when some instalments were to be paid: Birks v. Clarke, Weekly Notes, 21st May, p. 138.

BOVILL, C. J.—It is not necessary to trouble Mr. Herschell any further. The question is, whether a sufficient number of creditors assented to this particular deed or instrument. I think the ordinary meaning of the form of assent employed is that the creditor agreed to what is generally understood by a letter of licence, by which the debtor is to be left in the control and possession of his property, and he is to get in the amounts due to him and pay off his debts at his own discretion, without disturbance by his creditors, until the expiration of the time allowed him. This is the general nature of such an arrangement, and we must assume it is what the creditors meant by their assents. The deed which was subsequently executed was not a mere letter of licence, but it also contained an assignment to a trustee of the debtor's property for the benefit of his creditors. That arrangement is distinctly recited in the deed set out in the plea; the words are, "a majority of the creditors in number and representing more than three-fourths in value of debts owing by the said debtor, had assented to the proposition of the said debtor that a new deed should be executed by him, whereby it should be agreed that he, the said debtor, should pay to all and every his said creditors, whether executing the said deed or not, within the period of three years from the 18th Oct. 1866, the sum of 20s. in the pound, in full satisfaction of their respective debts, and also that by way of partly securing such payment, he, the said debtor, should forthwith convey to a trustee his respective equities of redemption in certain hereditaments for the equal benefit of all and every the said creditors." It is then recited that in pursuance of such agreement the said debtor had by indenture of the previous day (the 31st Jan.) conveyed these hereditaments to L. D. Lewis upon trust to sell and distribute the surplus moneys after payment of certain mortgages equally and rateably amongst all the creditors of the said debtor. The deed then proceeds to witness that the creditors gave and granted to the debtor full and free liberty and licence to follow and attend to his affairs for three years from the 18th Oct. 1866. The deed subsequently declares that it was intended it should operate as a composition-deed within the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. The substance therefore of the arrangement as recited and carried out by the two deeds of the 31st Jan. and the 1st Feb. was that the debtor should assign his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and in consideration of that assignment the creditors granted him a letter of licence. This, however, was not the substance of the arrangement mentioned in the assents at all; nothing was there said about assignment of property, on the contrary it appeared that the creditors desired that the debtor himself should manage his affairs. At all events, if they had intended to assent to an assignment of the property they might reasonably have reserved to themselves the choice of a trustee; although they were willing that the debtor himself should manage and distribute his estate, the creditors might not agree to a trustee whom the debtor perhaps would choose for some fraudulent purpose. On this ground, that the deed carries out a totally different arrangement from that intended by the assents, I think the rule should be made absolute.

WILLES, J., having heard only part of the arguments, expressed no opinion.

KEATING, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. The creditor assented merely to a letter of licence, the effect of which is well known. It has been argued that the arrangement effected by the deed was equally beneficial to the creditors, but even if that were so, it is a conclusive answer to the argument that in every substantial departure from, or extension of, any arrangement assented to by the creditors, they ought to have an opportunity of considering whether the change is likely to be for their benefit or not. The short ground, therefore, on which this rule should be made absolute, is that this particular deed pleaded to the declaration did not receive a sufficient number of assents.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The assents may be given in writing by the creditors before the execution of the deed, but the deed must carry out substantially the agreement to which the creditors assented. Here the assents and the deed differ in their essential nature and character. The letter of licence to which the creditors assented would have left the debtor at liberty to deal with the whole of his property, but the deed deprived him of a great portion of that property, and substituted for him in the management of it a trustee not chosen by the creditors.

BURNETT v. PROOIS; Re AN ATTORNEY.

Undertaking to withdraw pleas—Liability of defendant's attorney for debt and costs.

An undertaking by a defendant's attorney to withdraw pleas is binding on the defendant, even without any formal consent by plaintiff or his attorney, and ought to be enforced upon an application at chambers.

But if such an undertaking be not carried out, and the plaintiff in consequence loses the benefit of a subsequent judgment, the defendant's attorney is not necessarily liable for the plaintiff's debt and costs.

In this matter a rule nisi had been obtained on behalf of the plaintiff calling upon the defendant's attorney to show cause why he should not pay the amount of the debt and costs recovered in the action to the plaintiff. The rule was granted upon an affidavit, from which it appeared that the plaintiff claimed from the defendant in June 1869, 60l. 12s. 6d., which sum the defendant had promised to pay. An action was brought, and on the 28th July the plaintiff's attorney sent the record to his Preston agents to enter the cause provisionally for trial at Manchester. On the 28th July defendant's attorney wrote to plaintiff's attorney—"Proois ats. Burnett,—I have directed my agents to withdraw plea herein."

On the 29th July plaintiff's attorney wrote to defendant's attorney—"Burnett v. Proois. This cause was entered at Preston yesterday. I think the best way is for you to agree to a judgment when the court is open to-morrow with a fixed amount of costs, say 25*l.*, to be paid at once."

On the 30th July, the Manchester Commission day, defendant's attorney wrote to plaintiff's attorney—"I have directed my agents to withdraw plea unconditionally on the usual terms. Please give consent."

No formal consent was given, but the cause was not entered for trial.

On the 12th Aug., at a meeting of the agents for the attorneys of the parties for taxation of costs, it was stated for the defendant that the plea had never been withdrawn, and therefore judgment could not be signed, nor the costs taxed.

A summons was then taken out to make defendant withdraw plea and to sign judgment, and also to make defendant pay a sum for costs; the summons was however dismissed, although the master expressed his opinion that except as to the costs the order ought to be made.

Afterwards a trader-debtor summons was taken out against the defendant, and he made an affidavit in which he stated that he had a good defence to the action on the ground that the agreed credit had not expired when the writ was issued.

At the Manchester winter assizes the cause was entered and came on for trial; the letters above mentioned from the defendant's attorney were read in court, and Martin, B., stopped the case, and said, when he heard that the summons at chambers had been dismissed, that the undertaking to withdraw the plea ought to have been acted upon, and the defendant's attorney ought to have been forced to withdraw it.

Before the winter assizes came on, the defendant had left the country.

It is provided by No. 8 of the Practice Rules, Hilary Term 1853, that the defendant shall not be at liberty to waive his plea, or enter a relicta verificatione after a demurrer, without leave of the court or a judge, unless by consent of the plaintiff or his attorney.

Quain, Q. C. showed cause.

Milward, Q. C., and F. O. Crump, supported the rule.

BOVILL, C. J.—There is no doubt that the defendant's attorney, in accordance with his letters, was bound to withdraw plea in this case, and there can be no doubt that a learned judge at chambers would have compelled him to carry out what he had undertaken to do, and ordered the plea to be withdrawn, especially where the trial was lost in consequence of those letters. The plea was not withdrawn. There seems to have been some impression that there ought to have been some consent, and that, consent not having been given, the defendant's attorney was relieved from the necessity of withdrawing plea. In that I think he was entirely wrong. But the plea not having been withdrawn, what was the proper course for the plaintiff's attorney to adopt? It seems to me the proper course was to do that which eventually he did—to apply to a judge at chambers on summons for an order that the plea should be withdrawn, and that plaintiff should be at liberty to sign judgment. That is the ordinary and proper course for compelling performance of an undertaking or duty which an officer of the court has undertaken to perform. Upon the application coming on at chambers, the master came to the conclusion that the undertaking must be performed, that the plea must be withdrawn, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, and expressed an opinion to that effect. Then came the question of the costs to which the plaintiff was to be entitled. That was a matter peculiarly within the jurisdiction and discretion of the master of the court. Having heard the parties as to what had taken place between the 29th July and the day on which the application came before the master, the master came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment and to have the plea withdrawn, but was not entitled to any costs subsequent to the 29th July. There are many reasons which might have influenced the master in coming to that conclusion—that the undertaking having been given to withdraw plea, the plaintiff ought not to have taken any other course but that of endeavouring to enforce the undertaking; or he may have thought that plaintiff's attorney desired to proceed to take judgment in the ordinary course. But whatever the reasons, there was a suggestion by the master that the plea should be withdrawn, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, and his opinion was expressed with reference to the costs. The plaintiff's attorney might have accepted the suggestion of the master. If he had done so, the plaintiff would have been entitled to his debt, and the attorney would have had his costs to such a period as the master thought he was entitled to them. The plaintiff's attorney, however, thought fit not to accept the order on those terms. What course then did he adopt? At that time the defendant was in this country. As far as appears from the affidavits there was no probability that he would go abroad. The plaintiff's attorney, for the sake of getting costs from the 29th July to the 13th Aug., determined not to take judgment, but to proceed. What would have been the ordinary course? He might have gone by immediate appeal at judges' chambers from the master to the judge in attendance. But if he did not think fit to go by appeal at chambers, he had ample opportunity of coming before the court the following term. It is said that in the mean time there was an affidavit of merits. But whatever affidavit of merits there might have been, that would not have relieved the attorney from performing an engagement into which he had entered, and on the faith of which the plaintiff had been prejudiced. He would have been compelled to perform the engagement, and any consequences which might have resulted would be borne by him as between himself and his client. But not taking this, which would have been the ordinary and proper course, the plaintiff's attorney knowing that the defendant was at this time resident in England, instead of relying upon the undertaking, abandoned the order which the master was willing to make, and proceeded to trial and judgment at the next assizes, simply for the purpose of obtaining the costs between the 30th July and the 13th Aug. I cannot see any other object. From that time the plaintiff's attorney seems to me to have made his election to proceed in the ordinary course rather than to act upon the undertaking, and he did so as far as I can see for the purpose of obtaining those costs. The defendant was here, but probably at that time the plaintiff's attorney thought it more convenient for himself to proceed as he did. He goes on. The defendant goes abroad in the month of November; the trial comes on in December, and plaintiff obtains his verdict. Then, the defendant being abroad, judgment is fruitless. As to the debt and costs having been lost in consequence of the non-observance of the undertaking, that is not made out on the affidavits. I should attribute the loss rather to the plaintiff's attorney having refused to accept the order of the master. If the money had been lost by the non-observance of the undertaking the remedy might have been against the attorney. As regards the liability of the defendant's attorney on his undertaking, I do not think that the plaintiff's attorney has taken the proper course. The proper application was that made to the master. The master disposed of it. The plaintiff's attorney thought fit to accept the decision, and did not appeal to the judge or the court. He has taken his own course; and because that course happens to turn out unfortunately, I do not think he can take advantage of it. As to the debt and costs, I do not think it was at all established that they were lost in consequence of the defendant's attorney's undertaking. If the plaintiff's attorney had accepted the decision of the master, he would have been in the same position as to the debt as if the undertaking had been complied with at the earlier period. If the costs are lost, they are lost in consequence of the acts of the plaintiff's attorney in refusing the master's order, and going on, not on the footing that the undertaking ought to be performed, but electing to proceed to heap up other costs. I am of opinion, therefore, that this rule ought to be discharged.

WILLES, J.—A complete misconception has been presented on the part of the application when it is suggested that the proper result of a breach of the undertaking to withdraw plea is that the attorney should become answerable for the debt and costs in the action. The distinction in the case of an undertaking to withdraw plea and an undertaking to pay debt and costs is obvious. The amount here is small, but assuming it were an amount of thousands, it would be absurd to suppose that the attorney intended to render himself liable for the debt and costs in case the proceedings against his client upon his undertaking should miscarry. There may be a case—I am not aware of any having occurred, and none has been produced to the court—in which an attorney, having given an undertaking to withdraw plea, and wilfully refused to act upon that undertaking, and so delayed the plaintiff, and that during the delay and in consequence of it he loses an opportunity of recording judgment against the defendant, should render himself liable to pay the debt and costs of the action. There might be such a case but it would be an extreme one. I can understand a case in which an attorney has given an undertaking to withdraw plea, and in which he may properly refuse to act in accordance with that undertaking by reason of the discovery of a fact affecting the liability in the action which was within the plaintiff's knowledge, and not in the knowledge of the attorney signing the undertaking. The bare statement that an undertaking necessarily requires an application to the court in order to enforce it, shows that there must be some occasion upon which it would be the duty of the attorney to hold his hand until the court should order him to comply with the undertaking. The undertaking of an attorney stands upon the same footing as the assent of an attorney to give judgment. Upon this everyone is aware of the case of Wade v. Simeon, 13 M. & W. 647, where the defence of gambling was set up. It would have been hopeless to rely upon the fact that the defendant's attorney gave consent to judgment. The facts were that before the time for final judgment the defendant's attorney discovered ample evidence which, without any negligence on his part, he was in ignorance of, and therefore the court refused to allow the plaintiff to proceed upon the consent, and allowed the defendant to try the question upon the evidence newly discovered. But they took care in that case to secure the plaintiff by ordering payment of the amount into court to abide the event of the action. The result in that case was this: the action was brought upon a cheque, and the answer was that it was part of a gambling transaction; and the claim to sign judgment on the consent was held sufficiently answered by showing that the plaintiff knew of this defence to the action, and the defendant did not. The court has a control over undertakings of this description, and the plaintiff would be entitled to rely upon the enforcement of any such undertaking by the equitable discretion of the court. In this case the equitable discretion is not called into exercise, there being no such case as in Wade v. Simeon. The defence of credit not expired was known to the defendant's attorney at the time of giving the undertaking. The judge would not have allowed him to go back to his defence. The plaintiff, therefore, had nothing to do. I think the master was right in his decision on the summons—at least upon the affidavits he is not made out to be wrong. The plaintiff's attorney unnecessarily proceeded to increase his bill by subsequent costs. If the debt and costs have been lost, they have been lost by the delay of the plaintiff's attorney in availing himself of his remedy. Certainly, no legal liability is imposed on the defendant's attorney to pay the debt and costs, and I think, therefore, that the rule ought to be discharged.

WHITTAKER v. THE MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Negligence—Railway accident—Invitation to alight—Evidence for jury.

A long train of the defendants was stopped at a platform so that part of it was alongside the parapet of a bridge; in the dark the plaintiff, after the train had stopped, and the defendants' servants had called out the name of the station, stepped upon the parapet believing it was the platform, and fell over:

Held, in an action to recover damages for the injuries he sustained by his fall, that the judge was right in leaving the jury to determine whether the circumstances amounted to an invitation to the plaintiff to alight; and that there was evidence of negligence on the defendants' part to justify the verdict which the jury found for the plaintiff.

This action to recover damages in consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendants was tried at Manchester during the last spring assizes before Willes, J. and a special jury. A verdict of 1000*l.* was found for the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, who was a drysalter living at Hyde, in Cheshire, was travelling home from Yorkshire in a third-class carriage by the defendants' line on the evening of the 20th Oct.; when the train reached Newton, the station for Hyde, the servants of the company called out the name of the station, and when the train, which consisted of ten or twelve carriages, stopped, the plaintiff opened the door and stepped out upon what he thought was the platform. It was a very dark misty night, and part of the train had overshot the platform; the platform was about the length of seven carriages only. The carriage in which the plaintiff was travelling stopped alongside of the parapet of a bridge over a street beyond the platform. The plaintiff stepped upon this parapet and fell into the street below, a height of about twenty feet. On the other parapet of this bridge, which was on the opposite side of the line, iron rails had been put up, but there was nothing of the kind where the plaintiff went over. One witness, who was in the next carriage to the plaintiff, stepped out upon what he also expected to find to be the platform, but fell between the parapet and the train. The distance between the floor of the compartment in which the plaintiff was and the parapet, was just three feet; the parapet was about eight inches lower than the carriage floor, and about fourteen inches higher than the platform. There were some lights on the platform, and a lamp in the street below, but they were not sufficient, or were not so placed as to make the distinction between the platform and parapet clear to people in the carriage. The train was not backed after it stopped, but when the passengers had got out, proceeded on its way.

At the conclusion of the summing up, the questions for the jury were put by his Lordship in the following words: "First, I ask you whether you believe the plaintiff's account of the matter, and that he did really think he was stepping out on to the platform? If so, do you think that he was under the circumstances invited by the company's servants, or that what they did amounted to an invitation to get out when he did? Was it an improper or dangerous place for a passenger to be invited to alight at? Was there any opportunity given him of alighting elsewhere? Did he reasonably suppose that he was stepping out on the platform? Were the railway company by their servants guilty of negligence which caused the injury? Did the plaintiff conduct himself reasonably and carefully, and without negligently contributing to the accident? And then to sum it up, really it seems to me that this is the form in which the question might be put, if one were talking it over as a matter of common sense, Was what was done, apart from design (because there is no pretence that it was done from design), a trap set by the negligence of the company's servants, into which the plaintiff fell without contributive negligence on his part. These questions seem to present the sort of considerations, as well as I am able to frame them, upon which your minds must be expressed. If you answer any of these questions against the plaintiff, there ought to be a verdict for the defendants; but if you think they ought to be answered in favour of the plaintiff, there ought to be a verdict for the plaintiff. I do not trouble you to answer them precisely, I only present them as elements for your consideration to determine the question of verdict for the plaintiff or verdict for the defendant."

The learned judge declined to reserve leave, but stayed execution in order to give defendants time to move upon payment of 1200*l.* into court to abide the event.

The injuries sustained by the plaintiff were very severe, and no objection was taken by the defendants to the amount of the damages, but a rule nisi was obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had on the ground of misdirection, in that the judge told the jury that it was a question of fact for them to determine whether the calling out the name of the station was not an invitation to alight, and in that the judge directed the jury that there was evidence of negligence for them to consider; and on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

Holker, Q. C., and Crompton, showed cause against the rule, and referred to the case of Cockle v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S.

513, in which the judges of this court were divided in opinion. Several cases were there considered which have not yet been reported. The case of Bowhell v. London and North-Western Railway Company, a short notice of which appeared in the Times report of the proceedings of the Queen's Bench on the 27th April last, was also cited; and also Siner v. The Great-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 117; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114.

Davison, Q. C., and Channell, supported the rule, and contended that there was clearly contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part, that if he had got down the steps no harm would have happened to him, and that, having passed through the lighted station and found himself in darkness beyond, he ought not to have moved until a light was brought or the train had put back; there was no evidence of any application by the plaintiff to the defendants' servants for the adoption of these courses.

BOVILL, C. J.—This seems to me to be a clear case in favour of the plaintiff. In the case of Cockle v. London and South-Eastern Railway Company there was a difference of opinion on this bench, but there was in that case an absence of express invitation by the defendants to get out of the train, and that point was especially referred to by my brother Brett and myself, and we concluded it was especially a matter for the jury to determine whether an invitation was implied by the circumstances. My brother Smith, who was of opinion that the case ought not to have been left to the jury, said "The station and the platform were not of improper construction, and the train was not drawn up in such a way as to invite the plaintiff to alight, but, on the contrary, there was an absence of the usual intimation." My brother Keating also referred to the same point. "There was no cry of the name of the station, and there was an absence of anything that I can see in the shape of an invitation beyond the mere fact of the train stopping. It has been held that even the stopping of the train, coupled with the cry of the name, is not an invitation to descend, and it therefore seems to me that the absence of the latter fact in this case conclusively negatives the idea of an invitation." In the case now before us, the train drew up at the station where it ought to stop; the name of the station, "Newton for Hyde," was called out before and after the stoppage took place, and a passenger might expect reasonable accommodation for the purpose of alighting. Even upon the grounds relied on by those members of this court, who considered that the rule in Cockle v. London and South-Eastern Railway Company ought to be made absolute, it seems to me to be impossible to say here that there was no evidence of invitation. The case of Bridge v. North London Railway Company, decided in the Queen's Bench, and mentioned by my brother Brett in the judgment I have referred to, is the nearest to this; but, as I understand the circumstances of it, the train had stopped in a tunnel where there was no appearance of a platform, and nothing took place to induce the plaintiff to want to get out. Here the facts reasonably led the plaintiff to believe this was the platform; instead of drawing up at the platform, this carriage was at a place which in the dark appeared like the platform, and which was dangerous. The plaintiff did alight at a place which the jury found to be dangerous. The company provided a proper platform, but their servants neglected to avail themselves of it, and set a trap for the plaintiff. It is not desirable to lay down too definite a rule, the circumstances of each case must be considered, and I think it should be left to the jury to say whether there was any invitation by the defendants or not. It is difficult as a matter of law to say what should always be done by a judge in cases like this; it must depend upon circumstances; but I desire to repeat now what I said in Cockle v. London and South-Eastern Railway Company, that the question of invitation should generally be decided by the constituted tribunal for such questions, viz, a jury. This case is far stronger than that, and the case of Petty v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, in the Exchequer, alluded to by my brother Brett, was also in favour of the plaintiff here. I think the rule should be discharged, and in saying that there was evidence for the jury, I desire to add that I think the facts justified the finding, and there was nothing in the case to induce the jury to find the other way.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The substance of the case was this; the defendants had undertaken to carry the plaintiff safely, and to give him an opportunity to alight in a secure manner; he was induced by the defendants' servants to believe that the carriage was standing at a safe landing place at the platform, and acting upon that belief he stepped upon a trap, and certainly suffered most serious injuries. As to the law, if I thought this case had been the same as Bridge v. The North London, I should have reserved leave to the defendants to move, but I consider this quite a different case. At present from what I know of that case, I am rather inclined to agree with the Lord Chief Justice, who, it appears, expressed doubt whether it would not have been better to take the opinion of the jury instead of nonsuiting. I frankly own I cannot see how the court can take it upon them, where there is negligence on the defendants' part, to say without reference to a jury that there was contributory negligence in the plaintiff. That case, however, in my opinion, is not in point, and, without reference to it, this rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, April 29.

PAICE v. WALKER AND OTHERS.

Principal and agents — Foreign principal — Contract signed by agent in his own name — Words "as agent for A. B." in body of contract — Effect of — Personal liability of agent.

The defendants W. and S., corn merchants of London, contracted with P., the plaintiff, a corn factor of the same place, to sell and deliver to him a quantity of wheat, the contract, which was signed by the defendants in their own names, being in the following terms: "Sold to A. J. P., Esq., of London, about 200 quarters of wheat (as agents for John Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic), similar to sample at time of shipment, at 50s. per 486lb., free on board at Dantzic, including freight and insurance to London. . . . Payment by buyer's acceptance of seller's draft for invoice amount at two months . . . (Signed) W. and S." The plaintiff duly accepted and paid at maturity the defendant's draft for the amount accordingly. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for breach of contract in delivering wheat inferior to sample, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), adopting the rule stated in 2 Sm. L. C., 6th edit., p. 344, and following the case of Tanner v. Christian, in the Q. B. 4 E. & B. 591; 24 L. J. 91, Q. B., that as the defendants had signed the contract in their own names, without qualifying their signature by the addition of words indicative of their having signed it as agents merely, and, as there was nothing on the face of the contract itself, either expressly or impliedly, showing a contrary intention, the defendants must be held to be contracting parties, and as such liable as principals in the present action.

Semble, that the words, "as agents for J. S. and Co., of D.," in the body of the contract, were not per se sufficient evidence of such "contrary intention."

This was an action by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants by reason of the latter's breach of contract in having failed to ship and deliver to the plaintiff a certain quantity of wheat equal to sample; and by his declaration the plaintiff charged that, by an agreement between him and the defendants, it was amongst other things agreed, that the defendants should sell and deliver to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff should buy and accept from the defendants, about 200 quarters of wheat, similar to a certain sample at the time of shipment, due allowance being made for size, handling, and time out of bulk, at the price of 50s. per 486lb., free on board at Dantzic, and including freight and insurance (exclusive of war risk) to London, and that the said wheat should be shipped by the defendants per steamer as soon as suitable room could be obtained, and that the defendants should guarantee full out-turn (sea accidents excepted, in which case of sea accidents the defendants' invoice should be final) excess or deficiency to be paid for reciprocally, and that payment should be made for the said wheat by the plaintiff accepting the defendants' drafts for invoice account at two months from the date of and against the bill of lading (less interest of one month), or by cash less the interest for the unexpired term of three months, which interest should in both cases be at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Averment that all conditions were fulfilled, &c., and the defendants did ship and deliver certain wheat as and for the aforesaid wheat, and the plaintiff paid for the same by accepting such bill as aforesaid, yet the defendants did not ship or deliver to the plaintiff such wheat as they agreed to do as aforesaid, and the wheat which they shipped and delivered as aforesaid was not at the time of the shipment thereof, similar to the sample aforesaid, but of an inferior quality, whereby, &c. (allegation of damage to the plaintiff), and claim of 500*l.*

The defendants by their first plea denied the agreement as alleged, and by their second plea stated that they shipped and delivered to the plaintiff such wheat as they agreed to do, and the wheat which they shipped and delivered was, at the time of the shipment thereof, similar to the sample at time of shipment, due allowance being made for size, handling, and time out of bulk, and on those pleas issue was joined.

At the trial at Guildhall, in December last, before the Lord Chief Baron and a common jury, the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—

The plaintiff was a corn factor, carrying on business at the corn market, Mark-lane, in the city, and the defendants were corn merchants, also carrying on business at the same place. On the 18th June 1869, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants to purchase 200 quarters of wheat, the contract being contained in the following document, which was unstamped:—

1, Muscovy-court, Trinity-square, London, E. C., June 18, 1869.

Sold to A. J. Paice, Esq., London, about 200 quarters of wheat (as agents for John Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic), similar to sample 94 at time of shipping, due allowance being made for size, handling, and time out of bulk, at the price of 50s. per 496lb., free on board at Dantzic, and including freight and insurance (exclusive of war risk), to London. Shipment per steamer as soon as suitable room can be obtained. Sellers not to be responsible for the solvency of the underwriters. Full out turn guaranteed (sea accidents excepted, in which case seller's invoice is final), excess or deficiency to be paid for reciprocally. Payment by buyer's acceptance of sellers' drafts for invoice amount at two months from date of and against bill of lading, less interest of one month, or cash less interest for the unexpired term of three months, at five per cent. per annum.

(Signed)

WALKERS AND STRANGE.

There was a bought note in precisely similar terms (mutatis mutandis), which was signed by the plaintiff.

A sample was delivered to the plaintiff at the time of signing the contract. The plaintiff duly accepted the defendant's draft or bill for the invoice price of the 200 quarters of wheat, and paid the same when due. On delivery, the wheat, as alleged by the plaintiff, proved to be inferior to the sample, and thereupon the defendants, having declined to make to the plaintiff the compensation required by him in that behalf, the plaintiff brought the present action, in which a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 46s. 15s., and leave was reserved by the learned Lord Chief Baron to the defendants to move to enter a non-suit, on the ground that the defendants contracted as agents only, and not as principals, and so were not liable. A rule having accordingly been obtained to that effect by Dowdeswell, Q. C., for the defendants,

Murphy (with him was Pollock, Q. C.) now showed cause against it on the part of the plaintiff. The verdict was quite right, and the defendants are liable as principals on this contract for the breach of it. It is manifest, on the face of the document itself, that the defendants intended to be themselves personally liable, although they had principals residing abroad. In a recent case in this court (Fairlie v. Fenton and others, ante, p. 373), where the plaintiff, a cotton broker, contracted on behalf of his principal for the sale of goods to the defendant in the following words:—"I have this day sold you (the defendant), on account of T., 100 bales of cotton, &c. (Signed) E. T., broker," it was held he could not maintain an action for a breach of contract as he had acted as a broker merely, and was not a party to the contract. The case, however, of a broker differs essentially from that of an agent or factor; and in the present case there is nothing to exclude the liability of the defendants except the words introduced in the body of the contract, "as agents for Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic." [MARTIN, B. refers to Lennard v. Robinson and another, 5 E. & B. 125; 24 L. J. 275, Q. B., and PIGOTT, B. refers to Tanner v. Christian, 4 E. & B. 591; 24 L. J. 91, Q. B.] It is a material circumstance to be considered in the present case, as was pointed out, and some stress laid upon the fact, by Coleridge, J., in his judgment in Lennard v. Robinson (ubi sup.), that the principals here are foreigners resident abroad. "It seems to me," said Coleridge, J. in that case, "reasonable that a contracting party should require to have a party to whom he may look, and upon whom he may call for performance." Primâ facie, a person making a contract without any words limiting his liability, must be taken to be the principal. There are no such words here. The words, "as agents, &c.," in the early part of this contract, are descriptive merely, and the simple fact of the defendants being agents for another is not of itself sufficient to free them from liability as principals. Again, by the terms of the contract, payment was to be made by the buyer's acceptance of the seller's drafts, and the plaintiff did accept the defendants' bill for the amount, and paid it when due, showing that both parties considered the defendants as principals. In Tanner v. Christian

(ubi sup.), the words in the body of the contract, following the defendant's name were, "for and on the part of," the named principal, and they are equivalent to the words, "as agent for" in the present case, and yet it was there held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the defendant was a principal, and liable on the contract, he having signed it in his own name without any qualification. Now, in the present case, the defendants sign in their own name with no words of qualification or agency appended or prefixed to their signature, and as was pointed out by Lord Campbell, C. J., in Tanner v. Christian, it was easy enough for the defendants, by the use of the words "perprocuration for Schmidt and Co.," when signing the document, to have excluded their personal liability. But they have not done so. The case of Lennard v. Robinson and another, is an a fortiori case in favour of the plaintiff here, for there the charter party was signed by the defendants, "by authority of and as agents of Mr. M. S., of Memel," a qualification of their signature, which is wanting here, and yet they were held liable as having personally contracted. [PIGOTT, B., refers to Cooke v. Wilson and another, 1 C. B., N. S., 153; 26 L. J. 15, C. P.] In Mr. Smith's notes to Thompson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 78; 1 M. & R. 110; 2 Sm. L. C. p. 344, 6th edit., that learned writer says, "In all these cases the question whether the person actually signing the contract is to be deemed to be contracting personally, or as agent only, depends upon the intention of the parties as discoverable from the contract itself, and it may be laid down as a general rule that, where a person signs a contract in his own name, without qualification, he is primâ facie to be deemed to be a person contracting personally; and in order to prevent this liability from attaching it must be apparent from the other portions of the document, that he did not intend to bind himself as principal," and Cooke v. Wilson (ubi sup.); Green v. Kopké, 18 C. B. 549; 25 L. J. 227, C. P., and other cases are there cited. That passage applies here. He cited also

Parker v. Winlow, 7 E. & B. 942; 27 L. J. 49, Q. B.

Dowdeswell, Q. C., with Day, for the defendants, supported their rule.—In the operative part of the contract here the defendants expressly say, "We enter into this contract not as principals, but as agents," and it would be rendering entirely nugatory that part of the contract if the view and construction contended for by the plaintiff should be upheld. The drawing of the bill must be put out of consideration. The correspondence that passed between the plaintiff and the defendants, subsequently to the signing of the contract, clearly shows the agency of the defendants, and refers to their principals. Why, if they were not intended to be made responsible, were the principals mentioned at all? The principle of the law is respondeat superior. It is laid down in Sm. Merc. Law, 163, 7th edit., that "an agent contracting as such for a known principal, incurs no personal liability to third parties. If the individual with whom he contracted knew him to be an agent, knew his principal, and knew that he intended to bind that principal, he will be taken to have trusted to the credit of the principal, and the agent will not be bound." As was said by Littledale, J., in Thomson v. Davenport (see notes, 2 Sm. L. Cas. ubi sup.), it is more advantageous for the party generally to enforce the contract against the responsible principal than against the temporary agent. The cases cited on the other side are distinguishable. In Tanner v. Christian the defendant was throughout (as Lord Campbell pointed out), the acting party, having to perform the acts constituting the consideration. So also in Lennard v. Robinson, and Parker v. Winlow (both of which, by the by, were cases of charter-parties), the defendants were to do the acts, and it was on those special circumstances that the court founded their judgments in each of those cases. But here the defendants are to do nothing; the corn is to be shipped at Dantzic direct to the plaintiff. The defendants are merely the hand by which payment is to be made to the sellers, and they have not even an insurable interest in the goods. The case of Downman v. Williams, in error, 7 Q. B. 103; s. c. nom. Downman v. Jones, 14 L. J., N.S., 227, Q. B., is decisive of the present case. [MARTIN, B.—In Mr. Smith's book that case is cited, and treated as an authority for a very different principle from that for which you are citing it. [The learned Baron here reads the note on that case, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 345, 6th edit., and refers to Jenkins v. Hutchinson, 13 Q. B. 744, also there commented on by Mr. Smith.] There are many cases in which words of much weaker import have been held sufficient to discharge the party, and the principal has been held liable:

Ex.]

PRICE v. WALKER AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

Lewis v. Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 503; 21 L. J. 311, Q. B.;

Green v. Kopke, 18 C. B. 549; 25 L. J. 297, C. P.;

Spittel v. Lavender, 2 Brod. & Bing. 452.

[PER CURIAM.—The case of Spittel v. Lavender is as different from the present case as possible. The defendant there, an auctioneer, entered into the contract "as agent for and on the part of B.," and B., shortly afterwards, signed a note at its foot. "I sanction this agreement, and approve of the defendants having made it on my behalf," and all the four judges there put their decision upon that, and said that the principal's signature and sanction of the agent's act was conclusive to show that the personal liability of the agent was expressly excluded.]

Green v. Kopke, is a strong authority in the defendant's favour. Jervis, C. J., in his judgment there says, "It is ridiculous to suppose that an agent for a mere commission of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. would guarantee the performance of a contract for the sale of 1000 barrels of tar," or, as may be said in the present case, of 200 quarters of wheat. And it is clearly shown, by the judgments of all the judges in that case, that in the case of an agent in this country, acting for a foreign principal, it is not a rule of law that the agent is to be treated as the principal, but that, though there may be a presumption to that effect it is, nevertheless, a question of fact, and not of law, whether the defendant contracted as agent or not. In the present case it is submitted that it is clear that the defendants contracted as agents only, and had no intention, and were not understood by the plaintiff at the time, to render themselves personally responsible. This case is governed by the principle on which Fairlie v. Fenton, ante, p. 373, was decided.

KELLY, C.B.—This was a contract for the sale of a quantity of wheat by sample, and the question at issue in the present action between these parties is whether or not the defendants are personally liable to the plaintiffs upon that contract for a breach of it. I am of opinion that they are. There may be a difficulty in reconciling the various authorities, but the principle which governs such cases as the present is well established, and is very clearly laid down by Mr. Smith, in his notes to the case of Thomson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 90, in 2 Sm. Lead. Cas., 6th edit., p. 344, where it is said that the question in these cases, whether the party signing the contract is to be taken as a principal, or as having acted as an agent only, is one of intention, to be discovered from the document itself; but that, as a general rule, where he signs his own name without words of qualification, prima facie he is to be looked upon as a principal and personally responsible—a conclusion which may be rebutted by a reference to other portions of the contract. Now, to apply that principle to the present case, we find that the contract in question here is in two parts—one part being signed by the plaintiff, and the other by the defendants, "Walkers and Strange," in their own names, without anything more, no words of qualification or limitation of any sort or kind being affixed or added to their signatures. That at once distinguishes this case from many cases, several of which have been cited at the bar, in which the party sought to be charged as a principal had signed the contract "per procuration" or "as agent" of or for a named principal. As is said by Mr. Smith in his notes to Thomson v. Davenport (p. 344, 6th edit.), in commenting on Tanner v. Christian and Lennard v. Robinson, "The fact, however, that the signature is expressed to be made 'as agent' is strong to show that the person signing does not mean to bind himself personally, if the terms of the contract itself do not show a contrary intention." Here then the defendants did not sign "as agents," and the question is, is there anything in the contract between the parties which, on the face of it, shows that they did not intend to make themselves personally responsible? We find in the contract these words:—"Sold to A. J. Paice, Esq." (the plaintiff) "200 quarters of wheat," and then between brackets in a parenthesis there come these words ("as agents for John Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic") which are relied on by the defendants as a proof that they did not contract as principals, and then they sign the document in their own names simply "Walkers and Strange," and nothing more. Now there are cases without number in which these words, "as agents for," &c., have been introduced in the body of the contract, and yet the parties who have signed the contract in their own names simply and unqualifiedly have been held to be principals. I will only refer to one case of the many that have been cited, and that are to be found in the books—I mean the case of Tanner v. Christian, in the Queen's Bench (ubi sup.) decided by Lord Campbell and the other learned judges of that court. There the defendant contracted in the body of the contract "for and on the part of" another person expressly named; he but signed the contract in his own name without the addition of any words of qualification or limitation, and it was held that, having signed the contract, the defendant was a principal and liable as such thereunder. Upon this authority we may take it that where a contract is signed by a person in his own name, as in the present case, without any words of qualification or limitation attached to such signature, such person is liable as a principal, unless there is something on the face of the contract itself to show, either expressly or by necessary implication, a contrary intention. In the present case there is nothing of that sort, and I think that this contract, for the breach of which the plaintiff sues, binds the defendants as principals. I do not attach much or any importance to the fact of the defendants being agents for a foreign firm, nor to the conduct and correspondence which took place subsequently to the contract to which Mr. Dowdeswell has referred. Without attempting to reconcile all the conflicting decisions upon the subject, I am clearly of opinion, looking at the signature and the body of this contract, that the defendants are liable. The rule, therefore, will be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion entirely. I adopt as a rule the principle laid down by Mr. Smith in his notes to the case of Thomson v. Davenport, where he says "It may be laid down as a general rule that where a person signs a contract in his own name, without qualification, he is prima facie to be deemed to be a person contracting personally, and, in order to prevent this liability from attaching, it must be apparent from the other portions of the document that he did not intend to bind himself as principal:” (2 Sm. L. C. 6th edit. p. 344.) The document in the present case is signed by “Walkers and Strange” in their own names “without qualification,” and according to the above rule they are prima facie, liable upon it as principals. The present documents are not in reality “bought and sold notes” at all. Bought and sold notes, properly speaking, are instruments signed by brokers, who are a kind of middlemen between the contracting parties; but this is not the case of a document signed by a broker. That, therefore, distinguishes the case from Fairlie v. Fenton. The question here is whether, in the body of this contract, the defendants Walkers and Strange are or not intended to be principals. I think they were. The words “as agents for Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic,” are, in my opinion, merely a sort of ear mark of the contract, intimating to the plaintiff, the purchaser, that the owners of the corn were Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic, to show, in fact, what wheat was referred to. The defendants’ rule should, I think, be discharged.

PIGOTT, B.—I concur with my Lord and my brother Martin in all that they have said, and in thinking with them that this rule must be discharged. I adopt the principles of construction which they have propounded and acted on. The case is distinguishable from Fairlie v. Fenton. The principle will be found well laid down in the case of Tanner v. Christian (ubi sup.), where it is shown, first, that the intention of the parties must be ascertained, and the document construed in accordance therewith; and, secondly, that when a man signs a document in his own name, he is prima facie, and in the absence of anything showing a contrary intention, to be taken as the party responsible and liable thereon as principal. Here the defendants sign their own names to this contract, not qualifying their signature by adding the words “as agents,” or “per procuration,” or anything of that sort. It is true that in the body of the contract they describe themselves “as agents for Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic;” and, referring to the case of Lennard v. Robinson (ubi sup.), it has been said, and said truly, I think, by Mr. Murphy, that the fact of the real owners or sellers, on whose behalf the contract was made, being foreigners, is a material circumstance to be taken into consideration. I think it is so, and that in the present case it makes against the defendants, who are Englishmen resident in this country, whilst Schmidt and Co., their principals, are foreigners, living at Dantzic; and, naturally and reasonably enough, therefore, the plaintiff would prefer to look to parties living in London, and probably personally known to him, than to strangers living so far away as at Dantzic. This is not like the case of a document signed by a broker, as it was in Fairlie v. Fenton, in which there is a well recognised principle of law and practice, nor are these documents bought and sold notes. Mr. Dowdeswell referred to an “I O U,” to illustrate or enforce his argument, but not, I think, very accurately, for an “I O U” is not exactly, what he called it, a “mercantile document.” The defendants might easily have guarded themselves from personal responsibility by signing the document, with the addition of the words “by procuration,” or “as agents,” &c., as pointed out by Cresswell, J., in Cooke v. Wilson (ubi sup.)

CLERKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. I do not dissent at all from the judgments which have just been pronounced by my Lord and my brothers Martin and Pigott, BB., though I form my opinion on not exactly the same grounds. This is a case of a contract for the sale of goods evidently on the face of it made by the defendants as agents for a principal living beyond the sea, and that, I think, is a matter of some importance. Now I find it thus laid down in Buller’s Law of Nisi Prius (at p. 130, 2nd edit.), “Where a factor to one beyond sea buys or sells goods for the person to whom he is factor, an action will lie against or for him in his own name; for the credit will be presumed to be given to him in the first case, and in the last the promise will be presumed to be made to him, and the rather so, as it is so made for the benefit of trade.” And Buller, J. then goes on to say by way of qualification, “However, a factor’s sale does, by the general rule of law, create a contract between the owner and buyer, and therefore if a factor sell for payment at a future day, if the owner give notice to the buyer to pay him and not the factor, the buyer could not be justified in afterwards paying the factor; yet, perhaps, under some particular circumstances this rule may not take place.” And in an old case, of De Gaillon v. L’Aigle, 1 Bos. & Pul. 369, Eyre, C.J. says, “I am not aware that I have ever concurred in any decision in which it has been held that if a person, describing himself as agent for another residing abroad, enters into a contract here, he is not personally liable on the contract.” The principle, I think, will be found in all the books treating of the law of principal and agent, that, as a general rule, persons acting for merchants in a foreign country are personally liable on contracts made by them for their employers, unless they expressly exclude such liability on the face of the contract itself, on the presumption that the credit is rather given to the agent or factor at home than to the principal resident abroad: (See Story on Agency, sects. 268, 269, 400, 401; Paley’s Principal and Agent, 3rd edit., by Lloyd, pp. 248, 285, 334, 373, 382; and Smith’s Mercantile Law, 7th edit., p. 164.) Now let us apply the principle to the present case. Here we have a contract in these words: “Sold to A. J. Paico,” the plaintiff, “200 quarters of wheat, as agent for Schmidt and Co., of Dantzic,” and it is signed by the defendants in their own names. We have it then on the face of the document itself, that the defendants are acting, as between themselves and the plaintiff, as agents for merchants living at Dantzic, a fact which is mentioned probably in case it should happen to be necessary to have to refer to those persons. No doubt the foreign principals are named in the contract, but still the fact remains that the contract is made by the defendants, and is signed by them in their own names, without any qualifying words attached to their signatures, and they are bound by it. Had they by a contract in like form agreed to buy could it be said they would not be entitled to sue the seller in their own names for non-delivery? The fact of other persons being named in the contract has, in my judgment, little or no effect upon the present question, because they are persons residing beyond sea.

Rule discharged.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before HANNEN, J. and a Common Jury.)

Friday, June 3.

POLLARD v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers' liability—Carman's authority to substitute one place of delivery for another—Fresh contract of carriage.

Plaintiff directed the defendants to deliver goods at his house. When the defendants' carman came to the house with the goods in a waggon, plaintiff wrote him an acknowledgment of the safe receipt of the goods, and a request to deliver at a stable occupied by him about 1000 yards off; the goods were not unloaded at the plaintiff's house, but through the carman's negligence at the stable they were destroyed:

Held, that the defendants could be liable for the value of the goods only if this substitution of one place of delivery for another was within the scope of the carman's duty, or if the carman had authority to enter into a fresh contract of carriage on behalf of his employers; and these were questions for a jury.

The declaration stated the defendants were carriers of goods for hire from Southampton to London, and the plaintiff delivered to the defendants, and the defendants received as such carriers, certain goods, viz., a cask of wine of the plaintiff to be by the defendants safely carried from Southampton to London aforesaid, and there delivered for the plaintiff for reward to the defendants; and all conditions were performed, &c., necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said goods safely carried and delivered as aforesaid, yet the defendants did not safely carry and deliver the said goods as aforesaid, but so negligently carried and delivered the same that they were broken, damaged, and spoiled.

There were also money counts for the amount paid by the plaintiff for the duty and carriage of the cask of wine.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, denial of the receipt and delivery of the goods; thirdly, that after the said goods were delivered to and received by the defendants, and before any breach of duty by the defendants, the plaintiff exonerated and discharged the defendants from all obligation to deliver the goods and from delivering the same, and the defendants then did what is complained of by the plaintiff's leave; and fourthly, to the money counts, never indebted.

In answer to a letter from the defendants, asking for instructions as to forwarding his cask of wine, which had arrived at Southampton, the plaintiff wrote:

1, Brompton-square, Nov. 27, 1869.

Messrs. Cooke and Lee.

Gentlemen,—Be pleased to forward the cask of wine, E. G. 1421, from Havre, to the above address, at your earliest opportunity.—I remain, Gentlemen, yours most obediently,

E. W. POLLARD.

On the 30th Nov., about noon, a carman of the defendants brought the cask in one of the defendants' waggons to the garden-gate of the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff's wife, the plaintiff not being at home, requested the carman to deliver the wine at a stable occupied by the plaintiff, which was situated about a thousand yards from the house. The cask was not then taken out of the waggon, but whilst the waggon with the cask in it was standing at the plaintiff's gate, the plaintiff's wife wrote and gave to the carman, at his request, a receipt, of which the following is a copy:

1, Brompton-square, Nov. 30.

Mr. Pollard has received the wine safely, and requests it may be delivered at the Mews, Turkish Baths, Alfred-place.

At the same time the plaintiff's wife paid to the carman 3*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, the amount then demanded by him for carriage and duty, and he signed and gave to the plaintiff's wife a receipt for this sum upon one of the printed forms generally used by the defendants. The following sentences, amongst others, were printed on the face and back of it:

Any servant of the company taking more than is stated on this ticket, will be dismissed.

It is requested that the amount demanded on this ticket be paid, as the carman has strict orders not to leave the goods without payment.

All goods will be considered as delivered (if not carted out by the company) on notice of arrival to the consignee, and if carted out by the company, when unloaded at the door of the consignee's abode or place of business as the case may be.

After these two documents were exchanged between the plaintiff's wife and the carman, and before the latter and the waggon left the plaintiff's gate, the plaintiff's wife gave to the carman 4*d.* as a gratuity. It was the usual custom of the plaintiff to give beer or money for beer to persons delivering parcels at his house.

The cask of wine was not unloaded from the defendant's waggon at the plaintiff's gate, but the carman, according to the request of the plaintiff's wife, went with the waggon and cask to the plaintiff's stables. There was with the waggon no ladder for unloading heavy goods, and the carman attached a rope to the cask and fastened it to the wheel. The rope got fast, and the carman, being in a rage, as a witness said, in consequence of the smallness of the gratuity he had received, gave the cask a kick, the rope gave way, and the cask fell on the ground and burst.

Denman, Q. C. and Mangles, for the defendants' cited Shepherd v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 189; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 528, and contended that the liability of the company terminated on the delivery of the receipt by the plaintiff's wife to the carman. Afterwards the carman was the plaintiff's agent at least as much as he was the defendants'.

H. James, Q. C. and McKellar, for the plaintiff, submitted that this substitution of one place of delivery for another was within the scope of the carman's authority from the defendants, and therefore the defendants were liable for the value, carriage, and duty of the cask. The scope of authority was left to be decided by a jury in the case of Scothorn v. The South Staffordshire Railway Company, 8 Ex. 341.

HANNEN, J., in summing up, desired the jury to treat the case as they would if they had to consider the liability of any common carrier, and not to make the defendants exceptionally responsible because they were a railway company. The contract between the parties was admitted to be an undertaking on the defendants' part to carry to and deliver at No. 1, Brompton-square; if, as it had been alleged, the cask of wine could not have been taken into the house, two courses were open to the carman; he might either have deposited it there at the gate, or he might have taken it back to the company's station and have asked for further instructions from some responsible officer. The carman adopted neither of these courses; Mrs. Pollard, who was acting on her husband's behalf, gave a receipt for the goods as if they had been delivered; she in fact waived delivery at the place to which the plaintiff had ordered the consignment, and she added a written request that the cask should be carried to another destination.

NEWMAN v. NEWMAN. STERBINI v. STERBINI.

[Div.]

It was to be taken elsewhere for Mrs. Pollard's convenience, and in no way had it been suggested that the company was to have been benefited by the alteration in the place of delivery. Now, for the accident which afterwards occurred the company could only be made liable in one of two ways; either it must have been within the scope of a carman's duty to substitute another place of delivery for that agreed upon by his employers, or it must have been within the scope of his authority to enter into a fresh contract of carriage on behalf of his employers. It was for the jury to judge as to the terms upon which a carman was usually employed, and the extent of the powers intrusted to him. It had been suggested that the absence of appliances would have been the cause of a similar mishap if the unloading had taken place at Brompton-square, but the carman's ill-temper, to which a witness alluded, was supposed to have arisen only after leaving the plaintiff's house, and unless what the carman undertook to do was within the scope of the authority given him by the company, it may be inferred that there would have been no accident for which the defendants could be liable. The distance of the altered destination from the plaintiff's house was about a thousand yards; if this substitution of a place of delivery were within the scope of a carman's authority, it would be difficult to say to what distance he should be limited. Although he left the matter to the jury, his Lordship said he could see no evidence of any authority to the carman either to substitute a place of delivery, or to enter into a fresh contract of carriage.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 17 and 22.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J.O.)

NEWMAN v. NEWMAN.

Dissolution suit—Incestuous adultery—Unreasonable delay.

A wife petitioned for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery with her own sister. The adultery took place twenty years before the petition was presented, and the wife alleged as the reason for the delay that she had yielded to her mother's entreaties not to make public a family scandal. The mother died in 1869, and the parties had not lived together since 1850.

The court held that this was "unreasonable delay," but under the circumstances thought it a fit case for the exercise of the discretion vested in it, and granted a decree.

This was a wife's petition for dissolution on the ground of incestuous adultery. The husband did not enter an appearance. The marriage was in 1844, and the adultery complained of (with the wife's sister) occurred in 1848 and 1849. The husband deserted his wife in 1860. The case was heard before the Judge Ordinary on March 17, and the adultery was fully proved. The petitioner was examined as to the cause of the delay in presenting the petition. She stated that her reason was that her mother was reluctant to expose the scandal, and that on her mother's entreaties she had refrained from presenting her petition until after her mother's death in 1868.

Kemp and Keeble for the petitioner.

The court held the adultery proved, but took time to consider whether there had been unreasonable delay in presenting the petition.

Mar. 22.—Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—In this case the petitioner proved, to the satisfaction of the court, that many years ago her husband was guilty of incestuous adultery with her sister. That was followed by a separation between the husband and the wife. The wife no longer lived with him, and, according to the statement of the wife, the intimacy between him and his sister-in-law was continued afterwards, and they appeared to have lived together. But a long time has elapsed. The events to which she speaks occurred near twenty years ago, and she admitted fairly at the time of the hearing that the reason why she had not applied to this court before was that her mother was very averse to having the matter disclosed, and that she had yielded to her mother's wishes. At the time of the hearing I expressed an opinion that it was "unreasonable delay," because it amounted to this, that a party having a good cause did not come into court on account of the pain which the disclosure would cause to the feelings of the family. I adhere to the opinion that that is "unreasonable delay." But the Act does not say that in all cases where there is unreasonable delay the decree shall be refused. Although there may have been unreasonable delay, still the court may grant a decree. Therefore, the question really is, whether, assuming unreasonable delay, the court, under all the circumstances of the case, ought to withhold a decree? There was, no doubt, before the passing of the Divorce Act, a class of cases which did invite criticism in respect of unreasonable delay, cases where the husband's honour had been wounded, and he had put up with his own disgrace. In such cases the House of Lords acted on the principle "Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt." That is a class of cases to which no doubt the discretionary bar would not apply; but, looking at all the circumstances of this case, I don't think it right to withhold the decree, and I shall therefore make the decree nisi with costs.

Attorney for petitioner, E. Moss.

STERBINI v. STERBINI.

Dissolution suit—Agreement to stay proceedings enforced.

A wife agreed to withdraw her petition for a dissolution of her marriage on condition that her only child who was abroad, and who was represented to be seriously ill, was brought back to England and given into her care. The husband carried out his portion of the agreement, but the wife refused to stay proceedings on the ground that the representations as to the illness of her child had been exaggerated, and that she had made the agreement without legal assistance.

The court held that as neither fraud nor duress had been used to procure the agreement it was to be enforced, and dismissed the petition.

This was a suit promoted by the wife for a dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery, coupled with cruelty. The parties were married Aug. 15, 1855, and lived together until March 1869, and there was issue one son aged eight years at the time of separation. The case now came before the court on a motion of the respondent to dismiss the petition on the ground that the petitioner had agreed not to proceed further with her suit on condition that her son was brought back to England and delivered into her custody. Lengthy affidavits were filed on both sides, and from them it appeared that after the institution of the suit, the respondent, who was an agent for the purchase of foreign grain, went abroad, taking his son with him. The affidavit of Nathaniel Victor Rix, a mutual friend of the parties, by whom the arrangement was effected, stated that on Nov. 23, 1869 he received a message from the petitioner, desiring him to call upon her, and on seeing her she informed him that she had received news that her son was dangerously ill, and at the point of death. This information was contained in a letter from the respondent to the petitioner's sister, and it was to the effect that the illness of the child was a serious one, but that the doctor had refused to pronounce any definite opinion as to the result. The petitioner's mother was present at the interview with Mr. Rix, and she expressed her great dislike to the proceedings in the Divorce Court, and her strong desire that they should be discontinued. After some further conversation the petitioner said: "I will give you my word of honour the suit shall be withdrawn." Mr. Rix then communicated by telegraph with the respondent, and on Nov. 26, 1869 the petitioner signed and delivered to Mr. Rix the following paper:

9, Stock Orchard Villas, 21st Nov. 1869.

Mr. Arthur Marius Sterbini.

Sir,—For the sake of my dear child, and upon the understanding that you bring him to England as soon as his health permits, and that I be at liberty to live apart from yourself, and to reside in this country, your absence notwithstanding, I hereby undertake to withdraw from the suit commenced against you for divorce, and also that I will not institute any other proceedings in the Divorce Court in respect of your misconduct charged in my petition or otherwise prior to this date, or take any steps to deprive you of the legal custody of our child; but I reserve to myself, without prejudice from this undertaking, full power to continue my suit on all points next Hilary Term, or such after time as I may think fit, should you not fulfil the aforesaid condition binding on you by this undertaking.

Witness, SARAH ANN COX. (Signed) EMMA STERBINI.

On the 24th Dec. 1869 the respondent arrived in England with his son, whom he delivered next day to the petitioner's sister. He has ever since remained under the petitioner's care, but the suit was not withdrawn, but stood in the list of causes for hearing this term. In her affidavit the petitioner stated that on hearing of the illness of her child she was in great distress of mind, and hardly knew what she was doing; that she believed her child was dying; and that she should never see him again; that she had no advice from any professional person; and that she signed the paper contrary to her inclination, and solely because she believed that her child was dying. She also alleged that from inquiries made subsequently from her son she had reason to believe that the account of his illness given by the respondent was greatly exaggerated, and that he had represented the child to be in that dangerous state solely for the purpose of imposing on her, and obtaining this undertaking from her.

Searle, on behalf of the respondent, moved to dismiss the petition, and cited

Inderwick, for the petitioner, opposed.—The bargain was a one-sided one, and obtained from the petitioner by a gross exaggeration, and by the fear that unless she withdrew from the suit she would never see her child again. In Rowley v. Rowley, and Hooper v. Hooper, the wife was advised by her attorney and counsel, but the petitioner here was totally unassisted by legal advice, and was not in a position to make a fair bargain.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—The agreement is one which has been made without fraud, and without duress;

but it must be for one or other of these causes that the court would invalidate an agreement of this kind. There was no fraud in the matter, because what is suggested about the illness of the child not being genuine is not proved. The husband says the child is ill, he does not say it is dying—it may be serious or it may not be—and there is no proof that what he says is not word for word true. No deception at all seems to have been practised. As to duress, after reading the affidavit of Mr. Rix, I cannot see anything like duress in the matter, and I do not think the wife's account makes it out at all. Mr. Rix is, comparatively speaking, a disinterested person, and the court is more inclined to rely on what he says, than on what Mrs. Sterbini says. It seems to me that there was no duress, on the contrary, she voluntarily offered to drop the proceedings. The reason why the agreement was put into writing was, that Mr. Rix was not satisfied with a mere verbal promise. He told Mrs. Sterbini that the child was out of danger, before she signed the agreement, and it is idle to say that she was forced into signing the agreement. Then it is said that the bargain is one-sided, and that Mrs. Sterbini had no legal advice in making it. I do not think the court can go into that. Mrs. Sterbini contracted to surrender this litigation, on the promise that her child was brought back. That has been done. The child has been handed over to her, and it is conceded by her husband that it shall remain with her. I shall dismiss the petition, and shall make an order that the child remain in the wife's custody until further order.

Administration—Grant de bonis non.

A grant de bonis non was applied for by the representatives of the next of kin of a deceased testator, who was also entitled to three-fourths of the estate. Two legatees originally entitled in distribution were still living, but they were abroad and difficult to be found. Under the circumstances the court dispensed with the usual rule requiring the persons entitled in distribution to be cited, and granted administration to the representative of the next of kin on security being given for the remaining fourth of the estate.

William Hicks died 8th Feb. 1854, having duly executed on 12th Feb. 1842, a will, by which he devised all his estate and effects to Robert Hicks, his brother, and Mary Ann Ewen, his sister, and appointed them his executor and executrix. Mary Ann Ewen died in the testator's lifetime, leaving two daughters, Frances and Catherine. Robert Hicks thus became entitled to three-fourths of the estate: one-half as legatee and a quarter as next of kin; and on 12th May 1854, he took out probate and died intestate 7th Jan. 1869. His son, R. A. Hicks, took out letters of administration to his estate in Dec. 1869.

A further sum having become distributable on account of the estate of William Hicks, Robert A. Hicks applied for a grant de bonis non. It was objected in the registry that Catherine and Frances, daughters of Mrs. Ewen, being parties originally entitled in distribution had a claim to representation prior to that of the administrator of the next of kin. Catherine Ewen had married a

Mr. Hill, and was now supposed to be living apart from him in Uruguay, and the other daughter, Frances, had married a Mr. Morris in Cleveland, Ohio, U.S., and was now supposed to be dead. Under these circumstances,

C. A. Middleton moved that a grant de bonis non of the estate of Wm. Hicks, be made to R. A. Hicks, and submitted that under the special circumstances the court might dispense with the ordinary rule giving priority to the persons entitled in distribution, and make the grant without citing the parties having the priority. He cited

Savage v. Blyth, 2 Hagg. Ecc. App. 150.

LORD PENZANCE.—I think the grant ought to go as prayed. Where the court is bound by the statute I believe the law is correctly stated in Williams on Executors, that the court requires that the party having the prior right to administration should be cited. But as the learned writer observes, in cases where the court has discretion and where the party entitled to priority is not cited by statute, but by the practice of the court, the court has sometimes dispensed with the necessity of that citation. In applying that principle to this case, there is to be considered that the person in whose favour the grant is asked represents three-quarters of the estate—one half as legatee, the other quarter as next of kin. There is also the obvious convenience of giving the grant de bonis non to the administrator of the next of kin, and the fact that those entitled in distribution are difficult to be found, and are perhaps dead. Taking all these things into consideration, I think the court ought to make the grant as prayed, but security ought to be given for the remaining one-fourth.

REG. v. JESSE SMITH.

Feloniously receiving—Partners—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1.

A partner stole goods belonging to the firm, and rendered himself liable to be dealt with as a felon under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, and sold the same to the prisoner who knew of their having been stolen.

Held, that the prisoner could not be convicted on an indictment for feloniously receiving under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, but might have been convicted as an accessory after the fact under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 3, on an indictment properly framed.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Arthur R. Adams, Esq., sitting as Commissioner at the Spring Assizes, 1870, on the Midland Circuit.

Jesse Smith was indicted for receiving certain goods, the property of George Morton and another, knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, and was tried before me at the last assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire, at Leeds.

The facts of the case were as follows: George Morton was in partnership with one R. F. Martin, at Leeds, and carried on business in that town as ironmongers, under the firm of R. F. Martin and Co. The goods sold there were principally supplied by William Morton, of Birmingham, trading under the firm of Haines and Morton. In consequence of certain rumours as to the solvency of his firm, George Morton came to Leeds on the 18th Dec. 1869, and made arrangements with his partner, R. F. Martin, to secure the debt due to Haines and Morton, by giving a bill of sale of the goods then in the shop, and whilst this document was being prepared, George Morton left Leeds and went to Sheffield.

During his absence his partner R. F. Martin had interviews with the prisoner, and before the return of George Morton, shut (14th Dec.) up the shop, and in the evening of following day (15th Dec.), he hired drays, and in the presence of the prisoner conveyed the whole of the goods to the house of the prisoner, who apparently paid 100*l.* for them to R. F. Martin. The goods were proved to be worth considerably more than 300*l.*

From conversations with William Morton, the father of George Morton, it was evident that the prisoner was aware of the intended bill of sale, and that R. F. Martin was disposing of these goods in fraud of his partner, and to prevent the operation of the bill of sale.

It was objected on the part of the prisoner, that even if it were proved that R. F. Martin had committed an act of felony against his partner under the provisions of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, and that he had been guilty of larceny of the partnership goods, yet that the prisoner could not be indicted for receiving such goods, knowing them to be stolen, as that statute had not made such receiving a felony, and that under the provisions of the Larceny Consolidation Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91), only persons who received goods, the stealing of which amounted to a felony either at common law or under the provisions of that Act, could be indicted as receivers; and as the stealing by a partner was not a larceny at common law, nor under the provisions of the Consolidated Act, no receiver of such goods could be indicted for a felony.

As this was the first case that had occurred since the passing of the Act 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, and thinking it more prudent that a point of such importance should be decided by a court of appeal, I declined to stop the case.

The jury finally found the prisoner guilty of receiving the goods, knowing them to be stolen, and I released the prisoner on good bail to appear at the next Assizes if necessary.

I have now to request the opinion of the Justices of either Bench and the Barons of the Exchequer, whether this prisoner has been properly convicted.

ARTHUR R. ADAMS,

A Commissioner of Assize on the Midland Circuit.

Waddy for the prisoner.—It is submitted that this conviction cannot be sustained. The point arises on the construction of the statutes 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, and the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1. The former statute enacts that whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, &c., or other property, the stealing, taking, or embezzling whereof shall amount to a felony, either at common law or by virtue of that Act, knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, taken, or embezzled, shall be guilty of felony, and may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact, or for a substantive felony, and shall be liable, on conviction, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years, and not less than three, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years. The prisoner could not have been indicted under that statute per se for feloniously receiving, for the taking of the goods by Martin, the partner of Morton, was not a felony. But then came the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, which enacted that if any one, being a member of any co-partnership, or being one of two or more beneficial owners of any money goods, &c., or other property, shall steal or embezzle any such money, goods, &c., or other property, he shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted, and punished for the same as if such person had not been, or was not, a member of such co-partnership or one of such beneficial owners. In Reg. v. Talbot, LAW TIMES, vol. xlviii., p. 494, there is a dictum of Martin, B. reported, which bears upon this point. The prisoner was indicted for stealing a horse, which was alleged to belong to A. and B., and, according to the case for the prosecution, the prisoner was entrusted with the horse to take to P.'s, but instead of taking it to P.'s, he sold it, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. The prisoner's defence was that he was a partner with A. and B., in the ownership of the horse; and Martin, B. said: "If the prisoner's defence is true, he must be acquitted. The case does not come within the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116. That statute applies to the case of a large trading co-partnership or society, and not to the joint ownership of two or three persons of a particular chattel." The offence of feloniously receiving goods is not a common law offence, but a statutable one. [BYLES, J.—Is not a receiver an accessory after the fact at common law?] In the case now before the court, Martin, the principal, was not guilty of any offence at common law; his offence is created by the recent statute. The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, does not say that the fraudulent partner shall be guilty of felony, but that he shall be liable to be tried, convicted, and punished as if he had not been, or was not, a member of such co-partnership or one of such beneficial owners. The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, is not incorporated into the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

Hawkins, P. C. bk. 1, c. 7, ss. 6, 6.

Campbell Foster for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. The prisoner was an accessory after the fact to the stealing by Martin, and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 3, it is enacted that whosoever shall become an accessory after the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall, or shall not, be amenable to justice. In the present case the prisoner was indicted for the substantive felony of receiving. The object of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116 was to take away the immunity of partners from punishment for fraudulently disposing of partnership property previously existing. Now a partner may be dealt with in this respect as a stranger. Moreover, Martin, the principal, was a fraudulent bailee, within the meaning of sect. 3 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96 of his partner's share. Although the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116 created a new felony, still the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96 being in pari materia applies to it: Dwarris on Statutes, 634—5.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 4.—WILLES, J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—The prisoner was convicted for feloniously receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen contra formam statuti, &c. There was no count charging the prisoner as accessory before or after the fact. The statement of facts shows evidence of a receipt of goods, stolen by one partner of the firm, with knowledge of their being so stolen. It further states facts, which might perhaps have been relied upon to sustain a charge of being simply accessory to the felony, if the indictment had contained a count to that effect. We must, however, deal with the only question raised, viz., whether the conviction upon the special charge of feloniously receiving stolen goods can be sustained. The 91st section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, creates the felony charged in these terms, "whosoever shall receive any chattel, &c., the stealing, &c., whereof shall amount to a felony, either at common law or by virtue of this Act, knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen, &c., shall be guilty of felony, and may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact or for a substantive felony, and shall be liable at the discretion of the court" to a maximum sentence of fourteen years' penal servitude. At the time that Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), was passed, theft by a partner of the goods of the firm did not fall within the criminal law either common or statute. This defect was supplied by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, which after reciting that it is "expedient to provide for the better security of the property of co-partnerships and other joint beneficial owners against offences by part owners thereof, and further to amend the law as to embezzlement," proceeds to enact by the 1st section, that if a partner or one of two or more beneficial owners shall steal, &c., any property of such co-partnership or such joint beneficial owners, "every such person shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted, and punished for the same, as if such person had not been or was not a member of such co-partnership or one of such beneficial owners." This enactment is therefore limited in words to the fraudulent partner, and does not directly extend to third persons who deal with the property though in collusion with such partner. In order to reach such persons either the law as to accessories must be resorted to, or it must be shown that the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, is extended by implication to and to be read as incorporated in the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116. As to the law of accessories, we do not suggest any doubt that if a statute creates a felony or a misdemeanor it by implication forbids counselling, aiding, or abetting the offence. This is now provided for in language strongly contrasting with that of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, as to felony, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, that "whosoever shall become an accessory before the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law, or by virtue of any Act passed, or to be passed, may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon. The case of accessories after the fact is provided for in like prospective terms by sect. 3. Also as to misdemeanors by sect. 8, "whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanor, whether the same be a misdemeanor at common law or by any Act passed or to be passed, shall be liable to be tried, &c., as a principal offender." And apart from these enactments, the common law would have supplied a remedy, though without the statutory facilities of procedure. As already pointed out, however, the conviction of the prisoner is not as of a simple accessory, whether before or after the fact, and it cannot be sustained upon that footing. The question, therefore, depends upon whether the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, is extended by inference or implication to the present case. If not, the conviction was wrong, because at common law receivers of stolen goods, unless they likewise received and harboured the thief, were guilty of a bare misdemeanor, for which they were liable to fine and imprisonment (Foster's Crown Law, 373), and there could not be a conviction for a misdemeanor upon the present indictment for felony. The subject of extending statutes by inference to include cases not originally contemplated, is one which has given rise to several decisions, the leading characteristic of which is that the earlier statute deals with a genus, within which a new species is brought by a subsequent Act. Thus choses in action were not originally within the 13 Eliz. c. 5, against fraudulent conveyances, that statute being applicable only to property which could be taken in execution (Sims v. Thomas, 12 A. & E. 530); but, as to choses in action made subject to execution by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, there can be no doubt that by the conjoint operation of that Act and the 13 Eliz. c. 5, such choses in action having become, by new enactments, a species of the genus property subject to execution, and without any express enactment to that effect in the later statute, become subject to the operation of the former Act (Norcutt v. Dodd, C. & P. 100; Barrack v. McCullough, 26 L. J. 100, Ch.), so that if the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91, is to be read as a general enactment, that for the future any person receiving goods stolen with a guilty knowledge that they were stolen should be liable to be indicted for felony as a receiver, the subsequent statute having introduced a new species of larceny, it might have been contended that the general provision as to receiving in the former statute was by inference extended to the new species of larceny. There are, however, several difficulties in the way of arriving at that result upon the construction of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. First, the express words of sect. 91, "either at common law or by virtue of this Act;" secondly, the fact that the statute as to simple accessories does expressly refer to acts pari materia to be passed; thirdly, the character of the extending enactment 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, which deals not so much with property of a particular species as with a class of persons whom it specifies, and against whom only it is in terms directed, viz., partners and part owners, so that the effect is to create a new class of offenders; fourthly, the rule peculiarly applicable to the elaborate criminal legislation of which the statutes under consideration form a part, against extending penal enactments by construction. This latter rule may be illustrated by reference to the statute of 31 Eliz. c. 12, s. 5, which took away the benefit of clergy from an accessory in horse stealing, upon which it was held that the enactment extended only to such persons as were in judgment of law accessories at the time the Act was made, namely, accessories at common law, and not to such as are made accessories by subsequent statutes; and therefore a person knowingly receiving a stolen horse, though made an accessory by subsequent statutes, was held not to be ousted of the benefit of clergy by the statute of Elizabeth (Foster 372). Upon these grounds we think the statute (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 91), cannot be extended by construction so as to include a receiver of property stolen by a partner, so as to make such receiver liable in the discretion of the court to the graver punishment of fourteen years' penal servitude thereby imposed, as the prisoner would be if this conviction was sustained, a circumstance which makes the authority cited from Foster especially applicable. The conviction must therefore be quashed.

REG. v. CHUGG.

[C. CAS. R.]

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. CHUGG.

Perjury—Affiliation summons—Jurisdiction of justices—7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2.

The mother of a bastard child, born on the 20th March 1868, applied to a justice, on the 18th April 1868, for a summons against the defendant, the putative father, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2. A summons was issued on the same day, but never served, as the defendant could not be found by the process-server to whom the summons was given. On the 14th Jan. 1870, about a fortnight after the mother had found out the defendant's address, she applied for and obtained another summons, which was served on the defendant, and he appeared thereto, and, being examined on oath, committed the perjury assigned:

Held, that the justices had jurisdiction to hear the complaints, although at the time of service of the summons more than twelve months had elapsed from the birth of the child.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Hannen, J.

The prisoner was tried before me at the Devon Spring Assizes, on an indictment charging him with perjury in his evidence on the hearing of an information and complaint in bastardy at a petty sessions of the justices for the peace acting for the division of Braunton, in the county of Devon, wherein one Betsy Hill was the complainant and the prisoner was the defendant.

It was proved that Betsy Hill was delivered of a bastard child on the 20th March 1868, and that on the 18th April 1868, she duly laid an information before a justice of the petty sessional division in which she resided that the prisoner was the father of such child, and made application for a summons to be served upon the prisoner to appear and answer her complaint.

On this information a summons was, on the 18th April 1868, issued by the said justice requiring the prisoner to appear on the 6th May 1868, to answer the complaint of the said Betsy Hill.

It was proved by the police constable to whom the said summons was given for the purpose of serving it on the prisoner, that he inquired for the prisoner at his house, but that he was not there, and that he made search for him, but could not find him.

Betsy Hill stated that the prisoner was away from his home at the time the summons was issued, and that she did not see the prisoner or know where he was until about a fortnight before the 14th Jan. 1870, on which day she applied for and obtained a summons, calling on the prisoner to appear on the 2nd Feb. 1870, to answer her complaint.

The following is a copy of this summons:

To William Chugg, of the parish of Chittleham-holt, in the said county, farmer's son.

Devon to wit. Whereas, application was, on the 18th April 1868, made to me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, by Betsy Hill, single woman, residing at Tawstock, in the petty sessional division of Braunton, in the said county, for which I act, who had then been delivered of a bastard child, since the passing of the Act of the eighth year of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for the further Amendment of the Laws relating to the Poor in England," within twelve calendar months from the said 18th April 1868, and of which bastard child she alleges you to be the father, for a summons to be served upon you to appear at a petty session of the peace, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. These are, therefore, to require you to appear at the petty session of the justices, to be holden at the Guildhall, Barnstaple, in the said county, being the petty session for the division of Braunton, in which I usually act, on Wednesday the 2nd Feb. next, at twelve o'clock at noon, to answer any complaint which she shall then and there make against you touching the premises. Herein fail you not.

Given under my hand, at Barnstaple, in the county aforesaid, this 14th Jan. 1870.

JAMES J. HIERN.

This summons was served on the prisoner, and he appeared in obedience to it on the day named thereon, when he stated, on oath, that he did not know the said Betsy Hill, and had never seen her before.

It was objected, on behalf of the prisoner, that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the complaint, more than twelve months' having elapsed between the birth of the child and the application

Carter, for the prisoner: The justices had no jurisdiction to hear the complaint. The first summons was not proved in evidence. The summons of the 14th Jan. 1870, which was proved and is set out contains a false recital. [WILLES, J.—If the putative father appears before the magistrates, that is sufficient to give them jurisdiction so as to support a conviction for perjury against him: (Reg. v. Smith, L. Rep. C. C. R. 110; 11 Cox C. C. 10.)] If it was a mere question of process, that would be so. By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 s. 2 the mother of a bastard child may apply within twelve months from the birth for a summons to be served on the putative father, and the magistrates are thereupon to issue their summons to him to appear at the petty sessions. The summons must be issued and served within the twelve months. [BOVILL, C. J.—Why so? Suppose the application made on the last day of the twelve months, and summons then issued but not served until the next day, would not that be good?] Then the proceedings would be all so continuous that it might be good. In this case a service of the first summons might have been made; it might have been left at the last place of abode of the putative father: (Reg. v. Damarell, 8 B. & S. 659.) The application must be made within twelve months from the birth to give jurisdiction: (Potts v. Cambridge, 27 L. J. 62, M. C.) The following cases were also cited:

Reg. v. Scotton, 59 B. 493;
Reg. v. Brown, 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 29;
Reg. v. Davis, 22 L. J. 143, M. C.;
Reg. v. Derry, 28 L. J. 86, M. C.;
Reg. v. Pickford, 30 L. J. 133, M. C.;
Reg. v. Lightfoot, 25 L. J. 115, M. C.;
Reg. v. Thomas, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 460.

Murch, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C. J.—When the clauses of the Acts upon which this question depends are looked at it will appear that the decision of the learned judge at the trial was right, and that this conviction was proper. In this case the jurisdiction of the magistrates depends on this, whether the application of the mother of the bastard child for the summons against the putative father was made within twelve months after the birth of the child. Upon the facts it appears that the application was made within the twelve months, and that a summons thereupon issued, but was not served. The statute makes a marked distinction between the application and the summons. The application must necessarily be made within the twelve months, and the magistrates are required thereupon to issue a summons (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 s. 2), but the summons need not be served within the twelve months. Indeed, there is no enactment which requires the summons to be served within any particular time. If there were, the parties sought to be charged would absent themselves to avoid service, as was the case in Potts v. Cambridge. The subsequent statute, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, leaves this question where it was before. The forms given by that Act are such as it shall be sufficient to use to free the proceedings from technical objections. The question reserved for our opinion is concluded by Potts v. Cambridge, where it was held that the summons need not be served until twelve months after the birth of the child. The conviction must therefore be affirmed.

The rest of the court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. WILLIAM KAY.

Forgery Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98), s. 24—Making a written request to pay money without authority (a.)

A. deposited with a building society 460*l.* for two years at interest through the prisoner, who was an agent of the society. Having obtained the deposit note from A., who gave it up on receiving an accountable receipt for 500*l.*, being made up by the 460*l.* and interest, the prisoner wrote, without authority, the following document: "Received of the S. L. Building Society the sum of 417*l.* 13*s.* on account of my share, No. 8071, pp. Susey A., Wm. Kay," and obtained 417*l.* 13*s.* by means thereof, and giving up the deposit note. The jury having found that by the custom of the society such documents were treated as an "authority to pay," and as a "warrant to pay," and as a "request to pay," money, the prisoner was convicted under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 24.

Held that the conviction was right.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Arthur R. Adams, Esq., sitting as a commissioner at the Spring Assizes 1870, on the Midland Circuit!

William Kay was indicted for feloniously making by procuration in the name of one Susey Ambler, a security for money, to wit 417*l.* 13*s.*, without lawful authority or excuse with intent to defraud.

In the second count he was charged as in the first count, except that it was stated that he made the security without the lawful authority of the said Susey Ambler.

The third and fourth counts were as the first and second, except that the document was described as a "warrant."

The fifth and sixth counts were as the first and second, but the document was described as an "order."

The seventh and eighth counts were also as the first and second, but the document was described as an "authority for the payment of money."

The ninth and tenth counts were also as the first and second, but the document was described as a "request for the payment of money."

In ten other counts the prisoner was charged with feloniously signing by procuration like documents as in the other counts mutatis mutandis, and was tried before me at the last assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire, at Leeds.

The document forming the subject of the indictment, was in the following form:

Thornton, Oct. 1867.

Received of the South Lancashire Building Society the sum of 417*l.* 13*s.* on account of my share, No. 8071.
 PP. SUSEY AMBLER.
 417*l.* 13*s.* WM. KAY.

The prisoner was the local agent at Thornton, of a

(a) The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98 (The Forgery Act), s. 24, enacts that whosoever, with intent to defraud, shall draw, make, sign, accept, or indorse any bill of exchange or promissory note, or any undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request, for the payment of money, or for the delivery or transfer of goods or chattels, or of any bill, note, or other security for money, by procuration or otherwise, for, in the name, or on the account of any other person, without lawful authority or excuse, or shall offer, utter, dispose of, or put off any such bill, note, undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request so drawn, made, signed, accepted, or indorsed by procuration or otherwise, without lawful authority or excuse, as aforesaid, knowing the same to have been so drawn, made, signed, accepted, or indorsed as aforesaid, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years, and not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.
